Monk, convinced by these reasons, thought only of repairing his error, by an open rupture with the Parliament. He therefore sent Clarges, his confident, to Sir Thomas Alleyne, Lord Mayor, to tell him, he was very sorry for what he had done, and desired a conference with him, and the Common-council. But Clarges could obtain nothing from the Lord Mayor, who was persuaded that Monk was deceitful and treacherous. Notwithstanding this, Monk assembled his forces, with a resolution to march once more into the city, and be reconciled to the magistrates, whatever might be the consequence. At his departure, he sent a letter to the Parliament, written with the approbation of his principal officers, complaining, "That they gave too much countenance to Lambert, Vane, and several that engaged with the late Committee of Safety; and that they had permitted Ludlow and some others to sit in their House, who had been, by Sir Charles Coot and some of the Irish officers, accused of high treason; and had countenanced too much a late petition to exclude the most sober and conscientious, both ministers and others, by oaths, from all employment and maintenance; and in fine, peremptorily demanded, that by Friday next, they would issue out writs to fill up their House; and when filled, should rise at an appointed time, to give place to a full and free Parliament."

By this letter the Parliament easily perceived, Monk sought an occasion of quarrel, which, as it was difficult to avoid, it was judged the wisest course to vote Monk the thanks of the House, for his care, and that his desires should be satisfied without delay. At the same time, Scot and Robinson were dispatched to him with this resolution. But Monk had now marched into the city, and had, though with great difficulty, prevailed with the Mayor to assemble the Common-council that afternoon. Meantime, the two commissioners of the Parliament, having waited on Monk with the message, returned with little satisfaction. He only told them, "All would be well, if his letter was complied with." Upon this answer, the Parliament voted, that the command of the army should be lodged in five commissioners, of whom Monk himself was one, and that the Quorum of them should be three; but when it was moved, that Monk should always be one of the three, it was carried in the negative.

In this interval, Monk repairing to the Common-council, made a speech, in which he testified his concern for having accepted a commission, so disagreeable in the execution to the city. That he was forced to accept it, or quit his command, which he had thought proper to keep at such a juncture, for the good of the city, and of the whole nation, whose happiness and advantage he should always promote to the utmost of his power.

To give an unquestionable proof of the sincerity of his intentions, he communicated to the council his letter to the Parliament, and answer to the two commissioners. As these last proofs were convincing, the council was appeased, and Monk was looked upon as a friend come to their relief, notwithstanding the transactions of the foregoing day. When the news of this reconciliation was dispersed through the city, it was followed with ringing of bells, and bon-fires in every street, at which were roasted numberless rumps in contempt of the Parliament. Some days after, the council of state sent to desire Monk to come and assist them with his counsels, in regulating the affairs of the nation: but he did not think fit to expose himself to this danger. He answered, that the inhabitants of London were so dissatisfied, that his presence was absolutely necessary in the city, to keep them in awe. On the other hand, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen conjured him to stay in the city, acquainting him, that the Parliament was secretly endeavouring to corrupt his army, and that Sir Arthur Haslerig had written to several persons in London, to that purpose. So Monk took care to avoid the snare laid for him.

At last, on the 18th of February, Monk so ordered it, that some of the sitting members had a conference with some of the secluded, concerning their re-admission. But the conference was fruitless, because the sitting members could not, or would not, undertake for the Parliament's accepting the conditions which should be agreed on. Monk at length made the secluded members engage, that after their re-admission, they would call a free Parliament, and dissolve the present.

These resolutions being taken, Monk repaired to Whitehall the 21st of February, attended by all the secluded members, and after an exhortation to take care of the interests of the nation, gave them a guard to conduct them to the Parliament, where they took their seats, without any previous notice to the sitting members. They were so superior in number to the Independents, that the heads of that party, after a short demur among themselves, thought fit to withdraw, and abandon their cause.

The same day, Monk wrote a circular letter to all the regiments, to inform them of the change in the Parliament, to assure them of the zeal of the restored members for the interests of the army, and to desire their opposition to all attempts in favour of Charles Stuart. This last clause was thought necessary to keep the army in temper, which was yet far from desiring the King's restoration. This letter was signed by Monk himself, and his principal officers, and sent the same day to the Colonels of the several regiments.

This Parliament continued their session but twenty-five days, during which they did several things, plainly shewing they were far from being the King's enemies.

I. They annulled all votes and orders made by the Parliament since the 6th of December 1648, against the secluded members.

II. They released all the imprisoned friends of the King, and amongst the rest Sir George Booth.

III. They constituted Monk, by act of Parliament, Captain-General of the armies of the three nations.

IV. They repealed the oath of abjuration of Charles Stuart, and all the royal family.

V. They appointed a new council of state consisting of one-and-thirty members, most of them royalists, and well disposed to serve the King.

VI. They made great changes in the militia of London, and the several counties, and revoked all commissions granted by the republicans.

VII. They abrogated the engagement "To be true and faithful to the Commonwealth without a King, or House of Peers," by which the Lords, who were generally the King's adherents, were restored to their right of constituting a separate House in Parliament. Lastly, they dissolved themselves the 16th of March, after having issued out writs for a free Parliament to meet the

* In Skinner's life of Monk, it is said, that the orders to march the army into the city, were not directed to Monk alone, but also to the other commissioners, whereof Haslerig, Walton, and Morley, where upon the place, and, ever since his arrival at London, had acted jointly with him; so that had the General refused his orders, the others might have done the business without him, and consequently, put it to the hazard of removing him from the command of his army. But as he did not let his friends know this reason, the action was variously censured.

25th of April, who were to restore the King, which was no longer doubted.*

However, as such a change could not please every one, the Parliament, before their separation, thought it necessary to amuse the public, or at least to leave room to doubt whether the King's restoration was intended. Wherefore it was voted, first, that no person should be admitted to any military employ, before he had sworn to acknowledge the lawfulness of taking arms against the late King. Secondly, that no person who had been in arms against the Parliament, should be chosen a member of the next Parliament. In all appearance, these resolutions were only taken to prevent disturbances from the mal-contents, in the interval between the two Parliaments.

But these deceitful votes were not capable of imposing on the republicans. To prevent the blow which could not but crush them entirely, they endeavoured to persuade Monk to take upon himself the government, and supply the place of Oliver Cromwell, chusing rather to own him for governor or even sovereign, than be exposed to the King's vengeance. Monk having constantly rejected this offer, they applied to Clarges to desire him to persuade the general to accept the government. But Clarges discovered their plot to the council of state, who, if Monk had not interceded for them, would have punished them severely.

This attempt failing, they privately excited a number of officers of their own principles to draw up a declaration, by which they engaged to support the republican government. They brought this declaration to the General to sign, pretending it should afterwards be subscribed by the whole army. But Monk excused himself, alledging, this precaution was needless, after the vote, that no adherent of the King should be elected to serve in the ensuing Parliament. In short, as they continued to importune him, he peremptorily forbade them to assemble without his permission.

The transactions in England being quickly carried to Cardinal Mazarin, it was not difficult for him to perceive, that Monk had some great design in view. But as he could not judge whether that General was labouring for himself or the King, he ordered Monsieur de Bourdeaux, the French ambassador at London, to offer his friendship to Monk, and every thing in his power, whatever were his designs.†

The day after the dissolution of the Parliament, Sir John Greenvil, sent by the King to General Monk, was introduced to him in the night. The King punctually followed the instructions thus received, and removed from Brussels to Breda.

Meanwhile, Monk displaced, on divers pretences, such officers as were most suspected by him, and filled their posts with others in whom he could entirely confide. Moreover, some officers, by his direction, framed an engagement in form of an address to the General, by which they promised a ready obedience to the orders of the Parliament, when assembled. This engagement being presented to Monk, he approved it, and ordered it to be subscribed by all the regiments in England, Scotland, and Ireland.

A. D. 1660.] While the hopes of the King and his party were daily increasing, an accident happened, which might have been attended with ill consequences, had it not been speedily remedied. This was Lambert's escape out of the Tower, and his putting himself at the head of some troops. As he was greatly esteemed by the soldiers, there was danger that all the republicans, who were very numerous in the army, would declare for him. Wherefore Monk lost not a moment to prevent this danger before the mischief reached any farther. Lambert having assembled some discontented troops at Daventry, Ingoldsby was immediately sent against him, with Monk's own regiment, and ordered to take some other troops in his way, and give him battle. This extreme diligence did the business effectually. As Lambert had not yet time to assemble many troops, Ingoldsby met him the 22d of April, thirteen days after his escape, defeated, and sent him to the Tower. Thus the fear which Lambert's escape had infused into the King's party was entirely dispelled.

Two days before the Parliament met, the republicans made another attempt to prevent the King's restoration, by dispersing a forged letter from Brussels, in which it was said, that the King only waited his restoration, to be severely revenged upon all his opposers. It was also added, that his party was preparing to put them all to the sword. This forged letter beginning to do mischief, the Lords, and others of the King's party, published a declaration, signed by seventy persons, in which they disavowed the intentions ascribed to them, and protested, that their desire was to live peaceably, without any thoughts of revenge upon the authors of their sufferings.

The new Parliament met the 25th of April, in two Houses, the one of Lords, the other of Commons, agreeably to the ancient constitution.‡ In the House of Lords most were the King's friends. In that of the Commons, it was found, that many royalists were elected. Some Presbyterians, who were not in the secret, had a mind to complain, and moved for an examination of the elections, but were not heard. Most of the Presbyterian members were no less zealous than the royalists for the King's restoration, which every one wished, not so much, perhaps, out of affection to him, as to deliver the kingdom from the dominion of the Independents and Fanatics, and from the tyranny of the army, which had lasted twelve years.

Two days after the opening of the Parliament, Greenvil, returning from Brussels, waited on Monk, with a commission from the King, constituting him Captain-General of all the forces of the three kingdoms, and also with a letter from his Majesty to be communicated to the council of state, and the officers of the army. But Monk declined to open the letter, till he had received the Parliament's directions. Meantime, the Commons having adjourned themselves for two or three days, Greenvil applied himself to the Lords, and presented to them a letter from the King, with a declaration dated the 14th of April. In the letter the King told the Lords, that hearing, they were again acknowledged to have the authority, belonging to them by their birth, he hoped they would make use of it for the public good, for composing the distractions of the kingdom, and for restoring him to his just prerogatives, the Parliament to their privileges, and the people to their liberties. The declaration was well calculated to uphold the satisfaction inspired by the prospect of public settlement. It offered a general amnesty to all persons whatsoever; and that without any exception, but such as should afterwards be made by Parliament; it promised liberty of conscience; and a concurrence in any act of Parliament, which, upon mature deliberation, should be offered for insuring that indulgence: it submitted to the arbitration of the same assembly the inquiry into all grants, purchases, and alienations: and it assured the soldiers of all their arrears, and promised them, for the future, the same pay which they then enjoyed.

* They also raised an assessment of one hundred thousand pounds a month, for the payment of the army, and defraying the public expences for six months.

† Locke says, that Monk had agreed with the French Ambassador to take the government on himself, by whom he had promise from Mazarin of assistance from France, to support him in this undertaking. This bargain was struck between them late at night, but not so secretly, but that Monk's wife, who had posted herself behind the hangings, where she could hear all that passed, finding what was resolved, sent immediately notice of it by her brother Clarges to Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper. She was zealous for the Restoration of the King, and promised Sir Anthony, to watch her husband, and inform him from time to time how matters went. Upon this notice Sir Anthony summoned the Council of State, and before them, indirectly charging Monk with what he had learned, proposed, that to remove all scruples, Monk would at that instant take away their commissions from such and such officers in his army, and give them to those whom he named. By this means the army ceased to be at Monk's devotion, and was put into hands that would never serve him, in the design he had undertaken.

‡ Edward Montague, Earl of Manchester, was chosen Speaker for the Lords, and Sir Harbottle Grimstone for the Commons.

Immediately after the reading of this declaration, the Lords voted, "That, according to the ancient and fundamental laws of this kingdom, the government is, and ought to be by King, Lords, and Commons."

Then, Sir John Greenvil came to the House of Commons, and presented a letter to them from his Majesty, with the same declaration inclosed, which was read, as well as the letter directed to General Monk to be communicated to the council of state and the army. These papers, which, three months before, would have lain unregarded on the table, were now considered as convincing proofs of the King's good intentions, and sufficient reasons to restore him to the exercise of the kingly power, without requiring other conditions than what he should himself be pleased to grant. The Commons therefore readily agreed to the vote of the Lords, and so the King saw himself restored without any of the conditions which had caused so long a war, and so great an effusion of blood. This is a clear evidence, either that the Royalists were much superior in number in the House, which nevertheless is not very probable, or that the Presbyterians were willing to desist from conditions which they had formerly so ardently demanded, for certain terms relating to their religion, which had been positively promised, but which, as they were never performed, gave afterwards too just cause of complaint.

The King being effectually recognized, by the vote of both Houses, the Commons ordered, that fifty thousand pounds should be presented to him, ten thousand to the Duke of York, and five thousand to the Duke of Gloucester.*

Then the Commons ordered, that all the journals should be searched, and those acts and orders razed out which were inconsistent with the government of King, Lords, and Commons. The army, the navy, and the city of London prepared addresses to congratulate his Majesty on his restoration, and to promise him perfect obedience, and these addresses were delivered to Clarges, who undertook to carry them to the King. The 8th of May, the King was proclaimed in London with great solemnity, and commissioners from the Parliament and city departed on the 11th to wait on the King, who expected them at the Hague. Some Presbyterian ministers also repaired thither, as well to imprint on the King a sense of the service lately done him by their sect, as to sound his inclinations with regard to the liberty, which they had probably stipulated, before they engaged in the affair of his restoration. The King confirmed verbally what he had promised by his declaration. But when they besought him not to revive the use of the common prayer in his chapel, and that the surplice might be discontinued, he warmly answered, "That whilst he gave them liberty he would not have his own taken from him."

After the King had given audience to the Parliament's commissioners, the 16th of May, and received the homage of Admiral Montague, and the other officers of the navy, who waited on him at Scheveling, he remained some days at the Hague, as well to prepare for his departure, as to receive the compliments of the states, and embarked the 23d. He arrived at Dover the 25th, and the same day at Canterbury, where on the morrow, he honoured Monk with the Order of the Garter. The 29th, his birth-day, he arrived at Whitehall, through a numberless multitude of people, who, by their acclamations, demonstrated their joy at his restoration.†

The

* The city of London sent also ten thousand pounds to the King, and a thousand pounds a-piece to his two brothers.

† The reader must have remarked, that no people could undergo a change more sudden and entire in their manner than did the English nation, during the period just closed. From tranquillity, concord, submission, sobriety, they passed in an instant to a state of faction, fanaticism, rebellion, and almost of frenzy. Their violence indeed, exceeded any thing which we can now imagine. Between the Royalists and the Republican, no social intercourse was maintained, no marriages or alliances were contracted. "Your friends, the cavaliers," said a Parliamentarian to a Royalist, "are very dissolute, and debauched." "True," replied the Royalist, "they have the infirmities of men; but your friends, the roundheads, have the vices of devils,—tyranny, rebellion, and spiritual pride." The Royalists, though ruined by confiscations and sequestrations, kept up their spirits. "As much as hope is superior to fear," said a poor but merry cavalier, "so much is our situation preferable to that of our enemies; we laugh, while they tremble!"

By the rigid severity of the Presbyterians and Independents, horse-racing and cock-fighting were prohibited, as the greatest enormities. Even bearbaiting was esteemed heathenish, and unchristian; the sport of it, not the inhumanity, gave offence. Colonel Harrison, inspired with pious zeal, marched with his regiment into London, and destroyed all the bears, which were kept there for the diversion of the citizens.

Amongst the remarkable events of the age, was the rise of the Quakers. George Fox, born at Drayton, in Lancashire, in 1624, was the founder of this sect. He was the son of a weaver, and himself a shoemaker. Feeling a stronger impulse towards spiritual contemplations, than towards that mechanical profession, he left his master, and went about the country clothed in a leathern doublet, a dress which he had long affected, as well for its singularity, as for its cheapness. That he might wear himself from sublunary objects, he broke off all connections with his friends and family, and never dwelled a moment in one place; lest habit should beget new connections, and depress the sublimity of his aerial meditations. He frequently wandered into the woods, and passed whole days in hollow trees, without company, or any other amusement than his Bible. Having reached that pitch of perfection as to need no other book, he soon advanced to another state of spiritual progress, and began to pay even less regard to that Divine composition itself. His own breast, he imagined, was full of the same inspiration which had guided the prophets and apostles themselves; and by this inward light must every spiritual obscurity be cleared, by this living spirit must the dead letter be animated.—When he had been sufficiently consecrated in his own imagination, he felt that the fumes of self-applause soon dissipate, if not continually supplied by the admiration of others; and he began to seek proselytes. Proselytes were easily gained, at a time when all men's affections were turned towards religion, and when the most extravagant modes of it were sure to be the most popular. All the forms of ceremony, invented by pride and ostentation. Fox and his disciples, from a superior pride and ostentation, carefully rejected: even the ordinary rites of civility were shunned, as the nourishment of carnal vanity and self-conceit. They would bestow no titles of distinction: the name of friend was the only salutation with which they indiscriminately accosted every one. To no person would they make a bow, or move their hat, or give any signs of reverence. Instead of that affected adulation, introduced into modern tongues, of speaking to individuals as if they were a multitude, they returned to the simplicity of ancient tongues; and thou, and thee, were the only expressions which, on any consideration, they could be brought to employ. Dress, too, a material circumstance, distinguished the members of this sect. Every superfluity and ornament were carefully retrenched: no plaits to their coat, no buttons to their sleeves, no lace, no ruffles, no embroidery. Even a button to the hat, though sometimes useful, yet not being always so, was universally rejected by them with horror and detestation. The violent enthusiasm of this sect, being too strong for weak nerves to sustain, threw the preachers into convulsions, shakings, and distortions in their limbs; whence they received the appellation of "Quakers." Some attempted to fast forty days in imitation of Christ; and one of them bravely perished in the experiment. A female Quaker came naked into the church where the Protector sat, being moved by the spirit, as she said, to appear as a sign to the people. Amidst the great toleration which was then granted to all sects, and even encouragement given to all innovations, this sect alone suffered persecution. From the fervour of their zeal, the Quakers broke into churches, disturbed public worship, and harassed the minister and audience with railing and reproaches. When carried before a magistrate, they refused him all reverence, and treated him with the same familiarity as if he had been their equal. Sometimes they were thrown into mad-houses, sometimes into prisons: sometimes whipped, sometimes pillored. The patience and fortitude with which they suffered, begat compassion, admiration, and esteem. A supernatural spirit was believed to support them under those sufferings, which the ordinary state of humanity, freed from the illusions of passion, is unable to sustain.—The Quakers crept into the army: but as they preached universal peace, they reduced the military zealots from their profession, and would soon, had they been suffered, have put an end, without any defeat or calamity, to the dominion of the saints. These attempts became a fresh ground for persecution, and a new reason for their progress among the people.—Morals with this sect were carried, or affected to be carried, to the same degree of extravagance as religion. Give a Quaker a blow on one cheek, he held up the other: ask his cloak, he gave you his coat also: the greatest interest would not engage him in any court of judicature, to swear even to the truth: he never asked more for his wares than the precise sum which he was determined to accept. This last maxim is laudable, and continues still to be rigorously observed by that sect.—No fanatics ever carried farther the hatred to ceremonies, forms, orders, rites, and positive institutions. Even Baptism and the Lord's Supper, by all other sects believed to be interwoven with the very vitals of Christianity, were disdainfully rejected by them. The very sabbath they profaned. The holiness of churches they derided; and they would give to these sacred edifices no other appellation but that of "shops" or "steeple-houses." No priests were admitted in their sect: every one had received from the immediate illumination a character much superior to the sacerdotal. When they met for Divine worship, each rose up in his place, and delivered the extemporary inspirations of the Holy Ghost: women were also admitted to teach the brethren, and were considered as proper vehicles to convey the dictates of the spirit. Sometimes a great many speakers were moved to speak at once: sometimes a total silence prevailed in their congregations.

KING CHARLES II. LANDING AT DOVER.

Published by J. & J. Gundee, Albion Press, London, 1834.

The Parliament, on April 25, 1649, agreed upon a new sort of Coin, whereof there were coined, crowns, half-crowns, shillings, six-pences, pence, and half-pence. The larger pieces were inscribed on one side, THE COMMONWEALTH OF ENGLAND, and had St. George's cross in a shield, between a palm branch and a laurel; reverse, the same shield conjoined to another, in which is a harp for Ireland (vulgarly called the breeches) above which there is XII. the legend GOD WITH US. The six-pence has VI. above the shields. The two-pence and pence have no inscription, only the initial figures; and the half-penny only the single shield, with the harp on the reverse. There were likewise coined pieces of fine gold, of the same form and inscription as the silver money, XX. above the arms. The half of them have X. (fig 2.) The six-pences 1651, is, strictly speaking, the first milled money, Queen Elizabeth's being only marked on the flat edge. The copper farthing has the cross under a garland, ENGLANDS FARTHING. Reverse, a harp, FOR NECESSARY CHANGE. Oliver Cromwell's crown-piece is inimitably performed, and preserved as a choice medal in the cabinets of the curious, being the first milled money that has an inscription upon the rim. It has his head laureat, OLIVAR. D. G. RP. ANG. SCO. HIB. &c. PRO. Reverse, in a shield crowned with the imperial crown of England, St. George's cross in the first and fourth quarters; St. Andrew's for Scotland in the second, and the harp for Ireland in the third; and in a scutcheon of pretence: his paternal coat, namely, a lion rampant, legend PAX QVÆRITVR BELLO. 1658. upon the rim, HAS. NISI. PERITVRVS. MIHI. ADIMAT. NEMO. The dye of this piece having received a flaw or crack the first stroke, leaves a mark upon the money just below the neck; a sure token to distinguish the true crown-pieces from the counterfeit. The half-crown is equally beautiful, though not so rare. The shilling is likewise a very fair piece, milled on the edge, and very rare. (fig. 1.)

James Naylor fancied that he himself was transformed into Christ, and was become the real Saviour of the world; and in consequence of this frenzy, he endeavoured to imitate many actions of the Messiah, as related in the Evangelists. As he bore some resemblance to the common pictures of Christ, he allowed his beard to grow in a similar form: he procured a woman to make oath before a magistrate, that she had been dead two days, and that he had restored her to life: he entered Bristol mounted on a horse; his disciples spread their garments before him, crying "Hosanna, to the highest, Holy, Holy, is the Lord God of Sabaoth." The Parliament at length condemned him to the pillory, to be whipped, burned in the face, and to have his tongue bored through with a red hot iron. He was sent to Bridewell, confined to hard labour, fed on bread and water, and debarred all society. The consequence was, that he came out an ordinary man, and returned to his usual occupations.

Tea, coffee, and chocolate, are first mentioned about the year 1660. About the same time, asparagus, artichokes, cauliflowers, and various sallads, were introduced into England.

The colony of New England increased by means of the Puritans, who fled thither, in order to free themselves from the constraint which Laud and the church party had imposed upon them; and, before the commencement of the civil wars, it is supposed to have contained 25,000 souls. For a like reason, the Catholics, afterwards, who found themselves exposed to many hardships, and dreaded still worse treatment, went over to America in great numbers, and settled the colony of Maryland.

Before the civil wars, learning and the fine arts were favoured at court, and a good taste began to prevail in the nation. The King loved paintings, and sometimes even handled the pencil himself, and was a good judge of the art.—Notwithstanding his confined revenue, and his freedom from vanity, he possessed four-and-twenty palaces, all of them elegantly, and completely furnished.

Civil wars, especially when founded on principles of liberty, are not commonly unfavourable to the art of eloquence and composition; or rather, by presenting nobler and more interesting objects, they amply compensate that tranquillity of which they bereave the muses. The speeches of the Parliamentary orators during this period, are of a strain much superior to what any former age had produced in England; and the force and compass of our tongue were then first put to trial. It must, however be confessed, that the wretched fanaticism, which so much infected the Parliamentary party, was no less destructive of taste and science, than of all law and order. Gaiety and wit were proscribed: human learning despised: freedom of enquiry detested: cant and hypocrisy alone encouraged. It was an article positively insisted on in the preliminaries to the treaty of Uxbridge, that all play-houses should be for ever abolished. Sir John Davenate, says Whitelock, speaking of the year 1658, published an opera, notwithstanding the nicety of the times. All the King's furniture was put to sale: his pictures, disposed of at very low prices, enriched all the collections in Europe. The cartoons, when complete, were only appraised at 300*l.* though the whole collection of the King's curiosities was sold at above 50,000*l.* even the royal palaces were pulled to pieces, and the materials of them sold. The very library and medals at St. James's were intended by the General's to be brought to auction, in order to pay the arrears of some regiments of cavalry quartered near London: but Selden, apprehensive of the loss, engaged his friend Whitlocke, then Lord Keeper for the Commonwealth, to apply for the office of librarian. This expedient saved that valuable collection.

Milton, Waller, Cowley, and Sir John Denham, were the great poets of the day. Hobbes, though now much neglected, was then highly celebrated, both abroad and at home; he died in the year 1679, aged ninety-one. Harrington's Oceana was well adapted to that age, when the plans of imaginary republics were the daily subjects of conversation and debate; and even now, it is justly admired as a work of genius, and invention. Harvey, the eminent discoverer of the Circulation of the Blood, was much favoured by Charles the First, who gave him the liberty of using all the deer in the royal forests for perfecting his discoveries on the generation of animals. It was remarked, that no physician in Europe, who had reached forty years of age, ever, to the end of his life, adopted Harvey's doctrine of the Circulation of the Blood, and that his practice in London diminished extremely, from the reproach drawn upon him by that great and signal discovery. So slow is the progress of truth in every science, even when not opposed by factious or superstitious prejudices! Clarendon was the only historian of note, at this period. He is less partial in his relation of facts, than in his account of characters, as although too honest a man to falsify the former, his affections were easily capable, unknown to himself, of disguising the latter. An air of probity and goodness runs through his whole work, as these qualities did in reality embellish the whole life of its author. Selden, whose learning was his chief excellence, and Chillingworth, an acute disputant against the Papists, can scarcely be ranked amongst the Classics of our language or country. The cant of the pulpits, the declamations of party, and the subtilties of theology, with which the press then abounded, have long since sunk into deserved oblivion.

BOOK XXIII.

26. CHARLES II.

A. D. 1660.] AT the arrival of the King, the face of England was entirely changed, and joy, pleasures, public and private rejoicings succeeded to trouble, fear, and consternation.

Charles II. at the time of his restoration, was thirty years of age, and but little known to most of his subjects. His actions in the west, during his youth, where he commanded for the King his father, had been distinguished by no advantageous event. His conduct in Scotland, when he was called to the crown of that kingdom, had not redounded to his honour, since, in his declaration published there, he had not scrupled to sacrifice the King his father to his own private advantage. In short, the battle of Worcester had acquired him no reputation, in which some pretend he had been too careful of his person, though others speak of his valour on that occasion with great commendation. Nevertheless, his friends, with a view to his restoration, had published such extravagant praises of him, that, before his arrival in England, he passed for an accomplished Prince, endowed with all the virtues and noble qualities of a hero.

Charles is said to have embraced the Catholic religion, before his return into England. Some say, he abjured the Protestant religion to Cardinal de Retz, before he left France the last time. Others pretend, it was in the year 1659, in his journey to Fontarabia, in order to procure his restoration, by the assistance of the two crowns of France and Spain. However this be, the secret, known only to the Earl of Bristol, and Sir Henry Bennet, afterwards Earl of Arlington, was so well concealed, that the public was ignorant of it, till after the King's death, when his successor, James II. was pleased to divulge it. It may be affirmed, his embracing the Catholic religion was not through a principle of conscience, since, in the whole course of his life, he showed no sense of religion. However, he lost no opportunity, in his speeches to the Parliament, to boast of his attachment to the Protestant religion, and his zeal for its advancement.

He had a maxim, that there was neither sincerity nor chastity in the world out of principle, but that some had the one or the other out of humour or vanity; and believed nobody served him out of love, and therefore he was quits with all the world, and loved others as little as he thought they loved him. He was extremely affable, and so easy and complaisant, that he seemed to take a pleasure in bestowing favours, by his manner of receiving the requests that were made to him. But he forfeited at last the esteem and affection of his subjects, who had almost adored him in the beginning of his reign, because they discovered how little they could depend on kind words, and fair promises, in which he was liberal to excess.

He was so addicted to his pleasures, that though he was very capable of business, had a good judgment, quick apprehension, and great penetration, his ministers could hardly prevail with him to suspend his pleasures some hours, and attend to affairs, which required some application. But it happened also, sometimes, that when he would apply himself to business, he dispatched more in one day, than his ministers in several.*

As his mistresses devoured his whole time, so they consumed all his treasures. Though his revenues were larger than those of any of his predecessors, except Henry VIII. and the Parliament often granted him extraordinary supplies, he was ever in want, because he spent his money without measure or discretion, as he received it. This threw him upon his Parliament, and, not to break with the Commons, he was obliged to promise what he never intended to perform.

These are the principal faults imputed to King Charles. But, on the other hand, he had many good qualities, which might have produced happy effects, had he made a better use of them. His wit was lively, his conception wonderful, and his judgment exquisite. He knew the interests of the Princes of Europe, better than any of his ministers. He had applied himself, during his exile, to the study of physic and the mathematics, and more particularly to navigation, and the building of ships. With these qualities, he might very easily have governed his dominions, in a manner glorious to himself, and advantageous to his subjects, and made himself arbiter of Europe. Yet, his reign cannot be said to be either glorious to himself, or happy to his subjects. The reason is, that because of his attachment to his pleasures, and natural remissness, he delivered himself up to the counsels of his ministers, and particularly of his brother the Duke of York, who had but too much influence upon the resolutions of the King's council, into which he found means to introduce such as he believed proper for the execution of his projects, with regard to church and state. The Duke of York was of a temper more active, violent, haughty, and revengeful. He had formed the design of raising the royal authority to a great height, and withal, of restoring the Catholic religion in England. He never ceased to pursue these projects, more especially, after he was assured, the King his brother could not expect any legitimate children.

The King's first care was to establish a council, composed chiefly of those who had shown most zeal and affection for himself, or the King his father. He received, however, some men into it, who seemed naturally to have no pretensions thereto. This was the effect of his policy: his intention was to stifle, as much as was possible, the enmities which had so long divided his subjects, and to unite them all in an obedience to the laws, and a sincere attachment to his person as their true centre.

Edward Hyde, Lord Chancellor, and soon after Earl of Clarendon, was the King's Prime Minister; but he was a mortal enemy of the Presbyterians, and consequently, little proper to preserve the King in his resolution of procuring tranquillity for all his subjects without distinction.

As soon as the King was arrived in England, the assembly, which from the 25th of April had been honoured

* Sir Thomas Killegrew, his jester, once used the following expedient to admonish him of his extreme negligence in regard to the affairs of this kingdom. He dressed himself in a pilgrim's habit, went into the King's chambers, and told him that he hated himself and the world, that he was resolved immediately to leave it, and was then entering upon a pilgrimage to hell. The King asked him what he proposed to do there. He said "To speak to the devil to send Oliver Cromwell to take care of the English government, as he had observed, with regret, that his successor was always employed in other business."

RAPIN'S

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

CHARLES THE SECOND.

with the name of Parliament, was only called the Convention, the King being unwilling to own for Parliament, an assembly which had not been summoned by his writs. But this change of name was of no long continuance. Two days after his arrival, the King went to the House of Lords, where he sent for the Commons, and gave the royal assent to three acts; the first was, to change the convention into a Parliament; the second, to continue the monthly tax of seventy thousand pounds for three months; and the third, to continue all judicial proceedings.

The affairs of this Parliament, after the King's arrival, consisted in three principal points. The first was an act of pardon or indemnity for whatever had passed since the beginning of the trouble. The second was to enable the King to disband the army. The third was the settling the King's revenue, since it was absolutely necessary to give him wherewithal to support the government, and put him in a condition to be courted and feared. The Parliament began with the act of indemnity, as being the most urgent. For this purpose the House of Commons solemnly declared, in an address presented to the King by the whole House, that they accepted, in the name of themselves, and all the Commons of England, the gracious pardon offered by his Majesty in his declaration from Breda, with reference to the excepting of such as should be excepted in an act of pardon. The Lords likewise presented a petition of the like import.

Immediately after, the King published a proclamation, declaring, that all such of the late King's judges as did not surrender themselves within fourteen days, should be absolutely excluded from the general pardon. Though, by the words of this proclamation, those who surrendered themselves could not be assured of their lives, it was nevertheless understood, that the King made use of this artifice only to have it believed, that he would not limit the power and resolutions of the Parliament on this point, and it was not doubted that the two Houses considered this proclamation as a sort of pardon, at least for life, to those who should confide in it. In consequence of this proclamation, twenty of the late King's judges voluntarily surrendered themselves. Others withdrew out of the kingdom, and some were taken in attempting to escape.

While the Parliament proceeded in the bill of indemnity, some leading republicans, who had not been the King's judges, but had exercised civil or military employs during the troubles, fearing to be called to an account, demanded of the King letters of pardon under the great seal, in order to screen themselves from all prosecution. The King readily granted their request, showing thereby that he really intended to perform his promise in his Breda declaration.

Though the King really intended the act of indemnity should be quickly dispatched, it met with great obstacles in the House of Commons with regard to the clauses which were to be inserted. Some were for having no regard to the Breda declaration, but for making examples of all who had most ardently supported the late usurpation. This raised a suspicion that the King encouraged these men, and intended to suspend the effect of his declaration by means of the Parliament, till he was revenged of his enemies. This was industriously dispersed amongst the people in libels, tending to destroy all confidence in the King's promises, and revive the troubles by driving to despair those who knew themselves most guilty. To dispel therefore these suspicions, the King sent a message to the House, to press them to dispatch the act of indemnity, and to make it agreeable to his declaration from Breda. This message so quickened the debates, that a few days after the act passed the House of Commons, and was sent up to the Lords for their concurrence.

In this bill, the House of Commons excepted for life and estate, but a few of the most notorious and active regicides. But the Lords, incited by divers petitions of the widows, children, and relations of persons executed by the sentences of the courts erected during the usurpation, were for excepting from pardon all who had been judges in those courts. The King fearing new delays from this difference of sentiment between the two Houses, came to the House of Lords, the 27th of July, and in a pathetic speech, endeavoured to persuade them to pass the bill as sent up by the Commons. He represented to them, "That he was obliged in honour to perform what he had promised in his declaration; that he never thought of excepting any but the immediate murderers of his father; that the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom entirely depended upon the performance of his promise, 'which' (says he) 'if I had not made, I am persuaded neither I nor you had now been here:' I pray therefore let us not deceive those who brought or permitted us to come together, and earnestly desire you to depart from all particular animosities and revenge, or memory of past revocations, and pass this act without other exceptions than of those who were immediately guilty of the murder of my father."

This speech, and a message sent by the King to both Houses on the same subject, determined the Lords to conform to the declaration from Breda. At last, the King repairing to the House of Lords the 29th of August, gave the royal assent to the act of indemnity, which contained in substance:

Penalties against those who should use any words of reproach tending to revive the memory of the late troubles, with an absolute pardon to all who had been engaged in them, excepting the following persons:—

Forty-nine of those who had been the late King's judges, with this distinction, that, as to the twenty, who had voluntarily surrendered themselves, if they were condemned, their execution should be suspended till the King and Parliament should order the same. Oliver Cromwell, Bradshaw, Pride, and one-and-twenty others, who were dead, were made subject to confiscations, and other penalties which the King and Parliament should ordain. Phelps and Sir Arthur Haslerig were put in the same condition. Hutchinson and Lassels were declared incapable of exercising any office, and condemned to one years forfeiture of the revenue of their estates. It was moreover ordained, that Oliver St. John, and seventeen others named in this article, should be excluded from any benefit by this act, if they accepted, or executed any office in England, either ecclesiastical, civil, or military. All that had given sentence of death in any of the late illegal high-courts of justice, except Colonel Ingoldsby and Colonel Thomlinson, were disabled from being members in any Parliament, or bearing any office in England or Wales. Those who had converted to their use any goods, belonging to the church, were excluded from the benefit of this act. Sir Henry Vane, and Lambert, were excepted from pardon, both as to life and estate.

The King likewise passed on this occasion the following acts:—

I. An act for confirmation of judicial proceedings from the 1st of May 1642, notwithstanding their illegality.

II. An act for provision of monies to pay off the armies and navy.

III. An act to fix the interest of money at six per cent.

IV. An act for a perpetual anniversary thanksgiving on the 29th of May, the day of his Majesty's nativity and restoration.

After the King had given his assent to these acts, he made a speech to both Houses, to testify how much he was pleased with them; concluding, "I am so confident of your affections, that I will not move you in any thing that immediately relates to myself: and yet I must tell you, that I am not richer, that is, I have not so much money in my purse, as when I came to you. The truth is, I have lived principally ever since, upon what I brought with me, which was indeed your money: for you sent it to me, and I thank you for it. The weekly expence of the navy eats up all you have given me by the bill of tonnage and poundage; nor have I been able to give my brothers one shilling since I came into England, nor to keep any table in my house, but what what I eat at myself. And that which troubles me most is, to see many of you come to me at Whitehall, and to think you must go somewhere else to seek your dinner. I do not mention this to you as any thing that troubles me: do but take care of the public, and for what is necessary for the peace and quiet of the kingdom, and take your own time for my own particular, affairs which I am sure you will provide for, with as much affection and frankness, as I can desire."

The Commons then made a present to the Duke of York of ten thousand pounds, and of seven thousand to the Duke of Gloucester. After this, they proceeded to the settling the King's revenue, and resolved to raise it to twelve hundred thousand pounds, which was more than any King of England had ever enjoyed, except Henry VIII. But before this could be compleated, the King came to the Parliament the 13th of September, and, passing some bills that were ready, they adjourned themselves to the 6th of November.

The same day died the Duke of Gloucester, the King's brother. This Prince, now twenty years of age, was unexpectedly taken out of the world by the small pox. As he had very good qualities, the King his brother, who loved him tenderly, appeared more concerned for this loss, than for any misfortune which had ever befallen him.

During the adjournment, the King appointed commissioners for trial of the regicides. The number of those concerned in the late King's death, as judges, officers of the court of justice, and others, amounted to fourscore and one, of whom twenty-five were dead, nineteen had made their escapes, seven others, for having been less engaged in the crime, were thought worthy of the King's clemency, and twenty-nine were condemned to die. But of these, twenty who had surrendered themselves upon the proclamation of the 6th of June, were pardoned as to life, but reserved for other penalties, as imprisonment, banishment, and forfeiture of estate. So, ten only were executed, namely, Harrison, Carew, Cook, Peters, Scot, Clement, Scroop, Jones, Hacker, and Axtel. What was most remarkable in the death of these men was, that not one expressed any signs of repentance, or did not think himself a martyr. Two only were prevailed with to pray for the King. They were almost all anabaptists, enthusiasts, fifth-monarchy-men, who believed no violence unlawful to advance the kingdom of Christ, and all, men of mean birth, except Carew and Scroop.*

A few days after the adjournment of the Parliament, the King published a proclamation concerning religion, containing eight articles, most of which prescribed certain rules to the Bishops in the exercise of their spiritual jurisdiction. The VIIth ran, that a certain number of divines should be appointed to revise the liturgy, and make such alterations in it as should be judged necessary, and that scrupulous persons should not be punished or troubled for not using it at present. The VIIIth was concerning ceremonies, to which, for the present, no person should be obliged to conform.

There were yet living, nine of the old Bishops, who were restored to their sees without any difficulty. Seven or eight others were newly consecrated for other dioceses, and Cosins, against whom so many complaints had been brought before the Parliament in 1640, for the see of Durham, where he had once been prebend. Bishopries and ecclesiastical benefices were offered to the most eminent Presbyterian ministers, but all refused except Reynolds, who accepted the Bishopric of Norwich.

September the 25th, the Princess Dowager of Orange came to London to congratulate the King her brother upon his restoration. And in November arrived from France the Queen-mother, who brought with her the Princess Henrietta her daughter, and the Prince Palatine Edward, brother to Prince Rupert. It is pretended the Queen endeavoured to persuade the King to marry Hortensia Mancini, niece to Cardinal Mazarin: but her proposal being coldly received, she advised him to pursue the negotiation already begun, of his marriage with the infanta of Portugal. Thus much is certain, she proposed to the King the marriage of the Princess Henrietta, with the Duke of Orleans, to which she found no obstacle.

The Parliament meeting the 6th of November, appointed a committee to congratulate the Queen-mother on her return to England. Shortly after, the Commons made a present of ten thousand pounds to each of the two Princesses her daughters.†

The Parliament having, in their first session, dispatched every thing relating to the act of indemnity, applied their next care to put the King in a condition to disband the army. For this purpose, several sums were granted him, and as the money was raised, regiments were broke, so that this work was finished in the space of a few months. Thus, the army, which had so long been the terror of England, was reduced to Monk's single regiment. But in disbanding the army, the King introduced a novelty, which displeased many. He formed, for his ordinary guard, two regiments, one of horse, and one of foot, in imitation of the practice in France, and other kingdoms. This was so much like a standing army, that many began to fear, the King had ill designs upon the public liberty. His predecessors had no other guards than the gentlemen pensioners, established by Henry VII.

The disbanding of the army being in such forwardness, the King told the Parliament, it was his intention to dissolve them in December. Whereupon, the Commons, to give his Majesty a fresh instance of their zeal, confirmed and renewed their former resolution, of granting the King an annual revenue of twelve hundred thousand pounds. But the time being too short to settle the funds on which this revenue was to be raised, the House thought it more proper to employ what remained, in preparing the bills to be passed, before the dissolution.

The Parliament, before their dissolution, ordered the bodies of Oliver Cromwell, Ireton, Bradshaw, and Pride, to be taken out of their graves, drawn on a hurdle to Tyburn, there hanged from ten o'clock till sun-set, and then buried under the gallows. At the same time, an act of attainder passed, not only against these four, but against the nineteen judges of the late King, who had fled from justice; among whom was Ludlow, author of the Memoirs under his name.

* General Harrison, who was first brought to his trial, with great courage, and elevation of sentiment, told the court, that the pretended crime, of which he stood accused, was not a deed performed in a corner: the sound of it had gone forth to most nations; and in the singular and marvellous conduct of it had chiefly appeared the sovereign power of heaven. That he himself, agitated by doubts, had often, with passionate tears, offered up his addresses to the Divine Majesty, and earnestly sought for light and conviction: he had still received assurance of a heavenly sanction, and returned from these devout supplications with more serene tranquillity, and satisfaction. That all the nations of the earth were, in the eyes of their Creator, less than a drop of water in the bucket, nor were their erroneous judgments aught but darkness, compared with divine illuminations. That these frequent elapses of the spirit he could not suspect to be interested illusions; since he was conscious, that for no temporal advantage, would he offer injury to the poorest man or woman that trod upon the earth. That all the allurements of ambition, all the terrors of imprisonment, had not been able, during the usurpation of Cromwell, to shake his steady resolution, or bend him to a compliance with that deceitful tyrant. And that when invited by him to sit on the right hand of the throne, when offered riches and splendor and dominion, he had disdainfully rejected all temptations; and neglecting the tears of his friends and family, had still, through every danger, held fast his principles and integrity.

† The Duke of York had, since his return to England, married Ann, Chancellor Hyde's eldest daughter, to which he had been in some measure compelled. The young lady proving pregnant, there were not wanting persons to dissuade the Duke from so unequal a match. But the King's affection then for the Chancellor, over-ruled all considerations of the injury which the Duke, his brother, and the royal family, might receive from it. He signified to the Duke, that it would oblige him not to use any shifts, and plainly told him, he must drink as he had brewed; to which the Duke submitted, from a motive of obedience. It may easily be imagined, the Queen-mother, who hated the Chancellor, was not pleased with this marriage. Accordingly, she long refused to see her daughter-in-law, and it was at the pressing instances of the King that she at last consented to receive her respects. But during her stay in England, she ever treated her with so much coldness, that her aversion to the marriage was very visible.

At

At this time likewise several officers, who had served under Cromwell, Desborough, Morgan, Overton, and several others, were arrested upon an uncertain rumour of a plot to secure the King's person, seize the Tower, and kill the Queen-mother, but it did not appear that this rumour had any good foundation.

At last, on the 29th of December, the King came to the Parliament, and gave the royal assent to various acts; after which, in a speech full of the most gracious expressions, he thought proper to dissolve them.

The conclusion of this year brought the King a new cause of affliction, in the death of the Princess of Orange, his sister, who died of the small pox the 24th of December, at the age of twenty-nine years. She left but one son, who was afterwards King of England, by the name of William III.*

After the King left Scotland, with an army to invade England, the English entirely conquered that kingdom, under the conduct of General Monk, who served the Parliament. If the King, after that, thought of Scotland, it was only to cherish the discontents, and try, by means of his adherents, to excite a revolt. For though he had been recognized and crowned in Scotland, he always considered his interests as directly opposite to those of that kingdom, or at least, of the government party. He never loved the Scots, and his belief of their selling the King his father to the English Parliament, greatly inflamed his prejudice against them, nor was it diminished by his residence in that country. Nothing would have been easier than to leave Scotland in dependance upon England, there being no likelihood that the Scots would ever be able to recover their liberty. It even seems, the King was not averse to this thought; but at last he resolved to restore that kingdom to its ancient form of government. For this purpose, Monk wrote in the King's name to the English commissioners who had been employed as judges there, to discontinue their functions the 22d of August; and at the same time proclamation was made, for the convening of the committee of estates, till a Parliament should be called. The King named the great officers of the kingdom, and took care to chuse for these posts and for his council, such as were believed most firmly devoted to him. The Earl of Glencairn was made Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Crawford, Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Cassilis, Justice General, the Earl of Lauderdale first Secretary of State, and General Midleton, the King's commissioner. These men, as well as those who formed the council, had been always firmly attached to the King's interest. Thus the Scots, freed from the yoke laid on them by Cromwell, were exactly in their former state, as before the troubles in 1637; that is under the government of a King and ministers of the very same principles with Charles I. and the ministers of that time. But there was this disadvantageous difference, that they were no longer able to make themselves feared, being entirely subdued. They had soon occasion to know what they were to expect. Some of their ministers assembling for the drawing up a remonstrance concerning their grievances, were sent to prison by the committee of estates, without any examination of the nature, motives, or language of the remonstrance, as if the bare design of presenting it had been criminal. Moreover, a proclamation was published against all unlawful assemblies and seditious writings, on supposition, that the assembly of the ministers and their petition were of that nature.

The Marquis of Argyle repairing to London to pay his duty to the King, was arrested, sent to the Tower, and afterwards to Scotland, to be tried on an impeachment of high treason. The King in his declaration from Breda, had not mentioned Scotland. So, the Scots were exposed to the resentment and vengeance of their enemies. Amongst these, Chancellor Hyde was one of the most violent, as he has plainly discovered in his history of the civil wars, and, unhappily for the Scots, he was prime minister in England, and had the principal direction of the King's affairs.

The King summoned a Parliament, in Scotland, and published a proclamation, declaring, that he left it entirely to this Parliament, to examine the conduct of his subjects of Scotland; and that after his honour was vindicated, and his prerogative established, he would grant a pardon which would witness how much he desired the happiness of his people.

As for Ireland, the King committed the government of it to Sir Maurice Eustace, Chancellor, and the Earls of Orrery, and Montrath, in quality of Lords-Justices, till a Lord-Lieutenant should be appointed.

The year 1661 was ushered in by an extraordinary event. This was an insurrection of some fifth-monarchy men, who believed themselves bound in conscience to use their utmost endeavours to advance the kingdom of Christ on earth.† The 6th of January, while the King was attending the Queen-mother, and the Princess his sister, to Dover, in their return to France, about fifty of these men, under the conduct of one Thomas Venner, assembled in the evening in St. Paul's church yard, and killed a man, who, upon demand, had answered, "For God and the King." This giving an alarm to the city, some trained bands were sent against them, whom these men quickly routed, and then marched through several streets, and at last retired to Cane-wood, (between Highgate and Hampstead) whence a party of horse and foot, sent by General Monk, dislodged them, and took some prisoners. This did not prevent the rest from returning to the city, where they fought furiously, till they were obliged to take sanctuary in a house. They there defended themselves like men fearless of death, or rather, as secure from all danger, under the protection of Jesus Christ. Here it was that Venner, being wounded, and twenty of his men killed, with as many of the assailants, was taken with the rest of his fellows. A few days after, they were all tried, condemned, and executed, without any confession of guilt, and persisting in their extravagances to the last. Two young men only shewed some signs of repentance.

Though this attempt could not justly be considered as the consequence of a design formed by a whole party, the court urged this insurrection to confirm the rumours of a conspiracy against the government. The King took occasion to publish a proclamation, forbidding all meetings, and conventicles, under pretence of religion, and commanding the oaths of allegiance and supremacy to be tendered to all persons disaffected to the government, and in case of refusal, they were to be prosecuted on the statute of the 7th of James I.

It will be immediately seen, that the ruin of the Presbyterian party was now resolved, and that pretences were seeking to execute this resolution. To succeed in this design, an admirable expedient was devised. This was to range, under the same denomination, all the sects differing from the church of England. This denomination was, that of dissenters, or non-conformists, under which were comprehended, as well the Presbyterians, as the Papists, Anabaptists, and other sects. By this affected confusion, all the non-conformists were charged with the faults of one of the sects comprised under that name, and, as if they had made but one body, punished without distinction, on pretence of keeping them in awe, and preventing them from disturbing the state.

Some of the Presbyterian ministers observing they were industriously confounded with sects, with whom they had no relation, petitioned the King for a conference between them and the Bishops, in order to examine wherein consisted their differences, and the objections of the Presbyterians, to the book of common prayer. The King granted their request, and immediately named twelve Bishops, as principals, and nine other

* It was also this year that the Royal Society was erected by the King's letters patent, who besides granted it all the necessary encouragement towards a discovery of the secrets of nature, and of what is most curious and necessary in natural philosophy and mechanics.

† They thought, it was not enough to believe that Christ was to reign on earth, and to put the saints in possession of the kingdom, but that the saints were to take the kingdom themselves: some of them seemed persuaded, that Christ would come down and head them.

clergymen as assistants; and on the Presbyterian side, twelve ministers as principals, and nine others as assistants, to confer together at the Bishop of London's house, who then lodged in the Savoy.

A. D. 1661.] Such conferences upon religion are seldom attended with a happy success; first, because the two parties must be equally animated with the spirit of peace and charity, which is rarely found amongst men. Secondly, because in these conferences, one of the parties is usually superior, and in possession of power, and therefore not very ready to quit that advantage, to be reduced to an equality. Thirdly, the animosity between the two parties, generally hinders the conferences from succeeding. The one cannot bear to receive laws from the other, nor think of revoking what has been once advanced. Fourthly, instead of thinking seriously on peace, both parties seek only to surprize one another. Lastly, it too often happens, that these conferences are granted by the prevailing, to the oppressed party, only to have it said, that peace was offered, but rejected by the contrary party. There is room to believe, that in this conference all these circumstances met, and therefore it is no wonder, it succeeded like the rest of the same nature; for, in short, it broke off without any effect, and, as too commonly happens, each party threw the blame upon the other.

During this conference at the Savoy, the King was magnificently crowned on St. George's day, the 23d of April.

The Parliament met on the day appointed. The greatest part were high-church-men, that is, violent enemies of the Presbyterians, great assertors of the minutest ceremonies of the church, and most devoted to the King and the royal prerogative. They literally followed the principles of Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury. In a word, this Parliament may be said to have been composed by Chancellor Hyde, Prime-Minister, and now Earl of Clarendon. This Parliament was called the Pensionary Parliament, because it was afterwards discovered, that many of the members received pensions from the court.

The King going to the Parliament the 8th of May, made a speech to both Houses, in which, after some expressions of his great affection for his people, he recommended two bills, which he had prepared to confirm the act of indemnity. He also communicated to them his intended marriage with the Infanta of Portugal, which had been resolved with the approbation of his whole council.

The Earl of Clarendon, Lord Chancellor, afterwards enlarged on the particulars mentioned by the King in his speech, but chiefly upon two points untouched by the King. The first, related to the seditious Sermons of certain preachers, which tended to renew the old troubles, and whose license it was necessary to curb. The second point on which he insisted, was the late insurrection, which he aggravated in the strongest expressions, intimating, that by intercepted letters it might be concluded, that the combination reached very far, and if the vigilance of the Lord Mayor had not prevented it, the city had been in danger of being burnt to ashes.

Sir Edward Turner, the Duke of York's Attorney-General, being chosen Speaker of the House of Commons, at the recommendation of the court, both Houses unanimously voted their thanks to the King for the gracious communication of his resolution to marry, and went in a body to congratulate him. Then the House of Commons ordered all their members to receive the Sacrament according to the prescribed liturgy within a certain time, upon pain of being expelled the House.

The 20th of May the two Houses jointly ordered, that the writing called the Solemn League and Covenant should be burnt by the common hangman; which was performed with great triumph. Three days after, the following acts were also ordered to be burnt: the act for erecting a high-court of justice for trying and judging Charles Stuart, &c; the act for subscribing the engagement against a King and House of Peers: the act for declaring the people of England to be a Commonwealth, &c; the act for renouncing the title of Charles Stuart and another for the security of the Protector's person.

The zeal of the two Houses breeding a fear in the Republicans, that the act of indemnity passed in the late Parliament, would not be sufficient for their security, if it was not confirmed by the present, they addressed the King for this confirmation. Upon their petition, the King wrote to both Houses the 2d of June, earnestly recommending to them to pass the bill he had prepared for them. This letter having produced the desired effect, the King came to the Parliament the 8th of July, and passed an act to confirm the act of indemnity passed in the late Parliament; and an act to empower the King to receive from his subjects a free and voluntary contribution for his present occasions; after which, the Parliament proceeded with vigour in finishing the other bills which were before them, and in particular, one for the confiscation of the estates of twenty-one regicides deceased, and to punish three, who were spared as to life, but liable to other penalties. These were the Lord Monson, Sir Henry Mildmay, and Robert Wallop. It was ordered, that they should, on January 30, be drawn upon sledges, with ropes about their necks, to the gallows at Tyburn, and from thence conveyed to the Tower, there to remain prisoners during their lives.

The 30th of July the King came to the Parliament, and gave the royal assent to several acts; among which was an act for the safety and preservation of the King's person and government; which had three remarkable clauses. The first, that if any person should compass, imagine, or intend the King's death, destruction, or bodily harm, to imprison or restrain his royal person, or depose him, or should levy war against him within or without his realm, or stir up any foreign power to invade him, or should declare or express such his wicked intention, by printing, writing, preaching, or malicious and advised speaking, he should, being thereof legally convicted, be adjudged a traitor. The second, that if any man should maliciously or advisedly publish or affirm his Majesty to be heretic or a papist, or that he endeavoured to introduce popery; or should stir up the people to hatred or dislike of his royal person or government; that every such person should be made incapable of any office or employment either in church or state. The third, that if any man should maliciously and advisedly affirm, that the Parliament, begun at Westminster the 3d of November 1640, is yet in being, or that any covenant or engagement since that time imposed upon the people, doth oblige them to endeavour a change of the government either in church or state, or that either, or both Houses of Parliament have a legislative power without his Majesty, that then every such offender, being legally convicted thereof, should incur the penalties of a Præmunire mentioned in the statute of the 16th of Richard II.*

After these acts had received the royal assent, the King thanked the two Houses, and gave them leave to adjourn to the 20th of November.

While these things passed in England, the Parliament in Scotland proceeded with no less vigour. They began with abrogating and annulling the solemn league and covenant of the two kingdoms; and commanded that none of his Majesty's subjects presume, on pretence of any authority whatsoever, to require a renewing, or swearing to the said league and covenant, with-

* The other acts now passed were:—

An act to repeal the law made in the 17th year of Charles I. for the exclusion of the Bishops from the House of Peers. An act to prevent tumults and disorders committed under pretence of preparing, or presenting petitions to the King or Parliament. An act to declare the sole right of the militia to be in the King. An act to impower his Majesty to dispose of the land forces. An act for the regulation and government of his Majesty's navies and forces by sea. An act to impose certain pains and penalties upon the persons or estates of those who had a hand in the horrible murder of the late King. An act for the collection of the great arrears of the duty of excise. An act for providing necessary carriages for the King in all his progresses and removals.

out his Majesty's special warrant and approbation. They next declared the power of the militia to be in the King alone, and the act of the 16th of January, 1647, by which the late King was delivered to the English, to be infamous, disloyal, and contrary to all laws divine and human.

Episcopacy was restored in Scotland, and for that purpose, four Presbyterian ministers, Sharp, Hamilton, Barwell, and Leighton came to London, where, after being ordained deacons and priests, they were consecrated Bishops. All four renounced their first ordination as invalid, and, before their departure for Scotland, obtained from the King a declaration of his pleasure to restore in Scotland the government of the church by Archbishops and Bishops, as it was in the year 1637. Upon this declaration, the Privy-Council of Scotland strictly discharged all ecclesiastical meetings at synods and Presbyteries, &c. till they should be authorized by the Archbishops and Bishops. An act was also passed in the Scotch Parliament to prohibit all meetings and conventicles in private houses for religious worship. By another act the right of patronage was revived. And lastly, by another, it was ordained, that all persons in any public office, should sign a solemn declaration against the national covenant in 1638, and the solemn league and covenant in 1643, in which they declared it unlawful to subjects, upon pretence of Reformation, or any other pretence whatsoever, to enter into leagues and covenants, or take up arms against the King, or those commissioned by him.

The Marquis of Argyle having been sent prisoner to Edinburgh, was there tried, and condemned; and beheaded the 27th of May. Many believed, that revenge, and the avarice of some persons,* who hoped for the confiscation of his estates, were more powerful motives for his sentence, than justice. A few days before his death, the remains of the unfortunate Marquis of Montrose were solemnly interred, and the head of the Marquis of Argyle was set up in the place where his stood.

In England the bodies of Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle, who were shot at Colchester in 1648, were likewise honourably interred.

During the recess of the English Parliament, the cavaliers or royalists made great complaints of the King's ingratitude, for suffering them to perish with hunger, while, by the act of indemnity, he procured his enemies the secure enjoyment of immense riches, acquired by illegal means. The city swarmed with libels on this subject. One, amongst the rest, written by L'Estrange, told the King bold truths with great freedom. But the King thought not proper to take notice of them, believing, the least he could do for the loyal sufferers, was to let them complain, since it was neither in his inclination nor power to reward them.

To suspend these complaints, the city was filled with rumours of projects and plots against the King's person and government.† But many believed this only an artifice to incense the Parliament against the non-conformists in general, and the Presbyterians in particular, and afford a pretence to proceed against them. Thus much is certain, the project of the act of uniformity was now formed.

The Earl of Sandwich, Vice-Admiral, being sent with a fleet to Lisbon, to bring home the new Queen, appeared before Algiers to make a treaty with the Corsairs, or reduce them to reason by force. But he found them so well prepared, that he was obliged to return to Lisbon without any thing done.

The Parliament re-assembling the 20th of November, the King made a speech to both Houses. He desired the Commons, "to think seriously upon settling his revenue, and providing for the expences of his navy; adding, that he asked nothing for himself, but as his interest was united with that of his people." He told them, "that he was willing they should make a full inspection into his disbursements and receipts, but would not have them believe any loose discourses, of giving away eighty thousand pounds in a morning. Tha the had much more reason to be sorry, that he had not rewarded those who had ever faithfully served the King his father and himself, than ashamed of any bounty he had exercised towards any man." After this, he told the two Houses, "that he was sorry to find, the general temper and affections of the nation were not so well composed, as might have been expected, after such signal blessings from God Almighty upon all, and after so great indulgence and condescensions from him towards all interests. That there were still many wicked instruments, who laboured night and day to disturb the public peace, and make all people jealous of each other. That it was worthy of their care and vigilance, to provide proper remedies for diseases of that kind; and if they found new diseases, they must study new remedies. That the difficulties which concerned religion were too hard for him, and therefore he recommended them to their care and deliberation, who could best provide for them."

This speech was as the signal to the persecution, which, soon after, broke out against the non-conformists, and particularly the Presbyterians.

To prepare the way for the designed alteration, solely founded upon rumours of an imaginary conspiracy, the Parliament thought proper to support these rumours, by a petition to the King for a proclamation, to order all officers and disbanded soldiers to depart twenty miles from London.

The same day, the Commons voted the King a supply of twelve hundred thousand pounds for his present occasions.

Then, the Parliament resumed the affair of the nineteen regicides, who had voluntarily surrendered themselves upon the proclamation of the 26th of June, and yet had been sentenced to death. They were asked, what they had to say, why judgment should not be executed upon them? They alledged the King's proclamation, on which they had relied, believing it was his intention to pardon them. But this did not prevent a bill from being brought in for their execution, which was read twice and then dropped, probably, on the King's powerful solicitation in favour of the condemned.

The Earl of Clarendon, at a conference between the two Houses, affirmed positively, that there was a real conspiracy, which had been forming ever since March, to disturb the peace of the kingdom. He named several persons engaged, and gave an exact account of the manner how it was to be executed. The Lords, upon this information, named a committee of twelve of their House, to whom they desired the Commons to add a proportionable number of their members, to examine this horrible design, that the execution of it might be prevented, and the peace of the kingdom secured.

The 20th of December, the King came to Parliament, and passed an act to grant the King twelve hundred and sixty thousand pounds, for his present occasions, to be levied by a monthly tax of seventy thousand pounds, for eighteen months; and an act for regulating corporations.‡

A. D. 1661-2.] Parliament was then adjourned to the 10th of January. The first thing the Lords then did, was to receive the report of the committee, appointed to examine the conspiracy, supposed to have been forming now almost a year, but which had yet produced no effect.

* Particularly of the Earl of Midleton. The Marquis was condemned, as guilty of high treason, upon some letters formerly written by him to Monk, wherein he expressed a great zeal for the republican cause. These Monk basely set down to the Marquis's judges.

† Of which the authors were, Praise-God Barebone, Colonel Salmon, Major Wildman, Alderman Ireton, &c.

‡ This act, which was called the corporation act, ran, that in order to perpetuate the succession in corporations, in the hands of persons well affected to the government, it was ordained, that every mayor, alderman, common-council-man, or any other officer in a corporation should be obliged, besides the common oath of allegiance and supremacy, and a particular declaration against the solemn league and covenant, to take an oath, declaring, "That it was not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take arms against the King; and that he did abhor that traitorous position, of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those commissioned by him.

When it is considered, that after a strict examination of this conspiracy by a numerous committee of both Houses, the whole amounted only to a list of one hundred and forty officers found upon a man, without any other circumstance; and concerning one of the accomplices not named; to secret intelligence that never failed; to a company of men assembled about Huntingdon, in the night, for some unknown reason; that not any of these pretended conspirators, who might have been known by one of their party who had discovered the whole plot, was either punished or prosecuted for this supposed crime; that in short the noise of this conspiracy ceased at once after the uniformity-act had passed, who can help thinking it a mere invention, to give some colour to this act?

The 1st of March, the King sent for the Commons to Whitehall, and reproached them, though civilly, with having done nothing towards the settling of his revenues.

The Commons being returned to their House prepared several bills, and amongst the rest one against the Quakers, for refusing the oaths. This act, and another for the repairing of the streets and high-ways in and about London, were passed by commission.

On the 17th of May, the King gave his assent to the following acts:—

An act for the uniformity of public prayers, and the administration of the Sacraments. An act for the better regulation and ordering of the standing forces of the nation. An act for laying a perpetual and annual tax of two shillings on every chimney-hearth in each house, alms-houses excepted. An act to empower his Majesty to levy for the next ensuing three years, a tax of seventy thousand pounds per month, if necessity shall so require. Moreover, the House of Commons ordered sixty thousand pounds, which exceeded the sum of twelve hundred thousand pounds, granted by a former act, to be distributed among the poor cavaliers, who had been sufferers in the late troubles.*

After the passing of these acts, the Parliament was prorogued to the 18th of February.

The session of Parliament being ended, the court was wholly employed in preparing for the reception of the new Queen, who was daily expected. She left Lisbon the 15th of April, and arrived at Portsmouth the 14th of May, where the King went to receive her.† This marriage had been proposed by the Portuguese ambassador, to General Monk, at the time that he was labouring the King's Restoration. The ambassador's aim, was to procure Portugal a powerful assistance from England, since, by the Pyreneean treaty, the King his master had no farther expectations from France. To prevail with Monk, and, by his means, with the King, he engaged, that the King of Portugal should give, with the Princess his sister, three hundred thousand pounds sterling, the town of Tangier upon the coast of Africa, and the Isle of Bombay in the East-Indies. Monk, pleased with these offers, proposed this marriage to the King immediately after his arrival. The King approved of it, and accordingly it was concluded in the year 1661.‡ Some pretend, that Chancellor Hyde strenuously opposed the marriage, upon an information, that the Princess of Portugal, by some natural infirmity, was incapable of having children, but that the King took this for an artifice of the court of Spain to prevent a marriage, which could not but prove prejudicial to their great designs upon Portugal. Before the consummation of the marriage, the King, in a treaty with Portugal, engaged to assist that kingdom against Spain, and in the nineteenth article, obliged himself never to restore Dunkirk to that crown.

When this marriage was completed, the Queen-mother arrived in England, with design, as it seemed, to spend there the residue of her days. The King assigned Somerset-house for her residence; but she did not, it seems, find the satisfaction she expected, as after three years she returned to France.

The most considerable transaction at the English court, in the remaining part of this year, was the sale of Dunkirk; a measure which has not had the good fortune to be justified by any party; but, on the contrary, is often considered as one of the greatest mistakes if not blemishes, of Charles's reign. By the treaty with Portugal it was stipulated that Dunkirk should never be yielded to the Spaniards. France was therefore the only purchaser that remained. D'Estrades was invited over by a letter from the Chancellor himself in order to conclude the bargain. Nine hundred thousand pounds were demanded. One hundred thousand were offered. The English by degrees lowered their demand: the French raised their offer: and the bargain was concluded at 400,000 pounds. The artillery and stores were valued at a fifth of the sum. The importance of this sale was not, at any time, sufficiently known, either abroad or at home. The French monarch himself, so fond of acquisitions, and so good a judge of his own interests, thought that he had made a hard bargain; and this sum, in appearance so small, was the utmost which he would allow his ambassador to offer. It appears however from many of D'Estrades' letters, particularly that of the 21st of August, 1661, that the King might have transferred Dunkirk to the Parliament, who would not have refused to bear the charges of it, but were unwilling to give money to the King for that purpose. The King, on the other hand, was jealous lest the Parliament should acquire any separate dominion or authority in a branch of administration which seemed so little to belong to them: a proof that the government was not yet settled into that composure and mutual confidence which are absolutely requisite for conducting it.§

While this negotiation employed the King and his first minister, three of the late King's Judges, who had found means to escape out of the kingdom, were publicly executed at Tyburn. They had, after wandering through Low and High Germany, settled for some time at Hanau under borrowed names, and returned in the spring to Delft in Holland, having appointed their wives to meet them there, in order to learn the state of affairs in England, and what hopes were left for them; but Sir George Downing, the King's resident at the Hague, and formerly of their party, having intercepted their

* By the act of uniformity, every minister was obliged, on pain of losing all his ecclesiastical preferments, to conform to the worship of the church of England, according to the new book of Common Prayer, before the feast of St. Bartholomew next, from whence it was called the Bartholomew act. Every minister was also obliged to sign the following declaration. "I do here declare my unfeigned assent and consent to all and every thing contained and prescribed in and by the book intituled the Book of Common Prayer," &c. Besides this, every person was obliged to sign a declaration contained in the militia act, in which declaration he was not only to promise to conform to the liturgy of the church of England, but likewise to renounce the solemn league and covenant, declaring it to be an unlawful oath, and imposed upon the subjects of this realm against the known laws and liberties of the kingdom The penalties annexed to this act were many, particularly.——"No person should be capable of any benefice, or presume to consecrate and administer the holy sacrament of the Lord's supper, before he be ordained priest by episcopal ordination, upon pain to forfeit for every offence the sum of one hundred pounds."

† Queen Catherine was born November 14, 1638.

‡ The Spanish ambassador opposed this marriage to the utmost of his power. He proposed to the King a Protestant Princess, namely, either the Princess of Denmark, or of Saxony, or of Orange. But, as Bishop Burnet observes, King Charles pretended a contempt of the Germans, and of the northern crowns. France had no sister. Spain had only two infantas; the eldest whereof was married to the King of France, and the second was to go to Vienna. So the house of Portugal only remained to furnish the King a wife.——France strenuously promoted this marriage, and, to succeed the better, offered the Earl of Clarendon a pension of ten thousand pounds a year; but the Earl rejected that offer with indignation.

§ Charles had secretly received the sum of 200,000 crowns from France for the support of Portugal; but the forces sent over to that country, and the fleets maintained in order to defend it, had already cost the King that sum; and together with it nearly double the money which had been paid as the queen's portion. The time fixed for the payment of his sister's portion to the Duke of Orleans was approaching. Tangier a fortress from which great benefit was expected, had become an additional burthen to the crown; and Rutherford, who now commanded in Dunkirk, had increased the charge of that garrison to a hundred and twenty thousand pounds a year. These considerations had such influence, not only on the King, but even on Clarendon, that this uncorrupt minister was the most forward to advise accepting a sum of money in lieu of a place which he thought the King, from the narrow state of his revenue, was no longer able to retain.

letters, obtained the consent of the States to seize and put them on board an English ship, which brought them to England, where they were executed.* The names of these three regicides were Corbet, Okey, and Berkstead.

The execution was followed with the trials and condemnation of Sir Harry Vane and General Lambert, who had been particularly excepted in the act of pardon, though they were not amongst the King's Judges, because they were considered as the chief authors of the troubles. Vane had been confined, shortly after the King's arrival, on a bare suspicion of framing some plot against the government. But though he was excepted in the act of indemnity, he had, by means of his friends, found so much favour from the same House of Commons, who had excepted him, that they petitioned the King, jointly with the Peers, that he might not suffer death, which was granted by the King. He was therefore kept in prison without being tried, till the time we are speaking of. But this second Parliament being composed of men of a different character from the first, the Commons addressed the King to bring him, as well as Lambert, to his trial. In vain did he alledge in his defence the petition of the first Parliament, and many other reasons; he was sentenced to die as a traitor. Lambert was also tried and condemned, but was reprieved at the bar, just as he was going to receive sentence. He was confined in the Isle of Guernsey, where he lived a prisoner thirty-six years, and died a Catholic. Sir Henry Vane met not with the same favour from the King. This, it is pretended, was owing to his insolent behaviour at his trial. But many believed him a sacrifice to the manes of the Earl of Strafford, to whose death he had greatly contributed. His indiscretion and insolence, as well at his trial as his execution, have been extremely exaggerated.†

St. Bartholomew's day being come,‡ on which the act of Uniformity was to take place, two thousand Presbyterian ministers chose rather to quit their livings, than to submit to the conditions of this act. It was expected, that a division would have happened amongst them, and that a great number would have chosen rather to conform to the church of England, than see themselves reduced to beggary. It was not therefore without extreme surprise, that they were all seen to stand out, not so much as one suffering himself to be tempted.

We have already mentioned the corporation act, made to prevent disaffected persons from being admitted into offices. For the better executing the act, the Parliament appointed commissioners, who were employed all this year in visiting corporations, and inspecting the conduct of the members. The design of this act was to divest of all credit, every person not entirely devoted to the King and the church of England. This power was exercised with all imaginable rigour: so that the corporations had not one member left, who was not of the same principles with the House of Commons. Moreover, the walls of Gloucester, Coventry, Northampton, Leicester, and Taunton were, by order of these commissioners, demolished, because these towns had distinguished themselves by their fidelity to the Parliament.

About the end of the year a conspiracy was discovered, formed by the fifth-monarchy-men, and upon the informations of some of the accomplices, six were executed. Nevertheless, many believed, this was only an artifice to excuse the severity practised against the nonconformists.

After the Earl of Sandwich left Lisbon, to conduct the Queen into England, Vice-Admiral Lawson sailed with a squadron to Algiers, and forced the Algerines to a peace with England. Shortly after, the King declared Tangier a free port, and invested it with great privileges.

The Presbyterians had behaved in a manner which gave no just cause of complaint against them, and the King had made them a positive promise, either that he would never consent to the Uniformity act, or procure them a particular exemption; but he performed neither, his aim having been only to keep them united, by giving them hopes of his protection. After this act was passed, he continued to feed their expectations, and hence it was, that they addressed the King and council, for a dispensation from the penalties annexed to the act of Uniformity. This petition would doubtless have been rejected, if the King had not signified to the council the obligation he was under to grant their request. Some time after, he published a declaration, dated the 26th of December last, which appeared not till the beginning of January, 1662-3. In this declaration, after an assurance of his firm adherence to the act of Uniformity, he said however, that for the sake of others, he was willing to dispense with some matters in it.

The King meant to procure some advantages for the Presbyterians, in order to procure the same for the Papists. This was his scheme, and as it was directly contrary to the Earl of Clarendon's principles, whose credit, for that reason, began now to decline. The King had plainly shewn, he had not the same affection for him, by obliging his intimate friend Secretary Nicholas, worn out with age, to resign his post to the Chancellor's professed enemy, Sir Henry Bennet, afterwards Earl of Arlington. On the other hand, though the King affected a great zeal for the Protestant religion, the choice of Bennet, to be Secretary of State, showed his inclination for the Roman Catholic, as Bennet was strongly suspected of being a papist in his heart, and known for their protector.

The Parliament meeting the 18th of February, the King made a speech to both Houses, in which he confined himself to one single point, namely, his declaration concerning the act of Uniformity.

This speech, with the declaration of the 26th of December, alarmed the House of Commons. It may almost be affirmed, that whatever they had done in favour of the King, was only to procure his assent to the act of Uniformity, yet, they saw him not only dispense with this act, but even desire a power to dispense with it, that is, to set it aside as often as he pleased. They found in the King's demand, two articles equally opposite to their principles, namely, indulgence for the Presbyterians, and indulgence for the Catholics. Wherefore, they presented an expostulatory address to the King, against granting any indulgence to such persons as presumed to dissent from the act of Uniformity, and the religion established. This address shewed to the King, it would be in vain to endeavour to obtain from the Parliament a power of dispensing with the Uniformity act. He answered in writing, about three weeks after, that he was unwilling to reply to their reasons, though he found he had been misunderstood, but renewed his thanks for their declaration to assist him against any person, that should presume to disturb the peace of the kingdom.

* It had been usual for the States to grant these warrants; though, at the same time, they have ever been careful secretly to advertise the persons, that they might be enabled to make their escape. This precaution was eluded by the vigilance and dispatch of Downing. He quickly seized the criminals, hurried them on board a frigate which lay off the coast, and sent them to England. These three men behaved with more moderation and submission, than any of the other regicides who had suffered. Okey in particular, at the place of execution, prayed for the King, and expressed his intention, had he lived, of submitting peaceably to the established government. He had risen during the wars from being a chandler in London to a high rank in the army; and in all his conduct appeared to be a man of humanity and honour. In consideration of his good character and of his dutiful behaviour, his body was given to his friends to be buried.

† Though timid by nature, the persuasion of a just cause supported him against the terror of death; while his enthusiasm, excited by the prospect of glory, embellished the conclusion of a life, which, through the whole course of it, had been so much disfigured by the prevalence of that principle (14th June.) Lest pity for a courageous sufferer should make impression on the populace, drummers were placed under the scaffold, whose noise, as he began to launch out in reflections on the government, drowned his voice, and admonished him to temper the ardour of his zeal. He was not astonished at this unexpected incident. In all his behaviour, there appeared a firm and animated intrepidity; and he considered death, but as a passage to that eternal felicity, which he believed to be prepared for him.

‡ The Presbyterians remembered, what a St. Bartholomew's day had been held at Paris ninety years before, which was the day of that massacre, and did not stick to compare the one with the other. ——There was a great debate in council a little before St. Bartholomew's day, whether the act of Uniformity should be punctually executed or not. Some moved to have the execution of it delayed till the next session of Parliament. Others were for executing it in the main, that is, to let some eminent men preach in their churches, till they should die, and to put curates to read the common prayer. The Earl of Manchester laid all these things before the King with much zeal. Sheldon, on the other hand, pressed the execution of the law.

As in the King's speech and declaration, there were two articles which gave an alarm to the Parliament, the one relating to the non-conformists in general, the other concerning the papists in particular, the Commons, after acting against the former, resolved also to proceed against the latter. To this end, they obtained the concurrence of the Lords, for an address to be jointly presented to the King, wherein both Houses said, "That his Majesty's lenity towards the papists, had drawn into the kingdom a great number of Romish priests and jesuits: they were therefore humble suitors to him, to issue out a proclamation to command all jesuits, and all English, Irish, and Scottish popish priests, and all such other priests as have taken orders from the see of Rome, or by authority thereof, (except such foreign jesuits or priests, as by contract of marriage are to attend the persons of either of the Queens, or by the law of nations to attend foreign ambassadors) to depart this kingdom by a day, under pain of having the penalties of the law inflicted upon them." The King answered in writing: "That he was not a little troubled, that his lenity and condescension towards many of the popish persuasion (which were but natural effects of his generosity and good nature, after having lived so many years in the dominions of Roman Catholic Princes; and out of a just memory of what many of them have done and suffered in the service of his father and himself) had been made so ill use of, and so ill deserved, that the resort of jesuits and priests into this kingdom, had been thereby increased, with which his Majesty was and is highly offended. But that he would issue a proclamation as he was desired, and take care it should be more effectual than any proclamation of that kind had ever been."

This proclamation was accordingly published, but no better observed than all those published for the same purpose, since the beginning of the reign of James I.

This affair being ended, the Commons proceeded to examine the state of the King's ordinary revenue, and to think of means to raise it to twelve hundred thousand pounds, according to their promise. But as this affair required a long discussion, the King, who designed an immediate prorogation of the Parliament, thought proper to make an attempt for a speedy and extraordinary supply from the Commons, till his revenues should be settled. For this purpose, he sent for them to the Banquetting-house, and in a speech, the most flattering, pathetic and affectionate, he had ever yet made, demanded a present supply of money, without which he assured them it was impossible to struggle with the difficulties, he was pressed with. He offered to show, that the twelve hundred thousand pounds formerly granted him, had been, to the last penny, disposed of for the public service. The Commons, moved with the King's great affection for his people, and his ardent zeal for the Protestant religion, granted him four entire subsidies, and the clergy in convocation, following their example, gave him the same.

The Chancellor's credit daily declined. If his enemies had met with encouragement from the King, he would have been already disgraced, but his services, affection, and fidelity, as well during the King's exile, as since his restoration, could not easily be forgotten. Wherefore he was continued, not only in his post, but in some degree of favour, which made the papists fear, he would at last recover his credit, and break all their measures. This probably engaged the Earl of Bristol, a professed papist, to endeavour utterly to ruin the Chancellor, by impeaching him, before the Lords, of high-treason, believing doubtless, the King would not be displeased to see him fall by this means, without his having any hand in it. The articles, however, were unanimously rejected, as improbable, and even contradictory.*

In this session, the Parliament granted the Duke of York the revenues of the Post-office, (worth upwards of 20,000l. a year) and wine-licenses. These revenues, which afterwards considerably increased, enabled the Duke of York to keep a separate court, and live independent of his brother.

The 27th of July, the King gave his assent to the subsidy-act and some others, after which he prorogued the Parliament to the 16th of March the following year 1663-4.

Shortly after, the King and Queen made a progress into the west, where they were received with great pomp and magnificence, particularly at Oxford. They returned to London in October.

While the King was upon his progress, a conspiracy was discovered, carried on by the old Republicans, and Independents, to restore the commonwealth. It is pretended, they were to seize several towns, particularly in the north, where they believed themselves strongest, and then raise a general insurrection. But being discovered by one of the accomplices, many were apprehended, and one-and-twenty convicted, and executed the January following.

A. D. 1663-4.] The Parliament meeting the 16th of March, the King, in a speech to both Houses, demanded a repeal of the triennial act made in 1641. To come to this demand, he enlarged on the late conspiracy, which he said was still on foot, and that there were men, who, on pretence that this Parliament was at an end, by some clause in the triennial bill, fancied they might assemble themselves and chuse new members. He desired the two Houses not to leave an act in being, which passed in a time very uncareful for the dignity of the crown, or security of the people. Lastly, he told them, he loved Parliaments: that never King was so much beholden to them as himself, nor did he believe the crown could ever be happy without frequent Parliaments: but he would never suffer a Parliament to come together by the means prescribed by that bill. He then told them, that the four subsidies granted the last session, had fallen very short of what he expected, or they intended: that the revenues of the excise, and tonnage and poundage, were greatly diminished by the frauds of brewers and merchants, and the tax upon chimnies declined, the last half year having brought in less than the former. He therefore prayed them to let him have the collecting of this tax by his own officers.

The Commons returning to their own House, proceeded immediately upon a bill to repeal the triennial act, and made another in its room, namely, that the sitting of Parliaments should not be discontinued above three years at most. This bill being ready, and passed by the Lords, the King came to their House the 5th of April, and gave it the royal assent.

The King had sometime since resolved upon a war with Holland; but it is difficult to know the true motive of this resolution. The 27th of April, 1662, the States-General of the United Provinces made a treaty with the King of France, by which both parties engaged to assist each other, in case of any attack upon either in Europe. The same year they made a like treaty of league and alliance with the King of England. This had relation to another made in 1659, between England and the States, before the King's Restoration,

* According to some writers, the Earl of Bristol's friendship with Clarendon, which had subsisted with great intimacy during their exile and the distresses of the royal party, had been considerably impaired since the restoration, by the Chancellor's refusing his assent to some grants, which Bristol had applied for to a court lady; and a little after, the latter nobleman, agreeably to the impetuosity and indiscretion of his temper, broke out against the minister in the most outrageous manner. He even entered a charge of treason against him before the House of Peers; but had concerted his measures so imprudently, that the judges, when consulted, declared, that neither for its matter nor its form, could the charge be legally received. The articles indeed resembled more the incoherent altercations of a passionate enemy, than a serious accusation, fit to be discussed by a court of judicature; and Bristol himself was so ashamed of his conduct and defeat, that he absconded during some time. Notwithstanding his fine talents, his eloquence, his spirit, and his courage, he could never regain the character which he lost by this hasty and precipitate measure.

and seemed to be renewed only to remove the defect of that of 1659, made on the part of England by an unlawful authority. However, it happened, in the interval between the two treaties, that the Dutch had sunk or taken in the Indies two English ships, called the Bonadventure and the Good-Hope, which occasioned a misunderstanding between the two nations. The English pretended, these two ships were attacked without any just cause, and the Hollanders maintained the contrary. In the treaty of 1602, the affair of these two ships was again debated; but as their value was inconsiderable, it was not thought proper to delay a treaty advantageous to both nations. It was therefore agreed, that the English should be allowed to prosecute the process commenced on account of these ships, and the States deposited fourscore thousand florins by way of security to pay the full value in case the affair was decided against them. Some time after, another dispute arose upon the same subject, and this was, the King pretended, that the States-General were judges of this process, to which the States replied, that it belonged to the cognizance of the Admiralty of Amsterdam, who alone had a right to decide it. The affair remained in this state till April this year, 1664, when the Commons, after an enquiry into the obstructions of the trade of the nation, voted, and obtained the concurrence of the Lords to their vote, "That the wrongs, dishonours, and indignities done to his Majesty by the subjects of the United Provinces in India, Africa, and elsewhere; and the damages done by them to the English merchants, are the greatest obstructions of the trade of England. That the same be speedily presented to his Majesty, and he be moved to take some effectual course for redress of these injuries, and all other of the like nature, and for prevention of the like for the future. And in prosecution thereof, they will with their lives and fortunes assist his Majesty, against all oppositions whatsoever." In pursuance of this resolution, the two Houses presented, the same day, an address to the King, to which, on the morrow, they received this answer in writing. "That he was pleased with their zeal for the advancement of trade, and the removal of all obstructions which might hinder the same; being convinced, that nothing would more contribute to the honour of the nation, and the prosperity of his people. That he would examine the particular complaints which had been represented to his Parliament, and order his minister in Holland to demand speedy reparation, and in case of a denial, he relied on their promise and declaration to stand by him."

Since the treaty of 1662, the States had great cause of complaint against the Algerines, notwithstanding the peace concluded with them in 1661. England was no less concerned than the States in the depredations committed by the Algerines upon all sorts of ships, and therefore the States desired the King of England to join a squadron of his ships with a fleet they were equipping, to oblige the Algerines to a more exact observation of the peace. The King answered, he would rather act separately.

After this answer, the States sent Ruyter into the Mediterranean, with a squadron of twelve ships, and the King sent thither a fleet of twenty sail, under the command of Lawson. These two fleets departed in May this year, and about the same time the Duke of York, as Governor of the Royal African company, sent Vice-Admiral Holmes to Cape Verd, with a squadron of fourteen men of war, to take all possible advantages against the Dutch East-India Company. Lawson meeting Ruyter in the Mediterranean, was saluted by the Dutch Admiral, but returned not the compliment, contrary to what had been stipulated in the treaty of 1662.

In the months of August and September, Holmes made himself master of Fort St. Andrews, and most other places belonging to the Dutch in the neighbourhood of Cape Verd, and, after taking the fort built on the Cape itself, he gave it the name of York. He erected a fort in the mouth of the river Gambia, and then sailing for Guinea, seized all the forts the Dutch had on that coast, except Fort Achin and Fort St. George de Mina. After this, he returned to England. If it be considered, that Holmes sailed from England in May, or, at the latest, in June; that some time was required to equip this fleet; and that the Parliament's address was presented to the King but the 27th of April, it will be easily perceived, that the war was resolved in England before any complaints of depredations committed by the Dutch had been represented to the Parliament, and that these complaints were only pretences for the war.*

But what clearly shews, the King, since the Restoration, had ever intended this war, is, his conduct, whilst the treaty between France and the States was negociating at Paris: for he did his utmost to obstruct it. The principal condition of this treaty consisted in a reciprocal guarantee of what the two parties possessed, or should afterwards lawfully acquire. In this general clause, the States comprehended the article of the fishery, as an essential article, and the King of France made no objection to it. But Charles opposed it, and endeavoured to hinder the King of France from agreeing to that article. Lewis, in complaisance to Charles, sought expedients to satisfy him, by confining himself to a general guarantee, which should include all without exception. But the States refused to conclude the treaty, unless the article of the fishery was expressly inserted in the guarantee. Charles finding, the King of France would at last consent, ordered Count d'Estrades, the French Ambassador at London, to be told, that he had resolved to oblige the ships of all nations without exception to strike to his. But perceiving, the King of France, instead of being intimidated by this menace, answered it in a high strain, he let him know, he would desist from this pretension as to him, provided he would desist from the guarantee of the fishery in favour of the Dutch. But Lewis, being sensible, the Dutch would never recede from that particular clause, agreed to it at last, and the treaty was concluded.

Hence it appears, that Charles was then seeking a quarrel with the Dutch, on the article of the fishery. But finding, France had expressly engaged to the gaurantee of it, he himself concluded, that very year, a treaty of alliance with the Dutch, in expectation of some other occasion to begin a war with them.

The 17th of May, the King coming to the Parliament, the Speaker presented the bills which were ready, and amongst the rest, one for empowering the King to levy the chimney-money by his own officers, as he had desired. This bill was afterwards the cause of great vexations, complaints, and murmurs, which obliged King William III. to drop this tax, though, as it was levied in the reigns of Charles II. and James II. it amounted to above two hundred and fifty-six thousand pounds a year. By the act of Uniformity, every clergyman, who should officiate without being properly qualified, was punishable by fine and imprisonment: but this security not being thought sufficient for the church, it was now enacted, that wherever five persons above those of the same household should assemble in a religious congregation, every one of them was liable, for the first offence, to be imprisoned three months, or pay five pounds; for the second, to be imprisoned six months, or pay ten pounds; and for the third, to be transported seven years, or pay a hundred pounds.

After passing these acts, the King prorogued the Parliament to August, signifying, that it should not meet till November, unless a certain affair obliged him to assemble it sooner. This affair was the Dutch war. Downing presented to the States a memorial, drawn in very high terms, wherein he demanded reparation for the damages done to the English, which, by his calculation, amounted to seven or eight hundred thousand pounds sterling. The King was bent on a war at any fate, whilst the States used all possible endeavours to avoid it. Nevertheless, not judging it proper to treat with Downing, who behaved to them with great haughtiness, they said, in answer to his memorial, that they would send an ambassador to the King. Accordingly, they dispatched Van Goch, who had his first audience of the King the 25th of June. While Downing at the Hague, and Van Goch at London, fruitlessly presented memorials upon memorials, the King was diligently equipping his fleet. As he wanted money, he borrowed one hundred thousand pounds of the city of London, who willingly lent him that sum, in the belief, that he intended only the good of the English trade, by the destruction of that of Holland. The States, on their side, prepared for their defence, but not with equal vigour. Their design was to gain time, in hopes, their fleets of merchantmen would return before the declaration of war; and the King's intention was to intercept those fleets before the publishing of any declaration. Sending his fleet to sea under the command of the Duke of York, as High-Admiral, it met, in November, with the Dutch Bourdeaux fleet, homeward bound, laden with wine and brandy, and took one hundred and thirty ships, which were brought into England, and condemned for lawful prizes, though no war had been proclaimed. Some authors endeavour to palliate this action, by remarking, that about the same time, Ruyter dispossessed the English of their factories at Cape Verd, and on the coast of Guinea. But, they take no notice, that these factories were mere usurpations of the English, who had the same year dispossessed the Dutch of them. In point of fact, Ruyter did not recover the forts at Cape Verd, and on the coast of Guinea, till the following year 1665.

* King Charles II. the next year after his restoration, viz. 1661, sent Sir Robert Holmes, with a squadron of men of war, and some soldiers, to America, with which he reduced New York, and all that which the Dutch had taken from the English in Long-Island. And from thence, Sir Robert Holmes sailed to Africa, and took Cape Verd, and some other places, where the Dutch had factories.

Meantime, the King of France, apprehending he should at last be involved in this war by assisting the States, pursuant to the treaty of 1662, believed it incumbent upon him to use some endeavours to prevent it, and to that end offered his mediation to the two parties. The States willingly accepted it, but it was rejected by Charles. He had now sent Sir Richard Fanshaw to Spain, and the Lord Holles to France, to endeavour to engage these two crowns in a war with the Dutch. But he succeeded neither at Paris, nor Madrid.*

The Parliament meeting the 24th of November, after two prorogations, the King made a speech to both Houses, and found them so well disposed in his favour, that they sent their thanks to the city of London for their loan to the King. A few days after, the Commons voted to the King a supply of two millions five hundred thousand pounds, towards the maintenance of a war so necessary to the State; and, in less than three weeks, ways and means were found for raising that sum in three years; after which both Houses adjourned to the 12th of January.

Immediately after, the King published a declaration, by which General Reprisals were granted against the ships, goods, and subjects of the States-General; and the court of Admiralty was ordered to condemn them as prizes, according to the course of Admiralty, and law of nations.

When the States were informed of the hostilities committed by Holmes at Cape Verd and in Guinea, they sent an express to Ruyter, to order him to repass the Streights, and sail towards these coasts, to recover what the Dutch West-India Company had lost. Ruyter executed this order with great vigour, and retook most of the forts seized by the English. He likewise took several of their ships. This news reached London the beginning of February, and furnished the King with a new pretence for the declaration of war, which was published in a few days.

This declaration was founded upon the numberless injuries and unspeakable damages, the English had suffered from the Dutch, without being able to obtain the least reparation. The King added, that the ships belonging to the Dutch were not detained by him, till he found that Ruyter was ordered not only to abandon the consortship against the Algerines, to which he had been invited by the States, but also to use all acts of depredation against his subjects in Africa. He therefore declared to all the world, that the Dutch were the aggressors, and ought in justice to be so looked upon by all men. This declaration was approved by twenty-two Privy-Counsellors only, the Earls of Southampton and Clarendon having been either unable, or unwilling, to be present when it was resolved.

Parliament met on the 12th of January. The King came down the 2d of March, and after passing some bills, he prorogued the Parliament to the 21st of June. Afterwards, he continued the prorogation to the 1st of August, and then to the 9th of October.

In this session the clergy voluntarily resigned their right of taxing themselves in convocation, and from this time have been taxed in common with the people in Parliament. This has made convocations less necessary to the King, and consequently less considerable in themselves.

A. D. 1665.] The Duke of York, in the end of March, repaired to the fleet which he was to command, consisting of one hundred and seven men of war, and fourteen fire-ships; but as it was not yet ready, he could not sail till May.

Some time since, the States, perceiving a war unavoidable, had pressed the King of France to declare against England, pursuant to the treaty of 1662, but had not yet prevailed. Charles on his side solicited him to abandon the States, and allured him with very tempting advantages. Lewis was not a little embarrassed. The course therefore which he took on this occasion, was to gain time, one while by cavilling at the terms of the treaty of 1662, another while, by giving hopes to the States of his declaring against England, and lastly, by a splendid embassy to London, with the Duke of Verneuil at the head of it, to mediate a peace between England and Holland.

Whilst his ambassadors were at London, he could say, that the hope of a reconciliation was not entirely desperate. He managed so artfully, that he kept them there till the end of the year 1665, declared not against England till January 1666, and his declaration was of little service to the States.

The Duke of York sailed with the English fleet in May, and before the Dutch could be ready, alarmed the coasts of Holland. He continued a fortnight near the Texel, to prevent the fleet of Holland from joining that of Zealand, in which he could not fail of success. In the mean time, he took several Dutch homeward bound ships, who had not been informed of the war. However, as the war was not only made to hinder this junction, the Duke at last sailed away with design to meet Ruyter, who was returning to Holland by order of the States. But finding, his provisions were consumed upon an uncertain expectation, he retired with the fleet to Harwich, contenting himself with sending some frigates to cruise in the Channel, and bring him intelligence of the enemy.

Meanwhile, the Holland and Zealand squadrons joined, and formed a fleet of one hundred and twenty-one men of war, besides fire ships, under the command of Obdam de Wassenaer. He had under him Cortenaer, Vice Admiral of the Maese; Evertzen, Vice Admiral of Zealand; and Cornelius Tromp, son of the famous Martin Tromp. The Rear-Admirals and Captains

* Some say, this war ought to be ascribed to the Duke of York's ambition, who was impatient to distinguish himself, by commanding, as Lord High Admiral, the King his brother's fleet. Others believe, the King finding his coffers empty, notwithstanding all the money given him by Parliament, and that raised by the sale of Dunkirk, engaged by his intrigues the Parliament to propose this war to him, to have a pretence of demanding extraordinary supplies, which should not be all expended in the war. There are others who believe, the King, the Parliament, the city of London, found this war absolutely necessary to humble the maritime power of the Dutch, who aimed to engross the whole commerce of Europe, as they had already done that of the Indies: that though the causes of the war were never fully made known, every one understood, it was a war occasioned by the jealousy of trade. Lastly, there are who suspect, that the project to introduce Popery into England being now formed, the execution of it was only suspended till the Dutch were rendered unable to succour the English Protestants, since it was only from them that they could receive assistance.

were very far from answering to their superiors in capacity, more care having been taken to fill these posts with the relations and friends of those, whom the Pensionary wanted to preserve his credit, than with experienced officers. Though de Wit managed affairs as he pleased, he had for enemies all the party of the House of Orange, who were spies upon his conduct, and misrepresented all his proceedings, in order to ruin him. The Pensionary was not ignorant of it, and therefore believed, the only way to secure himself, and preserve his authority, was to hazard a sea engagement. Success would disarm the malice of his enemies, and the loss of a battle would of course oblige the French to execute the treaty of 1662, and silence the complaints and murmurs of the Orange party, who industriously published, that Lewis only amused the States. Agreeably to this resolution, which the Pensionary caused the States to approve, an order was sent to Obdam, to go in quest of the enemy. He obeyed, and came in sight of them the 1st of June, not far from Harwich. But the wind being southerly, and the next morning south-west, he retired to the mouth of the Maese. He acquainted the States by an express, with the reason of his retreat, and that he did not think proper to attack the English while they had the advantage of the wind. But he received still more positive orders to fight let the wind be as it would, on peril of answering it with his head. After so express an order, there being no way to recede, he weighed anchor at break of day, and within an hour discovered the English fleet divided into three squadrons. The first, under the red flag, was commanded by the Duke of York, assisted by Penn and Lawson. The second being the white squadron, was conducted by Prince Rupert, assisted by Minnes and Sampson. The third, which was the blue squadron, was commanded by the Earl of Sandwich, who had with him Cuttings, and Sir George Ascough. The result of the ensuing fight, on the 3d of June, was, that the Dutch fleet was overthrown, chiefly by the ill conduct of several Captains who were wanting in their duty; by the death of Obdam, who with his ship and all his men were blown up; by the loss of Cortenaer, who was killed upon the deck after hoisting the Admiral-flag; and by many other causes scarcely intelligible but to those who are versed in sea-affairs. The Dutch lost nineteen ships burnt and sunk, with about six thousand men.* On the English side, the loss was only of four ships, and about fifteen hundred men, among whom were Charles Berkley, Earl of Falmouth; Admiral Sampson, James Ley, Earl of Marlborough; and Vice-Admiral Lawson, who died shortly after of his wounds.† The remains of the Dutch fleet retired to the Maese or the Texel, and were pursued all the next day, being Sunday, though, according to some, the Duke of York did not, in this pursuit, discover the same ardour he had shown in the battle.‡

The Duke of York seeing, it was in vain to continue his pursuit, retired to the coasts of England, and repaired to Whitehall to receive the acclamations of the court and city of London. The King appointed a day of thanksgiving throughout the kingdom for this victory, and several medals were struck in honour of the victorious Duke of York.

Shortly after, the Queen-mother having resolved to pass the residue of her days in France, the King and the Duke of York attended her in the Catherine Yacht to the Nore, and there took their last leave of her.

However glorious the first sea-fight of the Duke of York might be, the King and council did not think it proper he should venture his person in a second engagement. Therefore, the command of the fleet was given to Edward Montague, Earl of Sandwich, who used his utmost endeavours to prepare it for the sea as soon as possible, in order to intercept that of the States, which was reparing with all possible diligence. Besides, the States, having appointed Ruyter to succeed Obdam, ordered him to return immediately with the fleet, consisting of seventeen men of war. The diligence used by the States to repair their fleet, was not so much to be revenged of the English, as to secure their merchant-men homeward bound from Smyrna and the East-Indies. The English, on their side, were less desirous to fight than to seize the riches which those fleets were bringing to Holland.

The Dutch Smyrna-fleet, and several East-India ships not daring to enter the Channel, retired to the port of Berghen in Norway, waiting for Ruyter to convoy them to Holland. The King of Denmark, discoursing one day with Sir Gilbert Talbot, the English Envoy, made great complaints of the Dutch, who, he said, had drawn the Swedish war on him, that he might be forced to have recourse to them for supplies of money and ships, and deliver to them the customs of Norway and the Sound for their security. Upon this the Envoy told him, he had now a good opportunity of being revenged, by the seizure of their ships at Berghen, worth many millions. But the King answering, he wanted strength to execute such a design, the Envoy told him, he doubted not but the King of England would lend him his ships, provided he was assured of equally partaking of the spoil; to which the King of Denmark consented. The King of England was pleased with Talbot's project, and sent orders to the Earl of Sandwich to sail immediately and seize the Dutch ships at Berghen. The Admiral readily obeyed, though he had received no intimation of the agreement between the two Kings.

Several accidents ruined this affair. The Governor of Berghen, who was to receive orders from the Vice-roy of Norway, was not informed soon enough. On the other hand, Talbot's express, sent from Copenhagen to the English fleet, was taken by the Dutch. In fine, the Earl of Sandwich, hearing, Ruyter was shortly expected, and being desirous to perform the deed before his arrival, detached the squadron commanded by Sir Thomas Tyddeman, who attacked the Dutch with great resolution. But they had now had time to put themselves in a posture of defence. On the other hand, the Governor of Berghen, who had not received any particular directions how to behave, seeing this open hostility, and observing that the shot from the English damaged the town, fired upon them from the citadel. In a word, this squadron was almost ruined, and obliged to return to the fleet. The next day, the 4th of August, orders came to the Governor of Berghen, but it was too late. It appeared, the King was not pleased with the Earl of Sandwich's conduct, since, instead of continuing him in the command of the fleet, he sent him Ambassador to the court of Spain.

Rupert, arriving in Holland with many English prizes, took the oath to the States as Vice-Admiral-General, after which he took the command of the fleet, consisting of ninety-three ships well equipped. But though he bore the title of Admiral, three commissioners attended him; namely, De-Wit the Pensionary, Huygens, and Borreel, who had properly the command. The grand design of these commissioners was to meet the India fleet, which was to sail round Ireland, to avoid entering into the Channel. But the wind was so contrary,

* Our Historians say, that we lost but one ship; and that we took eighteen Dutch men of war, and sunk and fired about fourteen more. We also took two thousand and sixty-three prisoners, whereof sixteen were Captains.

† Also the Lord Muskerry, and Mr. Boyle, the Earl of Burlington's second son: these two, with the Lord Falmouth, were killed with the same cannon ball, just by the Duke of York, and so near him, that he was sprinkled with their blood and brains. The Earl of Portland was likewise killed.

‡ King James, in his memoirs, gives an account of this affair different from what we meet with in any historian. He says, that while he was asleep, Brounker brought orders to Sir John Harman, Captain of the ship, to slacken sail. Sir John remonstrated, but obeyed. After some time, finding that his falling back was likely to produce confusion in the fleet, he hoisted the sail as before: so that the Prince coming soon after on the quarter-deck, and finding all things as he left them, knew nothing of what had passed during his repose. Nobody gave him the least intimation of it. It was long after, that he heard of it by a kind of accident; and he intended to have punished Brounker by martial law; but just about that time, the House of Commons took up the question and impeached him, which made it impossible for the Duke to punish him, otherwise than by dismissing him his service. Brounker, before the House, never pretended that he had received any orders from the Duke.

trary, that the fleet would not have got soon enough out of the Texel, if the Pensionary, who understood sea-affairs very well, had not by sounding it himself all over very carefully, found more ways to get out by different winds, then was thought formerly practicable. So, the fleet at last sailed out, and appeared before Berghen, where the commissioners gave their orders for convoying the merchant-men which were in that port. But it was not in their power to prevent a storm, which dispersed them, and threw twenty of them into the hands of the English.* This storm obliged Ruyter and the commissioners to return to Holland, with their fleet very much damaged.

At this time, the plague raged dreadfully in London, where it first appeared about the middle of May. It is said, that in less than a year, it swept away, in that single city, nearly seventy thousand persons. The King at first retired to Hampton-court, but afterwards, to be farther from London, resided at Salisbury.

This year, the Republicans had projected an insurrection, and were even encouraged by emissaries from the States-General, who would have been glad to employ the King at home in domestic troubles. But this was a bare project, which served only to furnish the enemies of the Non-conformists with an opportunity to magnify the danger with which the kingdom was threatened from the enemies of the church in general, and to include, in that number, the Presbyterians.

It was not only against England that the States-General had to defend themselves. Charles had raised them another enemy who had no less embarrassed them. This was the famous Bernard Van Ghalen, Bishop of Munster; who, upon very slight pretences, entered the Province of Over-yssel, at the head of an army paid by the English. He made himself master of a great many small places, and then attempted to surprize Groningen, but was repulsed. At last, before the end of the campaign, the King of France, and the Dukes of Lunenburg, having sent a powerful assistance to the States, the Bishop was forced to relinquish his great projects, and think of a peace, especially as the money promised by the King of England was not regularly paid.

The Parliament, which had been prorogued to the 9th of October, met on the day appointed, but at Oxford, on account of the plague which still raged in London. In his speech to both Houses, the King told them, the supply of two millions five hundred thousand pounds granted him for carrying on the war, was already spent. He insisted particularly on the great sums paid to the Bishop of Munster, for making a diversion in the bowels of his enemy's country, though it appears in Sir William Temple's letters, that these sums were never well paid. The Commons voted the King a new supply of twelve hundred and fifty thousand pounds to continue the war, and one hundred and twenty thousand pounds to the Duke of York, for the great service he had done to the nation.

After this, was brought into the House a bill, which passed without any difficulty; namely, "That no Non-conformist teacher, under what denomination soever, shall dwell, or come, unless upon the road, within five miles of any corporation, or any other place where they had been ministers, or had preached, after the act of oblivion, unless they first took the following oath." "I do swear that it is not lawful upon any pretence whatsoever to take arms against the King; and that I do abhor the traitorous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him, in pursuance of such commissions; and that I will not at any time endeavour any alteration of government either in the church or state."† This bill met with great opposition in the House of Lords; but it was at length passed, and the King gave it the royal assent the 31st of October, as well as to the money-bill and some others, after which he prorogued the Parliament to the 26th of February 1665-6.‡

In the beginning of the year 1666, the King's affairs were in an ill situation. The King of France, pressed by the repeated instances of the States-General, recalled his Ambassadors, and published the 19th of January a declaration of war against England.

On the other hand, the States found means to secure the King of Denmark, by the promise of paying him yearly, as long as the war with England should continue, fifteen hundred thousand florins, three hundred thousand of which were to be paid by the King of France. For this he engaged to maintain a fleet at sea of thirty men of war for the service of the allies.

The States also raised so many enemies to the Bishop of Munster, that he was forced to make peace and disband his forces. This peace was concluded at Cleve, and signed the 18th of April.

The King returning to London the 1st of February, proclaimed war against France, on the 10th.§

The command of the English fleet was given to Prince Rupert, and the Duke of Albemarle. They repaired to it the 23d of April, but were not ready to sail till the end of May. It consisted of seventy-eight ships of the line, besides frigates and fire ships. In all appearance, the King was till then ignorant of the French King's secret intentions. But he knew, the Duke of Beaufort had orders to repair to Belle-Isle with his fleet, said to consist of thirty-six sail, to join the Dutch fleet in the Channel. Wherefore, he sent express orders to Prince Rupert, to sail with twenty great ships, and join ten more at Plymouth, in order to go in quest of the Duke of Beaufort, which the Prince immediately obeyed.

The fleet of the States, commanded by Ruyter, put to sea with seventy-one ships of the line, twelve frigates, thirteen fire-ships, and eight yachts, and anchored between Newport and Dunkirk. Ruyter had under his particular conduct the squadron of the Maese: that of North Holland and Frieseland was commanded by Evertzen, and that of Zealand by Tromp. The English having a fair wind, sailed to attack the enemy, who, on their side, cut their cables to be the sooner ready to receive them. Tromp's ship was so disabled at the first, that he was obliged to leave it for another. The same thing happened to Ruyter, who was coming to his assistance, and the powder of a Dutch ship taking fire, she blew up into the air. Ruyter sunk an English ship of fifty guns, then another of seventy, and afterwards three others of the first rate. In short, this first day, the advantage was wholly on the side of the Dutch, except that they lost Vice-Admiral Evertzen, who was killed by a cannon-ball.

The fight, interrupted by the night, was renewed early the next morning, but after lasting some hours, was discontinued till noon by reason of a calm. After that, the wind rising, both fleets renewed the engagement with equal bravery. Tromp being once more obliged to change his ship, found himself so engaged in the English fleet, that he would have been infallibly taken or sunk, if Ruyter, by prodigious efforts, had not brought him off. This second day, the English had still the disadvantage, by losing eight of their largest ships either sunk or burnt, and six taken, with Sir George Ascough, Admiral of the White. The Duke of Albemarle would have taken the advantage of the night to retire, but was pursued too closely to execute his design. So that he was obliged to fight all the next day, as he retired towards his own shore. About the evening he discovered Prince Rupert's squadron coming

* Together with twelve men of war, and two East India ships.

† The penalty was forty pounds, and six months imprisonment, unless they took the said oath before their commitment.

‡ This year, the council of Scotland showed no less animosity against the Presbyterians. On pretence of some insolence committed by Alexander Smith, a private minister, a proclamation was published the 24th of December, ordering that all the silenced Presbyterian ministers should, within forty days, remove themselves and their families from the places where they had been ministers, and not to reside within twenty miles of the same; or within six miles of Edinburgh, or any Cathedral church, nor within three miles of any royal borough, nor should be more than two together in the same parish, on pain of incurring the penalties of the law against movers of sedition.

§ A few days before, the Queen miscarried, which entirely destroyed the common report that she was incapable of having children.

to his assistance. Whereupon the two English Admirals attacked their enemies again the next morning. But this fourth day proved as unsuccessful to them as the three former. They lost four of their best ships, and were obliged to retreat with precipitation. A mist happily conveyed them from Ruyter's pursuit. In these four days the English lost twenty-three great ships, besides several others of less note, six thousand men, and two thousand six hundred prisoners. Amongst the slain were Sir William Berkley, Vice-Admiral of the White squadron, and Sir Christopher Minnes. The Dutch lost six ships, two thousand eight hundred soldiers, and fourscore sailors, besides the Admiral Evertzen, Vander Hulst, and Stockhover, with some other officers. Though the victory was so evidently on the side of the Dutch, bonfires and rejoicings were made at London, as if the English had been conquerors.*

The two fleets soon put to sea again, and as they were in quest of each other, they met the 24th of July, and fought a furious battle, where the victory was obstinately disputed. The English fleet consisted of above a hundred sail; and the Dutch, of eighty-eight ships of the line, besides nineteen fireships. While Ruyter, and young Evertzen, engaged the red and white squadrons, Tromp after a long dispute routed the blue squadron, commanded by Sir Jeremy Smith. But by an unpardonable error, instead of remaining with the fleet, he amused himself with pursuing the flying ships of the enemy. On the other hand, young Evertzen, who commanded one of the Dutch squadrons, was killed with a cannon-ball, and his squadron entirely defeated. But the English Admiral who fought against him, was not guilty of the same error as Tromp. Instead of pursuing the flying enemy, he joined the red squadron, commanded by Prince Rupert, and the Duke of Albemarle, and these two squadrons attacked Ruyter, who nevertheless, by means of the night, disengaged himself. But the next day, he was obliged to sustain the fight alone against these two squadrons, there being no news of Tromp. He never in his whole life showed so much bravery and capacity as in this second engagement. He sustained, with his single squadron, the brunt of the two English squadrons, and at last retreated with such wonderful conduct, that he gained more honour by it than he would have done by a victory. The English leaving the chace in sight of Flushing, went after Tromp, who, though he was met off Harwich, recovered the Texel without any loss. Ruyter, at his return, loudly complained of Tromp's conduct, and, to satisfy him, the States put Tromp under an arrest, dismissed him his post, and put Van Ghent in his place.*

About the same time of these engagements between the English and Dutch, the Duke of Beaufort arrived with his fleet at Rochelle, where he staid to take in fresh water, which he greatly wanted.

As in the last engagement the Dutch fleet was dispersed, part retiring to Flushing, and part to the Texel, the Duke of Albemarle, finding himself master of the sea, detached twenty men of war to brave the coasts of Holland. Holmes coming to the Isle of Vlye, burnt a hundred merchant ships, and two men of war designed for convoys. Then he advanced to the Isle of Schelling, and making a descent, burnt many houses in the little town of Brandaris. His design was to improve a treason carrying on in this Isle by one Hemskirk, for which Buat a French gentlemen, who secretly corresponded with the English, was beheaded at the Hague. But Holmes not finding things so ready as he expected, returned to the fleet.

After this expedition, the English fleet sailed into the Channel, and anchored at St. Helen's; the Isle of Wight being the most proper station for hindering the junction of the French and Dutch fleets. Ruyter on his side posted himself in St. John's Bay, near Boulogne, where he was seized by a distemper, which for some time was believed mortal. This obliged the States to recall their fleet, of which they gave notice to the King of France.

The Duke of Beaufort, ignorant of the retreat of the Dutch fleet, left Belle-Isle, where he arrived about the 20th of September, and entering the Channel, safely sailed by the Isle of White, without being attacked, and got into Dieppe. He staid there a whole day without hearing any news of Ruyter. At last, being informed, that the Dutch fleet had retired, he sailed once more by the Isle of Wight, without meeting with any opposition, and got into the Ports of Bretagne.

This year, the States had intended to assist the malcontents in England and Scotland, in order to give the English arms a diversion at home. This design was even communicated to the King of France. But he found so many objections to it, that it was suffered to fall unexecuted.

The misfortune which this year befel the city of London (the terrible fire which laid so great a part of that vast city in ashes,) gave a fresh occasion to the enemies of the Republicans, to charge them with being the authors thereof. To represent, without any aggravation, the ravages made by this fire in London, we need only insert the inscription upon one of the sides of the column, erected on the place where the fire broke out.

"In the year of Christ 1666, the second day of September, at the distance of 202 feet (the height of this column) a terrible fire broke out about midnight, which, driven on by a high wind, not only wasted the adjacent parts, but also very remote places, with incredible noise and fury. It consumed eighty-nine churches, the city-gates, Guild-hall, many public structures, hospitals, schools, libraries, a vast number of stately edifices, thirteen thousand two hundred dwelling houses, four hundred streets. Of the six and twenty wards, it utterly destroyed fifteen, and left eight others shattered and half burnt. The ruins of the city were four hundred and thirty-six acres, from the Tower by the Thames side, to the Temple church, and from the north-east gate, along the city-wall to Holborn-bridge. To the estates and fortunes of the citizens, it was merciless, but to their lives very favourable, that it might in all things resemble the last conflagration of the world. The destruction was sudden, for in a small space of time the same city was seen most flourishing, and reduced to nothing. Three days after, when this fatal fire had baffled all human counsels and endeavours in the opinion of all, it stopped, as it were, by a command from Heaven, and was one very side extinguished."‡

* De Wit was on board the Dutch fleet, who was said to have invented chain-shot on this occasion, which did incredible damage to the rigging of the English, and was a great means of the Dutch getting the advantage. And it is thought, if Prince Rupert had not come up when he did, the English fleet was so unrigged, that they would have been all taken and sunk, or burnt. And yet a day of thanksgiving was appointed. Echard says, the English had but nine men of war taken or burnt; and the Dutch lost above fifteen ships, twenty-one Captains, and above five thousand common sea-men.

† According to Echard, there were about twenty Dutch ships sunk or burnt in this engagement; four thousand seamen killed, and near three thousand wounded.

‡ The fire broke out in a baker's shop, near London Bridge, and spread itself on all sides with such rapidity, that no efforts could extinguish it, till it laid in ashes a considerable part of the city. The inhabitants, without being able to provide effectually for their relief, were reduced to be spectators of their own ruin; and were pursued from street to street by the flames, which unexpectedly gathered round them. Three days and nights did the fire advance; and it was only by the blowing up of houses, that it was at last extinguished. The King and Duke used their utmost endeavours to stop the progress of the flames; but all their industry was unsuccessful. The causes of this calamity were evident. The narrow streets of London, the houses built entirely of wood, the dry season, and a violent east wind which blew; these were so many concurring circumstances, which rendered it easy to assign the reason of the destruction that ensued. But the people were not satisfied with this obvious account. Prompted by blind rage, some ascribed the guilt to the Republicans, others to the Catholics; though it is not easy to conceive how the burning of London could serve the purposes of either party. As the papists were the chief objects of public detestation, the rumour, which threw the guilt on them, was more favourably received by the people. No proof, however, or even presumption, after the strictest enquiry by a committee of Parliament, ever appeared to authorize such a calumny; yet, in order to give countenance to the popular prejudice, the inscription, engraved by authority on the monument, ascribed this calamity to that hated sect. This clause was erazed by order of King James, when he came to the throne; but after the resolution it was replaced. So credulous, as well as obstinate, are the people, in believing every thing which flatters their prevailing passion.

The Parliament meeting the 21st of September, the King told them, the money granted him had not sufficed to carry on the war, considering his two powerful enemies. He boasted of the great success with which God had been pleased to bless his arms, supposing his fleet to have been always victorious. Immediately after, the Commons liberally voted the King a supply of eighteen hundred thousand pounds. Thus in the space of two years, this war cost the people of England five millions, five hundred and fifty thousand pounds.

The two Houses beginning to discover, that the King was not the zealous Protestant he affected to appear; that the Papists had great influence in his council, and that their religion made a visible progress, presented to him an address for executing the laws against Popish priests and jesuits, who were labouring to pervert his subjects. The King immediately published a proclamation for banishing the priests and jesuits,on pain of being punished according to law, if found in the kingdom after the 10th of December. But the more rigorous the proclamations were, the more favourable was the execution.

The rigour exercised against the Presbyterians in Scotland, caused some of the most impatient to rise in arms, to the number of fifteen hundred, and form a regular body, with officers in proportion to head them. Probably, they hoped, if they should gain some advantage, to be joined by their brethren. But in their first action with the King's forces, they were dispersed with the loss of three hundred men, and one hundred prisoners, who were most of them executed.

The King, impatient for the dispatch of the money-bill, thought it necessary to quicken the Commons by a message. But this message produced no great effect. The Commons were then examining complaints against the Lord Mordant, Governor of Windsor Castle, who was accused of some arbitrary and tyrannical actions. But neither this affair, nor the money-bill, could be finished before the conclusion of the year.

A. D. 1666-7.] The Parliament met the 2d of January, after a short adjournment, and immediately the Commons accused the Lord Mordant, at the bar of the Lords House, and then preferred articles of high crimes and misdemeanors against him. But they were displeased, that the accused was suffered to be within the bar of the House, whilst his accusation was reading. This occasioned a dispute between the two Houses. There was also another difference between them, concerning the commissioners appointed by the Commons to levy the poll-tax, and to take the public on oath.

The King came to the Parliament the 8th of February, and after passing several acts, he assured them, the money granted should be laid out for the ends it was given. Then he prorogued the Parliament to the 10th of October. The acts passed were; an act to continue for eleven months, the monthly assessment of seventy thousand pounds, which, with the poll-tax, was conceived sufficient to make good the eighteen hundred thousand pounds, granted to the King. The other acts concerned chiefly the new buildings in London, which were finished sooner than could be expected, and in a manner more beautiful and regular than before the fire.*

It is now time to speak of the peace between England and Holland, which was secretly negotiating, at the time the Parliament granted eighteen hundred thousand pounds for carrying on the war. In November 1665, before the King of France had declared against England, the States, for a foundation of peace, had offered the King one of these two conditions; either that each of the parties should restore what had been taken, or both keep what they were possessed of. The last of these conditions was very advantageous to England, by reason of the great number of ships taken from the Dutch before even the war was proclaimed. This offer was renewed at Paris about the middle of the year 1666, in a conference there between Mr. de Lionne, the Lord Holles, the English ambassador, and Mr. Van Beninghen, envoy from the States. Probably, Charles expected greater advantages in the continuance of the war, since he returned no answer to this offer. He only complained of its obscurity, without signifying wherein it consisted. Nevertheless, he received this advantage from it, that he knew how the States were disposed, and what he could depend on: so that it was in his power to make peace whenever he should think proper. The 17th of September the same year the States repeated the same offer in a letter to the King. But as this was when the Parliament was going to sit, and when the King expected a large supply for carrying on the war, he did not think fit to embrace it. He contented himself with signifying to the States, in a letter of the 4th of October, his dissatisfaction at their proceedings, and at the calumnies they had raised against him, in accusing him of being the aggressor, and rejecting all proposals for peace. Then he largely justified himself upon what had been alledged by the States against him. But the most important part of this letter was, the King's positive assurance that he had accepted the mediation of Sweden. A place therefore to treat was to be agreed on. The choice of this place afforded the King a pretence to defer the negociation some months. He was at first for having the peace negociated at London, to which the States would have readily consented, if the Kings of France and Denmark had believed it consistent with their honour. Upon the representation made by the States, concerning the refusal of the two Kings their allies, he answered, that he had no affair to negociate with France, and complained of the King of Denmark for making war against him without any reason. He was so offended with that King, that he made no scruple to tell the States, it was at the instigation of Denmark, that he sent his fleet to Berghen, and agreed with him to divide the spoil. At last, the States left the nomination of the place to him, provided it was approved by their allies. The King accepted the offer, but insisted that the States should first write to him, to testify that they would willingly have sent their plenipotentiaries to London, if the two Kings, their allies would have given their consent. This letter was written, as he desired, the 13th of January 1666-7, and the King, in his answer of the 20th, named the Hague for the place of conference. He knew, the Pensionary would not accept it, on account of the cabals which the English Ambassadors might make against him in favour of the young Prince of Orange. Accordingly De Wit privately caused the King of France to reject this proposal. Soon after, the Earl of St. Albans was sent to Paris to notify to the King of France, that Charles consented that things should remain in the state to which the chance of war had reduced them. He added however one condition, namely, that France should restore to him the Isle of St. Christopher's, and three other small Islands in America, seized by that crown the last year.

The King of France, to serve De Wit, in preventing the King of England from insisting upon his nomination of the Hague, for the place of conference, thought of an expedient in which he succeeded. This was to name Dover for the place of Congress. And when it was objected to, he added Breda, Bois-le-duc, and Masetricht, leaving to the King of England the choice of one of these four towns. At last, Charles having no longer interest to delay the peace, wrote to the States, the 18th of March, that he was willing to send his plenipotentiaries to Breda. (a) It was agreed the conferences for the peace should begin the 10th of May. But the

* To this end, a bill was now passed, for laying twelve-pence upon every chaldron, and twelve-pence upon every ton of coals, that should be brought into the Port of London, for ten years, the better to enable the Lord Mayor and Aldermen to recompence those persons, whose grounds should be taken from them, in order to enlarge the streets, &c.——And about this time was set up an office for ensuring houses from fire, which was principally contrived by Dr. Barbon, one of the first and most considerable rebuilders of the city.

English

English plenipotentiaries arrived not at Breda till the 20th.

At the first opening of the Congress, the King pretended the States should make him satisfaction for the two ships, the Good Hope, and the Bon Adventure, taken, or sunk before the treaty of 1662. Moreover, he pretended, that as the States were obliged by the same treaty to restore him the Isle of Poleron in the East-Indies, and as that Isle was still in their possession, it should be delivered to him.

To decide these two articles, couriers were to be sent several times to London and the Hague, and those from London brought only stricter orders from the ambassadors to insist upon the two ships, and the Isle of Poleron. At length the King yielded the last, so that the whole negotiation was reduced to the satisfaction demanded for the two ships. Relying on the certainty of a peace, he had laid up his great ships, and kept only a squadron of twenty-sail, while the States continued their preparations as usual.

The States, seeing what difficulties the King formed, believed, or pretended to believe, he was averse to peace. They therefore resolved, either to force him to relinquish his pretensions, or at least to continue the war this summer with advantage, because they knew, that the King would have no fleet at sea.

Pursuant to this resolution, Ruyter sailed out of the Texel with fifty ships, and came the 8th of June to the mouth of the Thames, whence he detached Vice-Admiral Van Ghent, with seventeen of his lightest ships, and some fire-ships.

Van Ghent, the 10th of June, sailed up the Medway, made himself master of the fort of Sheerness, and after burning a magazine full of stores, to the value of forty thousand pounds, blew up the fortifications. This action alarmed the city of London; so that to prevent greater mischiefs, several ships were sunk, and a large chain put across the narrowest part of the river Medway. But by means of an easterly wind, and a strong tide, the Dutch ships broke through the chain, and sailed between the sunken vessels. They immediately burnt three large ships, the Matthias, the Unity, and the Charles the Fifth, all taken from them in the present war, and carried away with them the hull of the Royal Charles, besides burning and damaging several others. After this, they advanced as far as Upnore castle, and burnt the Royal Oak, the Loyal London, and the Great James. The English fearing all the Dutch fleet would sail up to London bridge, sunk thirteen ships at Woolwich, and four at Blackwall, and platforms, furnished with artillery to defend them, were raised in several places. The consternation was very great, and the complaints were no less so. It was openly said, the King out of avarice had kept the money so generously given him to continue the war, and left his ships and subjects exposed to the insults of the enemy, though he had exclaimed against the injustice done him, in believing him capable of such an action. The King was under an inexpressible concern, as well for fear of greater damage from the Dutch fleet, as for the mortification this affair gave him, and the shame of having nothing to say to the murmurs of his people.

After this exploit, Ruyter sailed to Portsmouth, with a design to burn the ships in that harbour; but finding them secured, he sailed to the west, and took some ships in Torbay. He then sailed eastward, beat the English before Harwich, and chaced a squadron of nineteen men of war commanded by Sir Edward Spragg, who was obliged to retire into the Thames. In a word, he kept the coasts of England in a continual alarm all July, till he received the news of the conclusion of a peace.

This event had so changed the face of affairs, that the English ambassadors at Breda grew more pliant, and were easily persuaded to yield the article of the two ships. On the 21st of July, the treaty of peace was signed. By this treaty, the island of Poleron remained with the Dutch; satisfaction for the ships Bon adventure and Good-Hope, the pretended grounds of the quarrel, was no longer insisted upon: Acadie was yielded to the French. The acquisition of New York, a settlement so important by its situation, was the chief advantage which the English reaped from a war, in which the national character of bravery had shined out with lustre, but where the misconduct of the government, especially in the conclusion, had been no less apparent.

Complaints, murmurs, and suspicions against King Charles and his ministers succeeded the animosity with which the Dutch war had begun. These suspicions and complaints reaching the King, he resolved to appease them by sacrificing the Earl of Clarendon, who had hitherto acted as prime minister. He knew, the people are always excessively pleased with sacrifices of ministers; but this was only a pretence used by the King to be delivered of a minister, whom he no longer loved, and whose presence and counsels were become insupportable to him. The Chancellor's regular life, his aversion to debauchery and libertinism, his grave and severe manners, his neglect of the King's favourites and mistresses, and his principles and maxims concerning religion and the state, ill agreed with the disorderly life of the court, and still less with the projects formed in favour of the Papists, under colour of easing the Presbyterians. He had often taken the liberty to reprove the King for his disorderly life, and at first his reproofs were well received. But when the King had once abandoned himself to his pleasures, he could no longer bear the presence of a man, whose advice he had formerly received with a sort of submission. The Duke of Buckingham and some others perceiving this disposition of the King, neglected nothing to cherish it. As often as they saw the Chancellor coming, they would say to his Majesty, "Here comes your school master!" At other times they mimicked him before the King, in order to make him ridiculous. The Duke of Buckingham used to walk in a stately manner, with a pair of bellows before him for the purse, whilst Colonel Titus carried a fire shovel on his shoulder for the mace. The King suffered these buffooneries, and thereby discovered his disgust to his minister.*

The King, under colour of giving some satisfaction to his people, deprived him of his office of High-Chancellor, and made Sir Orlando Bridgeman Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal.

The Earl of Southampton, Lord Treasurer, dying three months before the Chancellor's disgrace, the King was at once deprived of two great and faithful ministers, whose loss was never repaired, at least with regard to their morals, their religion, and affection for their country. A little before Southampton's death, some person in council speaking against the Chancellor, he with

* As the King's disgust turned at last into real hatred, it is proper to relate the more serious causes which have been offered in vindication of the King's resentment.

I. It is pretended, the King, designing to be divorced from his Queen, on several weak pretences, could never obtain the Chancellor's approbation.

II. The King intended, after his divorce, to marry Mrs. Stuart, his relation, with whom he was in love. The Earl of Clarendon, to prevent this, persuaded the young Duke of Richmond to marry her, by representing, how serviceable it would be to gain him the King's favour. The Duke, following this advice, made his addresses to the lady, who, knowing nothing of the King's design, believed she ought not to refuse so good an offer, and the marriage was immediately concluded. The King, thus disappointed, banished the Duke, with his new Duchess, from the court, and never forgave the Chancellor.

III. Another cause of the King's resentment against the Chancellor, was his opposing Popham's project of settling an annual revenue of two millions of pounds sterling upon the King, which was seconded by the Earl of Southampton.

IV. The most probable cause of the Chancellor's ruin was, that the Papists, whose counsels and projects were listened to, and approved by the King, omitted nothing to destroy him, knowing, that under his ministry they could never hope to accomplish their designs.

V. A stately house built by him near St. James's Park, and in the very year of the plague, did him great injury in the minds of the people. It is pretended, it cost him fifty thousand pounds sterling, though at first he designed to lay out but fifteen or sixteen thousand. People gave it the name of Dunkirk-house, because it was supposed that his advice for the sale of that place had furnished him with the means to build it. He committed another error, in purchasing for this House the stones designed for repairing St. Paul's.

some emotion said——"The Earl of Clarendon is a true Protestant, and an honest Englishman, and while he is in place we are secure of our laws, liberties, and religion: but whenever he shall be removed, England will feel the ill effects of it."

After the Earl of Southampton's death, the King put the treasury into commission. Among the commissioners was Sir Thomas Clifford, a known Papist, on whom afterwards fell the King's choice for Lord Treasurer.

The Parliament meeting the 10th of October, the Lord Keeper communicated to them the conclusion of the peace, and desired them to settle the balance of trade with Scotland. He said, the King having named commissioners to state the public accounts, and examine to what uses the money granted by Parliament had been applied, and this commission not having succeeded as he expected, he left them to follow their own method, and examine them as strictly as they pleased. He added, that some malicious persons had dispersed false reports against the government, with design to create a disaffection in his subjects: but that his Majesty promised himself from their affection, they would, on the contrary, endeavour to preserve a good understanding between him and his people. That if any just grievances have happened, his Majesty was ready to redress them, and did not doubt they would imprint upon the hearts of his subjects that known truth——"That there is no distinct interest between the King and his people, but the good of one is the good of both."

Some days after, the two Houses presented an address to the King to thank him for several things:

I. That he had disbanded the late-raised forces.

II. That he had dismissed the Papists from out of his guards, and other military employments.

III. That he had revoked the Canary patent.

IV. And more especially, that he had displaced the late Lord Chancellor, and removed him from the exercise of public trust and employment in affairs of state. The King answered to this last article, "That he would never employ the Earl of Clarendon again in any public affairs whatsoever."

The King sufficiently discovering his intention not to protect the Earl of Clarendon, the House was thereby encouraged to seek reasons or pretences to impeach him of treason.

Upon the foundation of certain articles, seventeen in number,* the Commons, on the 12th of November, impeached the Earl of high treason, at the bar of the Lords House, and desired that he might be sent to the Tower.† But the Lords did not think proper to commit him upon an accusation of treason in general, without any particular charge.

This raised a warm dispute between the two Houses, which several conferences could not allay. At last, the Commons came to this resolution. "That the Lords not having complied with the desire of the Commons, in committing the Earl of Clarendon, and sequestering him from Parliament, upon the impeachment from that House, was an obstruction of the public justice of the kingdom, and a precedent of evil and dangerous consequence." At the same time, they appointed a committee to draw up a declaration to vindicate their proceedings.

But the Earl of Clarendon seeing himself exposed to the Commons' rage, and knowing, the King and the whole court were against him, thought it adviseable to withdraw into France, and leave an apology behind him, addressed to the Lords. He therein said, that his fortune, which was but moderate, had been gained entirely by the lawful avowed profits of his office, and by the voluntary bounty of the King; that during the first year after the restoration he had always concurred in opinion with the other counsellors, men of such reputation that no one could entertain suspicions of their wisdom or integrity; that his credit soon declined, and however he might disapprove of some measures, he found it vain to oppose them; that his repugnance to the Dutch war, the source of all the public grievances, was always generally known, as well as his disapprobation of many unhappy steps taken in conducting it; and that whatever pretence might be made of public offences, his real crime, that which had exasperated his powerful enemies, was his frequent opposition to exorbitant grants, which the importunity of suitors had extorted from his Majesty.

The Lords having received this apology the 3d of December, desired a conference with the Commons, to communicate it to them. The Duke of Buckingham, who was to deliver it, said, "The Lords have commanded me to deliver you this scandalous and seditious paper, sent from the Earl of Clarendon: they bid me to present it to you, and desire you in convenient time to send it to them again, for it has a style which they are in love with, and therefore desire to keep it."

The reading of this apology threw the Commons into a flame; and, at last, they voted his apology scandalous and malicious, and a reproach to the justice of the nation, and ordered it to be burnt by the common hangman. The Parliament next proceeded to exert their legislative power against Clarendon, and passed a bill of banishment and incapacity, which received the royal assent. He retired into France, where he lived in a private manner. He survived his banishment six years, and he employed his leisure chiefly in reducing into order the History of the Civil Wars, for which he had before collected materials. The performance does honour to his memory; and, except Whitelocke's Memorials, is the most candid account of those times, composed by any contemporary author.

Before the Parliament met again in October, the King published a proclamation, for the rigorous execution of the laws against those who repaired to hear mass at the chapels of ambassadors. This same month of October, he rode in great state into the city, and laid the first stone of the foundation of the Royal Exchange. This building was finished in a very short time.‡

After the removal of the Earl of Clarendon, the King and his ministers, of whom the Earl of Arlington, and Sir Orlando Bridgeman were the principal, believed it absolutely necessary to give the people some satisfaction, by demonstrating the court's attention to the welfare of the nation. The King of France, by his invasion of Flanders, had so clearly shown, he did not intend to stand to his Queen's renunciation of all the members of the Spanish monarchy, that he could not possibly be mistaken. Besides, his power was daily increasing, whereas that of Spain was visibly declining. It was therefore the interest of Europe in general, and of England in particular, to take early and effectual measures, to set bounds to this formidable power,

* The articles were: that he had advised the King to govern by military power, without Parliaments; that he had affirmed the King to be a papist or popishly affected; that he had received great sums of money, for procuring the Canary patent and other illegal patents, that he had advised and procured divers of his Majesty's subjects to be imprisoned against law, in remote islands or garrisons, thereby to prevent their having the benefit of the law; that he had procured the customs to be farmed at under rates; that he had received great sums from the Vintner's Company, for allowing them to enhance the price of wines; that he had in a short time gained a greater estate than could have been supposed to arise from the profits of his offices; that he had introduced an arbitrary government into his Majesty's plantations; that he had rejected a proposal for the preservation of Nevis and St. Christopher's, which was the occasion of great losses in those parts; that when he was in his Majesty's service beyond sea, he held a correspondence with Cromwell and his accomplices; that he advised the sale of Dunkirk; that he had unduly altered letters patent under the King's seal; that he had unduly decided causes in council, which should have been brought before the chancery; that he had issued quo warrantos against corporations, with an intention of squeezing money out of them; that he had taken money for passing a bill of settlement in Ireland; that he betrayed the nation in all foreign treaties; and that he was the principal adviser of dividing the fleet in June 1666.

† The impeachment was carried up by Edward Seymour, Esq. who was also the first man that charged him in the House of Commons, with many great and heinous crimes.

‡ This year took out of the world Thomas Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, Lord Treasurer. The other less remarkable deaths were those of Dr. Matthew Wren, Bishop of Ely; (great enemy of the Presbyterians, who, out of revenge for his severity to them before the civil wars, kept him prisoner in the Tower from the year 1642, till the restoration, when he was restored to his Bishopric of Ely, where he died aged eighty-one years.) And the famous poet Abraham Cowley.

which might produce great changes, if care was not taken to stop its progress. Nothing was more popular than such a design, and nothing more capable to reingratiate the King with his subjects. So, the 1st of January 1667-8, a resolution was taken, to enter into a strict union with the States General of the United Provinces, to prevent the King of France's entire reduction of Flanders, and the rest of the Spanish Netherlands. The court likewise resolved, to endeavour to engage the King of Sweden into the same measures, and so form a triple alliance, capable to intimidate Lewis XIV. and oblige him to proceed with more caution.

To execute this project, Sir William Temple was ordered to the Hague, with the character of envoy extraordinary and plenipotentiary. By the address of this envoy, the treaty of alliance between the King and the States was concluded in five days, and, what is more, signed by the States General, without communicating it to the particular provinces, which had never been practised before. Moreover, the Count de Dhona, ambassador of Sweden, engaged for his master that he should enter into this treaty, if a place was left for him as a principal. Afterwards, this Count signed a like treaty, in the name of the King of Sweden, with the King of England and the States General, it being agreed, that this treaty should be considered as part of the former when ratified. These treaties were first sent into England, and ratified by the King, and, shortly after, the King of Sweden's ratification was likewise received. Thus was concluded, in a very little time, a triple league, the most important that had been long since made in Europe, and which was to check the power, as well as vast designs of France.

For the understanding this treaty, it must be observed, that Lewis XIV. after his last campaign, during which he had seized many strong places of the Spanish Netherlands, had, at the pressing instances of the States General, consented to a treaty with Spain, till the end of March, 1668. Moreover, he had left to the Queen Regent of Spain, the choice of either yielding to him the places conquered by him in the last campaign, or else the Duchy of Luxemburgh, or, instead of it, Franche-Comté, Cambray, and Cambresis, Douay, Aire, St. Omer, Bergue, Furnes, and Linck, for which he promised to surrender all the rest of his conquests. These offers, as it appears, were founded upon the supposition, that the French Queen's renunciation, in the treaty of her marriage, was of no force. Though the thing had been decided only by the King of France himself, the States General, seeing no possibility of obliging him to desist from his pretensions, had approved of this alternative, and positively engaged to join their forces with those of France, to compel Spain to embrace one or other of these offers. They could not therefore recede, after such an engagement. For which reason, they resolved to make with England three different treaties, which, however, were to take place, as containing but one and the same treaty.

The first treaty contained a defensive alliance between England and the States General, against all who should attack either of the parties, with a specification of the succours to be mutually given, in case of such an attack. This alliance to be perpetual.

By the second treaty, the King and the States were obliged to use their joint endeavours to dispose the King of France to make peace in the Netherlands, upon one of the proposed conditions, and likewise the King of Spain to make choice of one of the two before the end of May. But, in case of any difficulty from the Spaniard, they engaged to use their endeavours to induce the King of France to stop all farther progress of his arms in Flanders, and leave it wholly to the allies, to procure the ends proposed in the league.

The third treaty contained:

I. That if in procuring peace between France and Spain, any difficulties should arise concerning the renunciation, care should be taken so to settle the articles of peace, as to create no prejudice to the rights of either. But if one side only should reject this expedient, then the allies should proceed against the refuser, in the manner agreed in the second treaty.

II. That the allies should use their endeavours to establish peace between Spain and Portugal. And though they did not pretend to hinder the King of France from assisting Portugal, they would however prevent, as far as lay in their power, his assisting that nation by making war in the Netherlands.

III. But, in case the King of France, rejecting the conditions contained in the second treaty, should make farther progress in Flanders, then the allies should join with Spain, and make war upon the King of France, till they should compel him to comply with the terms of the Pyrenean treaty.

IV. That all these articles should be ratified within four weeks.*

This treaty, which was called the triple league, received the applauses of all Europe, except France. Indeed, the tendency of it was not only to save the Netherlands, pursuant to the true interests of England and the States General, but to prevent a fatal war, which must have thrown all Europe into a flame.

Shortly after, Sir William Temple concluded a treaty of commerce with the States General, and about the same time the treaty of peace between Spain and Portugal was happily finished, under the guarantee of the King of England.

While these affairs were transacting, the Parliament met the 10th of February. The King informed them, that he had made a league defensive with the States of the United Provinces, and another for an efficacious mediation of peace between France and Spain, into which the King of Sweden had, by his ambassador, offered to enter as a principal. He added, that the posture of his neighbours, and the consequence of the new alliance, obliging him to set out a fleet to sea, he should want a speedy supply; that besides it was necessary to build some large ships, and fortify the ports.

The Commons joyfully received the news of the triple alliance; but before they proceeded to the consideration of the King's speech, they resolved to inquire into the mismanagements during the late war. They appointed for this purpose a committee, which discovered many misdemeanors in the conduct of several persons, "As in the affair of Berghen in Norway; in the plundering the East India ships while the Dutch passed by; in the not setting out a sufficient fleet last year; in the separation of those that were out, so that they became useless; in the want of provision and ammunition in the fleet, and in the sorts; in payment of the seamen by tickets; in the want of intelligence, and dividing the fleets in the second year of the war; in the business of Chatham, &c." The Commons accused Brounkard, that, after the first battle, he had carried false orders from the Duke of York, while that Prince was reposing himself, which had prevented the entire destruction of the enemy's fleet; and, expelling him the House, ordered him to be impeached. As to the affair of Chatham, they accused commissioner Pett, for having neglected his duty. Sir William Penn was accused of having embezzled great quantities of rich goods taken in a Dutch prize.

A. D. 1668.] The King was concerned to put an end to these examinations, since most of the miscarriages reflected upon him. He therefore pressed the Commons, by three several messages, to hasten the money bill, telling them, that he intended to prorogue the Parliament the 4th of May. But, being informed, the House was not pleased with his message, because a prorogation would have defeated all their proceedings against delinquents, he let them know, that he intended only an adjournment for three months; and withal desired, that the money bill might be ready against the 4th of May.

Besides the supply, the House of Commons was employed in another affair, with which they were greatly affected.

* This triple alliance was signed January 23.

affected. They presented an address to the King, to pray him "That he would issue out his proclamation for enforcing the laws against conventicles; and that care might be taken for the preservation of the peace against all unlawful assemblies of papists and non-conformists."—The king, according to his usual custom, failed not to publish a proclamation, declaring, "That upon information, that divers persons abusing the clemency used to the Dissenters, (even whilst it was under consideration to find out a better union of his Protestant subjects) had of late openly held unlawful assemblies and conventicles, he would by no means permit such notorious contempts of himself and his laws to go unpunished, &c."

At this time a great dispute arose between the two Houses, occasioned by Mr. Skinner, a merchant of London, who believing to have just cause of complaint against the East India Company, brought the matter by petition into the House of Lords originally. The Lords, after an examination, relieved him, in five thousand pounds costs. On the other hand, the company having petitioned the Commons, Skinner was taken into custody, for applying originally to the Lords, in a common plea, which was not agreeable to the law. The petition presented to the Commons by the East India company, was voted scandalous by the Lords, and several conferences between the two Houses, were not capable to decide this difference. At last, the Commons voted, "That whoever should be aiding or assisting in putting in execution the order or sentence of the House of Lords, in the case of Thomas Skinner against the East India company, should be deemed a betrayer of the rights and liberties of the Commons of England, and an infringer of the privileges of the House."

The same day this vote passed in the House of Commons, being the 8th of May, the King came to the House of Peers, and passing the bill for raising three hundred and ten thousand pounds by an imposition on wines and other liquors, and some other acts, he adjourned the Parliament to the 11th of August. He adjourned it again a second time to the 1st of March, and at last, prorogued it to the 19th of October, 1669.*

We have already mentioned the affairs between France and Spain, and the alternative offered by the French King. The Marquis of Castel Rodrigo, or rather the court of Spain, not being in haste to make a choice, Lewis XIV. in February invaded Franche-Comté, and in less than a fortnight subdued the whole province. He was still willing however, to stand to the offer of the two conditions he had proposed. But the court of Spain delayed, to declare upon the offered alternative, designing to engage England and the States in a war against France. Meanwhile, as the treaty of the triple league was directly contrary to the design of Spain, (the three allies having only engaged to take arms in case the King of France refused to stand to his proposal) it was not possible for the court of Spain to accomplish their ends. At last, after many tergiversations, the Marquis of Castel Rodrigo declared, he accepted the first condition, by which France was to keep what had been conquered the last campaign. This choice greatly surprised the States, who had relied on the Spaniards accepting rather the second condition, which appeared less advantageous to them. But the policy of the Spanish court was to throw England and the States into an unavoidable necessity of making war against France, if she should offer to pursue her conquest in the Netherlands.

This choice being made, the peace was no longer difficult. The town of Aix la Chapelle was agreed on for the place of treaty, and the plenipotentiaries of France and Spain, of England, Sweden, and the States, repairing thither, the treaty was concluded and signed the second of May, after a fortnight's negotiation. The treaty contained in substance, that the King of France should keep possession of Charleroy, Binch, Acth, Douay, Fort-de-la-Scarpe, Tournay, Oudenarde, Lisle, Armentieres, Courtray, Berghes, and Furnes, with all their dependencies. The King of France, on his side, restored Franche-Comté to the crown of Spain. The allied States were guarantees of this peace, and all other Princes and States were allowed to be so, if they pleased.†

Though the treaty of Aix la Chapelle had considerably increased the power of France, the States General of the United Provinces believed it a great advantage, to have stopped the progress of the French arms. To immortalize their glory, they struck a medal, on one side of which was seen Holland leaning against a trophy, and on the reverse, an inscription to this effect: "That they had secured the laws; reformed religion; assisted, defended, and reconciled Kings; restored freedom to the ocean; procured by their arms a glorious peace, and established the tranquillity of all Europe." On the other hand, Joshua Van Beuninghen, who had been employed in negotiating this peace, struck a medal, and compared himself to Joshua stopping the course of the sun. As the King of France had taken the sun for his device, the meaning of this medal could not be mistaken. But the States immediately suppressed it. As for the first, and some others, which discovered too great presumption, they were not broken till two years after. They had afterwards cause to repent of this insult offered to Lewis XIV.

After the removal of the Earl of Clarendon, the face of the English court was entirely changed. The King, more at ease by the absence of a troublesome minister, whose very presence was a reproof to his conduct, gave himself up to his pleasures, without any reserve or discretion. The Duke of Buckingham, who had no religion, and gloried in his debaucheries, and Wilmot, Earl of Rochester, the greatest wit, and the most satirical and licentious poet of his age, were his principal favourites. With these two men, and his mistresses, the King spent almost his whole time, and it was with difficulty that his ministers could find an opportunity to speak to him of his affairs. Pleasures and debauches were the sole entertainments of the court, and vice appeared there bare-faced. In a word, England had never seen a more disorderly court, and unhappily, their example had but too much influence on the rest of the people. The King was prodigal to excess. Besides his standing revenues, which, as we have seen, amounted to twelve hundred thousand pounds sterling, he had consumed the eighteen hundred thousand pounds given him the last year by the Parliament, in uses for which that money was not intended. This year, he had asked a supply of his Parliament, pretending a necessity to build some new ships of war, and to put a great fleet to sea, in maintenance of his engagements by the triple alliance. The Parliament had granted him three hundred and ten thousand pounds, but the act not passing till two days after the signing of the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, not a single ship was built, and the necessity of putting a fleet to sea vanished at once. Notwithstanding this, he was always in want, and his revenues perpetually anticipated.

But a still greater misfortune to England was, that only Papists, or men of no religion, had any credit at court. The Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Rochester, and the King's mistresses, were not persons who gave themselves any trouble to stop the progress of Popery. The Earl of Arlington, Secretary of State, was, like the King, a disguised, and Clifford, a declared Papist. The Duke of York was not only a Catholic, but also very zealous for his religion. Being considered as presumptive heir to the crown, great

* In the beginning of May, the Queen miscarried a second time.

† From this time, England had the best opportunity of holding the balance of Europe, which if it had immoveably observed, and with reasonable vigour, it might have saved the spending of millions of treasure, and oceans of blood.——Whatever the Spanish lost by the French ravages, the English gained a very great private benefit by it: for one Brewer, said to be of English parents, with about fifty Walloons, who wrought and dyed fine woollen cloths, thereupon came into England; and by them the English were in a few years instructed to dye fine woollen cloths, cheaper by forty per cent. than they could before.

court was made to him, and with the more application, as his revenues being large, and his management frugal, he had wherewithal to gain courtiers. It may be judged, that his zeal had suffered him not to advance Protestants to places of trust, when he could introduce persons of his own religion. He had so powerful a party at court, and so many creatures about the King's person, that he was in a manner absolute there, and directed the resolutions of the council. Lastly, if the King had any religion, he was most inclined to Popery. He found, besides, a considerable advantage in caressing the Papists, whom he esteemed his firm friends, whereas he could not help dreading the zeal of the Protestants, in case they should discover, he had abjured their religion.

This summer, the King diverted himself with making several progresses into the country, to view the ports and the navy. He sent a squadron into the Mediterranean, commanded by Sir Thomas Allen, who forced the Algerines to a peace very advantageous to England.*

Though the year 1669, produced no memorable events, it was fatal to Europe, since it was, probably, this year that measures began to be taken for the strict union of France with England. At least, it appears in Sir William Temple's letters, that Mr. Puffendorf, who had this year been sent envoy from Sweden to the court of France, calling at the Hague in his return, said to De Wit, that a minister at the French court had assured him, that the triple alliance would not subsist, and that the English court had already changed their measures. The same Mr. Puffendorf saw a letter in Marshal Turenne's hands at Paris, from Monsieur Colbert the French ambassador in London, wherein that ambassador, speaking of the English court, has these words——"I have at last made them sensible of the whole extent of his Majesty's liberality." So, it is scarcely to be doubted, that Colbert's embassy to London was designed to gain or corrupt the English court, and that he succeeded.

In all appearance, the King had now formed a sort of scheme with regard to religion; in pursuance of which, he and his ministers affected to express great kindness for the Presbyterians, and this kindness encouraged them to appear more openly, and hold their assemblies with less caution and secrecy. Sir Orlando Bridgeman, Lord Keeper, acquainted two of the most eminent Presbyterian ministers, that he desired a conference with them. They waited on him accordingly, and he freely told them, he designed to make them some proposals for a comprehension for the Presbyterians, and a toleration for the Independents and the rest. Upon this occasion, these two Presbyterian ministers had several conferences with two episcopal doctors, one of whom was chaplain to the Lord Keeper. They agreed among them, concerning re-ordination, which was the point they most differed about, that all Presbyterian ministers who had been already ordained, should be admitted into the ministry of the church of England with this form of words, "Take thou legal authority to preach the word of God, and administer the Holy Sacraments, in any congregation of England, where thou shalt be lawfully appointed thereunto." This was not properly a new ordination, but only a power to exercise their ministry in the church of England. It was also agreed, that ceremonies should be left indifferent, so that they might be used or not, according as every one should think fit; and that the liturgy should be altered: moreover, that those who could not be comprehended should be indulged: and for security to the government, the names of the teachers, and all the members of the congregations, should be registered. Agreeably to this scheme, the Lord Chief Justice Hale undertook to draw up a bill against the ensuing Parliament, and the Lord Keeper promised to support it with all his power. This project, however necessary to the King's designs, was directly contrary to the principles of the Parliament, who were averse to all condescension. Accordingly it came to nothing.

The Archbishop of Canterbury went to the King, and obtained from him a proclamation to inforce the laws against conventicles, and particularly the act for restraining non-conformists from inhabiting in corporations. This proclamation was executed like those against the Papists.

The Parliament met the 19th of October. The King in a short speech demanded money for the discharge of his debts, and briefly proposed the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. The Commons, instead of taking the King's speech into consideration, proceeded upon other affairs. The public accounts were examined, with the uses to which the King had applied the money given him by the Parliament, and Sir George Carteret, who had the keeping of some of the books, being found very blameable, was expelled the House. Then they addressed the King to thank him for his proclamation against conventicles, praying him to continue the same care to suppress them for the future.

Not contented with this, they appointed a committee to enquire into the behaviour of the non-conformists. This committee reported, "That there were divers conventicles and other seditious meetings near the Parliament, where great numbers of disaffected persons frequently met, which was not only an affront to the government, but of imminent danger to both Houses, and the peace of the kingdom." Upon the report of the committee, the House declared, that they would firmly adhere to the King in the maintenance of the established government of the church and state, against all enemies whatsoever.†

At last, the Commons voted the King a supply of four hundred thousand pounds. But, before they considered of the means to raise this sum, they revived the debate concerning Skinner and the East India company, and came to several resolutions, which the Lords looked upon as so many violations of their privileges in point of judicature. The difference between the two Houses daily increasing, the King saw, it would be very difficult to reconcile them, and that the Commons would not proceed upon the money bill till this affair was adjusted; and as he had no room to expect an agreement, he prorogued the Parliament the 11th of December, to the 14th of February following.‡

A. D. 1669-70.]

* This year died, Algernon Percy, Earl of Northumberland, who was succeeded by his son; the famous poets Davenant, and Denham; and the great soldier Sir William Waller, so often mentioned in the history of the civil wars. He had been imprisoned by the Independent Parliament, and confined till the King's restoration, when he was delivered, being considered on account of his sufferings as a sort of royalist.

† This year the King's mother died in France, the 10th of August, in the sixtieth year of her age. The famous Duke of Albemarle died likewise the 3d of January, and was succeeded in his estate and honour by Christopher his only son. To these deaths may be added that of the famous Prynne, the indefatigable author of more than two hundred treatises, most of them of little esteem.

‡ The Parliament of Scotland met the same day with that of England. The Duke of Lauderdale; the King's High-Commissioner, made so great a figure in this reign, both in England and Scotland, that his character must not be thought foreign to our history. John Maitland Earl (afterwards Duke) of Lauderdale, was, during the troubles in Scotland, a rigid Presbyterian, a zealous covenanter, and a distinguished enemy of the royal authority. But he turned to the King's interest in 1647, when Duke Hamilton invaded England, for the service of Charles I. From that time, he was looked upon in Scotland as an enemy of his country. But, after the arrival of Charles II. in Scotland, and the composure of the differences between the Scots, he followed the King into England, was taken at the battle of Worcester, and confined in several prisons, till the King's Restoration. During his imprisonment he had great impressions of religion on his mind. But, after the King had received him into his favour and council, he so entirely wore them out, that scarcely any trace of them was left. Whether he knew the secret sentiments of the King and Duke of York, with regard to religion, and the government, or only suspected them, he imagined, the best way to preserve his favour, was to enter into all the King's supposed views, and endeavour to render him absolute in both kingdoms. Upon the King's Restoration, it was debated in council, whether Episcopacy should be restored in Scotland. The Earl of Lauderdale strenuously opposed it, for an extraordinary reason, namely, "That if the King pleased the Scots, he would be sure of them in order to the executing of any design he might afterwards be engaged in." This advice, though it was not followed, was acceptable to the King, and rivetted the Duke

A. D. 1669-70.] The Parliament meeting, the King told the two Houses, "That when they last met, he asked them a supply, and now asked it again with greater urgency: the uneasiness and straitness of his affairs could not continue without very ill effects to the whole kingdom. He let them know, that having fully informed himself of the expences of the last war, he could assure them, that no part of the money they had given him, had been diverted to other uses. But on the contrary, a very great sum had been raised out of his standing revenue and credit, and a very great debt contracted, and all for the war. Lastly, he recommended to them, not to suffer any occasion of difference between themselves to be revived."

The Commons, as an effectual mark of their affection for the King, voted him a supply capable to deliver him from his heavy burden. They prepared two bills, "One to lay a duty upon all wines and vinegar imported into the kingdom, from the 24th of June, 1670, to the 24th of June 1678; the other, for the advancing the sale of his Majesty's fee-farm rents, and other rents." The first is computed at five hundred and sixty thousand pounds sterling; the other, is believed to have raised more than double that sum, so that he could depend upon seventeen hundred thousand pounds. Thus the King received for the war with Holland, seven millions seven hundred and sixty thousand pounds sterling.

The difference between the two Houses being revived this session, the King, fearing the consequences, summoned both Houses to Whitehall, and proposed to them an expedient to end it; namely, by erasing all entries and records, votes and resolutions concerning Skinner's affair, to which they consented, and thereby the quarrel was appeased, which was agreed to, and so the dispute was at an end.

This agreement produced an address, presented jointly to the King by both Houses the 11th of March, to pray him to give order for the suppression of conventicles in and near London and Westminster, and to put the laws in execution against Popish recusants. The King answered, that effectual course should be taken in both cases.

A. D. 1670.] The 11th of April the King came to the House of Peers, and passed twelve bills, among which were the two money bills, and a third for the suppression of seditious conventicles.*

After passing these acts, the King adjourned the Parliament to the 24th of October.

It seems, that the King, instead of being zealous for the Protestant religion, was anxious to overturn it. Instead of destroying the Presbyterians, his design was to grant them an indulgence, in order to have a pretence to procure the same for the Papists. Instead of being content with the power ascribed him by the Parliament, he thought it unworthy a King to found the extent of his authority upon acts of Parliament only. Besides, it was a pain to him to be forced to demand money, and to use for that purpose pretences notoriously false, though the Parliament seemed to be satisfied with them. It would have been more agreeable to him to say, "It is my will and pleasure," than to be obliged to use humble intreaties to the Commons. This his favourites were continually representing to him, and to this the example of what he had himself seen practised in neighbouring states strongly prompted him. He was therefore impatient to free himself from this yoke of the Parliament, and the more, as by augmenting his power, he should be better able to countenance the Papists, and introduce their religion, which was his own as well as his brother's.

This resolution being taken, the King easily saw, that the execution of it required an artful and cautious conduct, and such secret and imperceptible methods, as would not too plainly discover his intentions. For he could not suppose, that because he desired to be absolute, the people of England would immediately give up their liberties and privileges. It was therefore necessary, to lead them to it insensibly and by degrees, and to that end he wanted a secret council composed of few persons, in whom he might entirely confide, and whose interest it was to accomplish this design. The ordinary council, consisting of twenty-one persons, was not proper to conduct this affair; for, besides that some counsellors had a right to their places, as for instance the Archbishop of Canterbury, it was very difficult to engage so many persons of the first rank in such a plot. To effect therefore this undertaking with the more caution, the King established a cabinet council of five persons only, namely,

Clifford,
Arlington,
Buckingham,
Ashley,
Lauderdale.

As the initial letters of these five names compose the word CABAL, this secret council was from thence called the Cabal. But before we proceed to the resolutions taken by this council, it will be necessary to give a brief character of the members.

Sir Thomas Clifford was a declared and known Papist, so that he took no pains to disguise his religion. It was he who, after the triple alliance was concluded, said, "Notwithstanding all this noise, we must yet have another war with Holland." As the event justified his prediction, very probably, the scheme just mentioned, was then formed, and he in the secret.

Henry Bennet, Earl of Arlington, Secretary of State, passed for a man of the least genius of the five, but this was well supplied by his great experience, and knowledge in foreign affairs. It is pretended, that being one of the King's retinue in his journey to Fontarabia in the year 1659, he was the principal instrument to induce him to change his religion. However that be, he was truly a Catholic, though, with the King, he outwardly professed the Protestant religion.

George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, the King's favourite, had a very lively wit. He might have made a great minister of state, had not his strong passion for pleasures, and all sorts of debauches, diverted him from business. But nothing could tempt him to quit a dissolute life, to which he had been used from his youth. He gloried in having no religion, and was reckoned an Atheist.†

Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper, created two years after Earl of Shaftsbury, was one of the greatest geniuses England had produced for many years. Father Orleans gives the following character of him: "He was the most capable of the five to manage any important undertaking, and was the soul of this I am now speaking of.

Duke in his favour. The resolution to restore Episcopacy having been executed, no man appeared more ardent against the Presbyterians, nor had they a more violent persecutor. It was through his means and intrigues that the Parliament, held this year in Scotland, passed an act which raised the King's supremacy higher than ever. The same Parliament approved the raising of the militia, and it was enacted, that it should be kept up, and be ready to march into any of the King's dominions, for any cause in which his Majesty's authority, power, or greatness, should be concerned; and that orders should be transmitted to them from the council, without any mention of orders from the King. It was not at first known, what could be the intent of an act which seemed to take the militia out of the King's hands, and put it into the power of the council. But it was afterwards perceived, that this was Lauderdale's contrivance, that if the King should have occasion to call in the Scottish army, it should not be necessary to send any orders himself, but that the council, upon a secret intimation, might do it without order; and then, if the design should miscarry, it should lie on the council, whom the King might disown, and so none about him be liable for it.

* The substance of this act was, that, "If any person upwards of sixteen, should be present at any assembly, conventicle, or meeting, under colour or pretence of any exercise of religion, in any other manner, than according to the liturgy and practice of the church of England, where there were five persons, or more, besides those of the household; in such cases the offenders were to pay five shillings for the first offence, and ten for the second. And the preachers and teachers in any such meetings, were to forfeit twenty pounds for the first, and forty for the second offence. And lastly, those who suffered any such conventicles in their houses, barns, yards, &c. were likewise to forfeit twenty pounds."

† Burnet says farther of him, that he had the art of turning persons and things into ridicule beyond any man of his age: he possessed the King when abroad with very ill principles, both as to religion and morality, and with a very mean opinion of his father King Charles I. whose stiffness was with him a frequent subject of raillery.

He had a vast genius, was penetrating, bold, and equally steady, both on the right and the wrong side; a constant friend, but an implacable enemy, and the more dangerous, as being void of all religion and conscience, it was the easier for him to plot, because he was not deterred by the number or enormity of any crimes, when he judged them necessary to preserve himself, or destroy those who had incurred his hatred."

The Duke of Lauderdale, whom we have before mentioned, was the most proper of the five to serve the King in this affair.

If to these five members of the Cabal are joined, as in reason they ought, the King and the Duke of York, it will be found, that all the seven were for an absolute and arbitrary government; and that, with regard to religion, four were Papists, namely, the King, the Duke, Arlington, and Clifford, and three without any religion, or at least they considered it only as an engine of state; these were Buckingham, Ashley, and Lauderdale.

It would be difficult to know the transaction of the Cabal, if Father Orleans, instructed by King James II. had not told us that a war with Holland was there resolved, in order to furnish the King with a pretence to keep on foot both land and sea forces. For it is manifest, that such a design could be accomplished, but by force or fear. The pretence for this war was to be taken from the dispute about the flag, which might easily be renewed, and from the general complaints of the English merchants concerning their commerce, of which so great use had been made for undertaking the former war. "But," adds Father Orleans, "the true reason of making this war upon Holland, was the secret correspondence between the Republicans of England and the Dutch, who were incessantly exciting them to rebellion, and to shake off the yoke of monarchy, being ever ready to support those that should attack it." This seems to contradict what the same author advances a few lines before, namely, that the true ground of this war was to furnish the King with a pretence for raising an army. There is however no contradiction: for it must be considered, that the design of the King and the cabal concerned two points, which went hand in hand, and formed properly but one design; namely, to introduce an arbitrary government, and to extirpate the Protestant religion.

Some time before, M. Colbert de Croissy, the French ambassador at London, having sounded the King and his ministers, concerning a strict alliance with his master, found them very favourably disposed, especially when he had told them, that the design of this alliance was to humble the pride of the States General. The King of France, to finish this affair so happily begun, came to Dunkirk on pretence of viewing the Risbank which was then raising; and bringing with him the Duchess of Orleans his sister-in-law, she took occasion from the neighbourhood of England to desire leave to visit her brother, which was readily granted. She was met by the King at Dover, where she arrived the 15th of May, and stayed above a fortnight amidst continual pleasures and diversions. But these diversions hindered her not from executing the commission she was charged with, which was, as it is pretended, to make a proposal to her brother in the name of his most Christian Majesty, of insuring him an absolute authority over his Parliament, and restoring the Catholic religion in his three kingdoms, as soon as the States should be sufficiently humbled. Though the conferences between the King and his sister were managed with great secrecy, the events with which they were followed, clearly discovered that this was the subject of them.

An accident which happened shortly after, seemed likely to break the good understanding between the courts of France and England. The 19th of June, the Duchess of Orleans, in perfect health, called, according to custom, for a glass of succory water, at four in the afternoon. She had no sooner drunk it, but she found herself ill, and her pain increasing, she died about two in the morning. She was universally believed to be poisoned, but the author of her death is not so unanimously agreed on, though the Duke of Orleans her husband was by many secretly accused.*

The King was soon comforted for the loss of his sister, and not thinking that this death, uncommon as it was, ought to break, or even retard, the measures taken with the court of France, he sent the Duke of Buckingham to Paris, to conclude and sign the Dover agreement. The pretence used by the Duke of Buckingham for his journey, was his desire to see France, and learn the language.

In September, Lewis XIV. made an irruption into Lorraine, by his General, Marshal de Crequi. The Duke, who had not expected to be attacked, was obliged to fly, and leave his Duchy a prey to the Marshal, who took possession in the name of his master. In vain did the Duke hope for the intercession of Charles to the King of France, in return for the money lent and given him in his exile, and for the offer to serve him with all his forces. His envoy was answered, "That the King was sorry for what had happened, and that the present violence, like the mischiefs of a sudden inundation, must be endured at this time."

The Parliament being to meet the 24th of October, the King, a few days before, published a proclamation, commanding all officers and soldiers serving in any of the armies of the late usurped powers, not having a constant habitation, to depart out of the cities of London and Westminster, and not to return again or come within twenty miles, till after the 10th day of December next, and in the mean time to carry no sword, pistol, or any other arms. This was to show the Houses his care of their preservation.

The Parliament assembling, the King, after a short speech to both Houses, referred all to the Lord Keeper. That minister much insisted on the King's great want of supply; the mighty increase of the naval power of France, now triple what it was before the last war with Holland; the decay of the English navy; the necessity of fitting out next year a fleet of fifty sail; the obligations which the King lay under by several treaties to exert himself for the common good of Christendom. Among other treaties, he mentioned the triple alliance, and the defensive league with the States.

The House of Commons, charmed with these representations, prepared immediately three bills, one to raise eight hundred thousand pounds by way of subsidies;† another to lay an additional excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors for six years; a third for laying impositions upon proceedings at law for nine years. These three bills were to produce to the King two millions five hundred thousand pounds sterling. But, before any bill was finished, the King adjourned the Parliament to the latter end of January.

The Prince of Orange came to London about the close of the year 1669, to pay a visit to the King his uncle. The principal motive of his journey, was to demand of the King the repayment of money lent him by the Prince his father in the time of his exile. He was graciously received, and after a stay of about three months returned into Holland.

Before his arrival, Sir William Temple was recalled from his embassy in Holland. He was not a proper instrument to be employed in the designs of the Cabal. Besides, the court was disposed to a speedy rupture with the Dutch.‡

He was a poor fisherman of Yorkshire, born in 1501, and, living in the reigns of eight Kings and Queens of England, died this year, aged 169 years, exceeding the famous Thomas Parr, who died 1635, full seventeen years.

man, "Maliciously to disable or dismember another, to put out an eye, to cut off a nose or lip, &c."* This was owing to an attempt upon Sir John Coventry, a member of the Commons, in the street, in which his nose was slit. The perpetuation of this act was, by the King's order, committed to the Duke of Monmouth his natural son, and the Duke had employed some other persons, who, after the deed, retired to his house†.

The 14th of February the King sent a message to the House of Commons to hasten the money bills. But the House thought proper, before these bills were presented to the King, to address him concerning the growth of Popery, for which the concurrence of the Lords was obtained.

A few days after, the King published a proclamation, which ran much in the same stile with those that had been issued on this occasion, and was no better observed.

This affair being ended, the Commons proceeded upon the three money bills, and as if these had not been sufficient to supply the King's extreme wants, they afterwards added a fourth, for impositions on foreign commodities.

The two first money bills, namely, the subsidy bill, and the additional tax upon beer, and other liquors, being ready, the King came to the House of Lords the 6th of March, and passed these two acts, with another, "For revesting the power of granting wine licences in his Majesty's heirs and successors, and for settling a revenue on his royal highness in lieu thereof," which amounted to twenty-four thousand pounds a year.‡

There still remained two other money bills, which had been sent to the Lords, one for "impositions on proceedings at law," and another for "an additional imposition upon several foreign commodities." The first bill passed the House of Lords without any difficulty. But the second occasioned a violent contest between the two Houses. Against this bill the merchants of London appealed by petition before the House of Lords. The Lords entered into their reasons, and began to make amendments on the bill sent up by the Commons. This attempt was highly resented by the Lower House, as an encroachment on the right, which they pretended to possess alone, of granting money to the crown. Many remonstrances passed between the two Houses; and by their altercations the King was obliged to prorogue the Parliament to the 16th of April, 1672, and afterwards by several prorogations to the 4th of February 1672-3.

Anne Hyde, Duchess of York, daughter to the Earl of Clarendon, died the 31st of March in the 34th year of her age, after an abjuration of the Protestant religion during her long indisposition. From her marriage proceeded eight children, two of which only survived her, Mary and Anne, who were both Queens of England.

The Duke of York was a Papist before the King's restoration. It was a secret for some time, but had now been so divulged, that it was openly talked of in the court and country. Soon after the death of his Duchess he made a formal abjuration of the Protestant religion before Father Simons an English Jesuit, and from that time openly declared himself a Papist.§

After the prorogation of the Parliament, the Cabal sought with all possible ardor, means to execute their projects. These were, first, to render the King absolute, or in their language, a great Prince: and under this article was comprised, the establishment of Popery, if not the entire destruction of the Protestant religion. The second project was to break the triple alliance. The third, to make war upon Holland, though it was difficult to invent any the least plausible pretence. To execute the two last, Mr. Henry Coventry, who had been plenipotentiary at the treaty of Breda, was sent to Sweden, and Sir George Downing to the Hague. Temple, as we have said, was recalled, but, to amuse the States, the King feigned to send for Temple only to be informed of some matters, and that he should immediately return. At last, he was openly recalled, and obtained leave for his wife and children to come over who were still at the Hague. The recalling of Temple, and sending of Downing in his place, sufficiently discovered the King's intentions.‖ The first was extremely beloved in Holland, as he had always behaved with integrity, and a concern for the common interests of both nations. The second had served as an instrument to engage the King and the States in the late war, and was looked upon in Holland as a man of no honour, and a real incendiary. Meanwhile Downing being arrived at the Hague, was not wanting in protestations, that the King his master was resolved to maintain the triple alliance, and if he was equipping a fleet, it was wholly owing to the great preparation of his neighbours, and particularly the King of France, of whom he had just cause to be jealous. But withal, he failed not to complain of the obstinacy of the Dutch, upon an affair of little importance, concerning the colony of Surinam; adding some complaints of the English merchants against the Dutch East India company. These were the two articles on which the King intended to found a rupture, but as he did not think them of sufficient weight, he projected to draw the States into a sort of insult upon him, which might give him a more plausible pretence for a war.

To this end, the King having granted Sir William Temple a yacht to bring over his lady, the Admiralty gave express orders to the Captain to go in quest of the Dutch fleet, then at sea, and if they refused to strike, to fire upon them. The Captain met with them as he was returning with the ambassadress and her children. When he saw, the fleet paid no regard to the King's yacht, he fired several shots at them. Mr. de Ghent, who commanded the fleet, surprised at this insult, sent a boat to the yacht to know the meaning of it The Captain only answered, he had his instructions, and was bound to follow them. Upon this Mr. de Ghent

* This was afterwards called the Coventry act.

† The persons that committed this act, were, Sir Thomas Sandys, Charles Obrian, Esq. Simon Parry, and Miles Reeves, who all, fled from justice. The reason of his usage, it seems, was this: he was an opposer of the money bills, and when passed, moved the laying a tax on the play houses, which were become nests of prostitution. This was opposed by the court: it was said, the players were the King's servants, and a part of his pleasure. Coventry asked, whether did the King's pleasure lie among the men or women players? This was carried with great indignation to court. It was said, this was the first time the King was personally reflected on: if it was passed over, more of the same kind would follow. Whereupon, the forementioned persons were sent to watch for Sir John, and leave a mark upon him. He defended himself so well, that he got more credit by it, than by all the actions of his life. His nose was so nicely needled up, that the scar was hardly to be discovered. The Commons put a clause in the bill, that it should not be in the King's power to pardon the persons concerned.

‡ There was also passed at the same time, among others, an act to prevent the malicious burning of houses, stacks of corn, and killing or maiming of cattle.

§ His inducement, as it is said, to make public profession of this religion, was this. The King had, for some years, even before Clarendon's disgrace, entertained a secret design of divorcing his Queen, whom he had never loved. He had communicated this design to some of his confidents, but it was always opposed by the Earl of Clarendon. After the removal of that minister, the King finding himself more free, persisted in his design, which, as it is affirmed, was encouraged by the Papists, and approved by the court of Rome. One pretence for this divorce, was, that the Queen had been pre-engaged to another, who however was not named. It was also pretended, she was incapable of having children, though she had twice miscarried. But, as these facts are very difficult to be proved, the King was assisted to find a more plausible pretence; which was, to lay snares to betray the Queen into such freedoms, as might be the ground of an accusation of adultery. But the King could not resolve to use a method so unjust, and dishonourable. The priests and jesuits who were continually about the Duke of York, had long pressed him to make open profession of the Roman Catholic religion, but had not yet been able to succeed, because the Duke saw, it would make him forfeit the affection of most of the English. At last, upon the Duke of York's refusal, they strenuously laboured the affair of the divorce, and caused, as it is said, the Pope to promise his consent. When the business was thus far advanced, they intimated to the Duke of York, that they were able either to effect or hinder the King's divorce, and would undertake the latter, if he would make open profession of the Catholic religion. This, as it is pretended, engaged him to declare himself a Papist, being apprehensive, that if the King should be divorced from his Queen, he would marry again, and have legitimate children.

‖ Mr. De Witt told Sir William's secretary, that he should take Sir William's stay or coming back for certain signs of what the King's intentions were, towards the preserving or changing the measures he had taken with the States.

went to the yacht on pretence of paying a compliment to the ambassadress, which being performed, he talked with the Captain, and was answered as before. The Admiral replied, he had no orders from his masters in that point, and did not know how the affair was agreed between his Majesty and the States; but though it were settled, the Captain could not pretend the fleet should strike to a yacht, which was but a pleasure boat, and could not pass for a man of war. The fleet did not fire a single shot at the yacht, and the Captain pursued his course, pleased that he had come off so well.

Besides the two millions and a half granted to the King by the Parliament, the King of France, if Abbot Primi is to be credited, sent him also a considerable sum to enable him to equip a fleet much superior to that of the States. So the King thought only of war, though he endeavoured to remove all suspicion of his having any such design. He spent the whole summer, and part of the autumn, in progress through several parts of his kingdom. The 28th of May he celebrated the feast of St. George in a very solemn manner at Windsor, and installed in the order of the garter, the King of Sweden, and the Elector of Saxony, by their proxies, and after them the young Duke of Albemarle. He also made a visit to the University of Cambridge, where he was magnificently entertained, and to several other places. After his return, both their Majesties were invited to the Lord Mayor's feast, on the 30th of October, where no cost was spared to display the grandeur and riches of the city of London.

Before we proceed to the transactions of the next year, we must take notice of an attempt, the most extraordinary that could possibly be devised by a private man—That of Blood, a famous villain, robber, and assassin, who formed the design of stealing the crown, sceptre, and globe, which are kept in the Tower. With the assistance only of two or three more, he executed this design so dexterously, that they had got out of the Tower with their booty, before they were seized.* The Duke of Ormond, when he was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, having caused some of Blood's accomplices to be hanged, who intended to surprise the castle of Dublin, Blood swore he would revenge their deaths. For this purpose, Blood followed the Duke of Ormond into England, when he was recalled, and watched him so well, that with the assistance of seven or eight persons on horseback, he stopped his coach, in the night, as he was going to Clarendon house, where he lived, knocked down his footmen, and forced the Duke up behind one of the horsemen, in order to carry him to Tyburn, and hang him there, with a paper pinned on his breast, to show the cause of this execution. But the Duke forcibly throwing himself off the horse, with the villain who had tied the Duke fast to him, defeated the design, and the authors could never be discovered till after Blood's attempt upon the crown. This attempt was very extraordinary, but the King's conduct on that occasion was still more surprising. For having a curiosity to examine Blood himself, he ordered him to be brought to Whitehall, and put several questions to him, which the villain answered with astonishing boldness, confessing all, and unconcernedly relating the circumstances of the thing. Then, the King asked him, whether he knew the authors of the attempt upon the Duke of Ormond? Blood confessed, it was himself. Not content with this, he told the King, he had been engaged in a design to kill him with a carbine, from behind the reeds by the Thames-side above Battersea, where he often went to swim. But that when he had taken his stand in the reeds for that purpose, his heart was checked with an awe of Majesty, and he did not only relent himself, but diverted his associates from the design. He also told the King, he was prepared to suffer death, as having deserved it; but he must tell his Majesty, that he had hundreds of accomplices, who had bound themselves by a horrible oath, to revenge the death of any of the fraternity, upon those who should bring them to justice; which would expose his Majesty and all his ministers, to the daily fear and expectation of a massacre. On the contrary, if he spared the lives of a few persons, his own would be secure. The King was surprised, and probably, intimidated by Blood's discourse, and thought, doubtless, the attempt of this villain on the Duke of Ormond, to revenge the death of his accomplices, might be imitated, in revenge of his death, by his surviving comrades. However this be, the King sent the Earl of Arlington to the Duke of Ormond, to desire him not to prosecute Blood, which the Duke could not refuse. Afterwards, he gave him his pardon, and not content with saving his life, conferred on him five hundred pounds a year in land in Ireland. From this time, Blood was continually at court, and the King treated him with that freedom and familiarity, that many persons applied to him for favours from the King. This gave occasion to the King's enemies to say, that he kept this villain about him, to intimidate those who should dare to offend him in things which were not punishable by law, as had been practised in the case of Sir John Coventry, for some railleries upon him in the House of Commons. As for Edwards, the keeper of the crown, a man fourscore years old, who had done his utmost, though in vain, to hinder the theft, and had received so many wounds, that he was left for dead, the King contented himself with assigning him a reward of two hundred pounds, the payment of which was so long delayed, that the poor man died before he received it.†

The league against Holland was still kept so secret, that the States could only suspect it. The design of the Allies was to begin with the ruin of the Dutch, before declaration of war, and then to attack them altogether, at the same time, and in different places. The King of France, the Elector of Cologne, and the Bishop of Munster, were to invade them by land, and the English and French fleets jointly to attack them by sea. This was the project, but it met with an unforeseen difficulty. Though Charles had received two millions five hundred thousand pounds from the Parliament, and seven hundred thousand pounds from the King of France, he was still in want. Indeed, he had applied part of the money received, to the equipment of his fleet, which could not amount to half, and it was difficult to conceive, what was become of the rest. However this be, he signified to his ministers, that he could not begin the war without fifteen hundred thousand pounds, and as he could not apply to the Parliament, which was prorogued, he promised the Treasurer's staff, to the person who should invent the means of raising that sum. Sir Thomas Clifford proved the most happy and ingenious. He went to the King, and told him, that by shutting up

* The manner of Blood's stealing the crown was thus: he went to the Tower in a clergyman's habit, with a woman whom he called his wife, and who, he pretended, wanted to see the crown; and having seen it, she feigned to be taken with a qualm, and desired Mr. Edwards, the keeper of the crown, to send for some spirits, who immediately caused his wife to fetch some, of which she drank, and being invited to repose herself on a bed, she did so, and soon recovered. At their departure, they were very thankful for this civility. Three days after, Blood came with a present of gloves from his wife, and having thus begun an acquaintance, he improved it by frequent visits. At last, he told Mr. Edwards, that he had a mind to make a match between a nephew of his, and Mr. Edwards's daughter, which nephew, he said, had three hundred pounds a year. Accordingly, a day was appointed for the young couple to see each other. Blood came with three more, armed with rapier blades in their canes, and every one a dagger, and a pair of pocket pistols. One of the fellows stayed at the door, and the others went in. Blood told Mr. Edwards, he would not go up stairs till his wife came down, and desired him, in the meantime, to shew his friends the crown, to pass away the time. As soon as they were in the room, and the door shut as usual, they immediately gagged the old man, and knocked him down for endeavouring to make a noise. One of the companions put the globe in his breeches, Blood kept the crown under his gown, and the third was filing the sceptre, (being too long to manage) when their companion without gave them notice, that young Mr. Edwards was just come home, and gone up stairs; upon which they all made off with the crown and globe. But old Edwards getting up and making a noise, they were pursued and taken, as they were making to their horses, which waited at the Iron Gate in St. Katherine's. Blood, though he saw himself a prisoner, had the impudence to struggle for the crown.

† In the course of this year, died two famous generals, distinguished by their bravery and experience in the civil wars. The first was the Lord Fairfax, the Generalissimo, and the other Edward Montague, Earl of Manchester. This year also died William Seymour, Duke of Somerset.

the Exchequer he would be sure of that sum. The King readily understood this advice, and resolving to follow it, performed his promise, and made Clifford, Lord-Treasurer. Some however ascribe this project to the Lord Shaftsbury, and say, that Clifford having artfully drawn it from him, gloried in it to the King.*

A. D. 1671-2.] But Charles had in his thoughts a project which would furnish him with still more considerable sums. This was to surprize the Dutch fleet returning from Symrna richly laden, before any declaration of war. He had practised the same thing the last year, with regard to the Bourdeaux fleet, and received a great advantage from it. This fleet being much richer, inspired him with great expectation. To this end he put to sea thirty-six men of war, under the command of Holmes, who had orders to cruise in the Channel, and intercept this fleet. Holmes being informed that the Dutch fleet approached, divided his own into three squadrons. That of Holland consisted of seventy-two sail of merchant-ships, many of which had no guns, under the convoy of five men of war, commanded by experienced officers. These drew up the merchant-men in three squadrons, in good order, and put themselves between them and the English fleet, after having enjoined them to pursue their course without breaking their line. Holmes attacked this fleet the 13th of March, and fought the whole day without gaining the least advantage The next day at nine in the morning the fight was renewed, and lasted all the day, though on the side of the Dutch, Captain De Haes, who acted as Admiral, had been killed about noon. On the side of the English the Vice-Admiral's ship was disabled. On the morrow, at eight in the morning, Holmes, who had been reinforced by some frigates, renewed the engagement, and at last took a man of war, the Captain and most of the sailors being slain, and three merchant ships which were brought into the Thames. This was all the advantage the English received from an action, which reflected much discredit on the King. It was carefully published at London, that this engagement was but an effect of chance, because the Dutch refused to strike. The King, however, instead of repairing the injury done to the States, in seizing their ships before the war was declared, sent out a squadron to meet four Dutch India-men, which were immediately taken and condemned. At the same time, he ordered all the Dutch ships in his ports to be seized, though by an express article of the treaty of Breda, no merchant-men's ships were to be taken till six months after a declaration of war. The States, seduced by so ill an example, seized also the English ships. But, upon the strong representation of some of the deputies, how much the honour of Princes and States was wounded by these depredations, and that the King of England's acting against the faith of treaties, was not a sufficient reason to engage the States to imitate so blameable a conduct, the English ships were discharged and sent into England. The King could not then help releasing some of the Dutch ships, but did not restore all.

Charles resolved to make use of his supreme power in ecclesiastical matters: a power, he said, which was not only inherent in him, but which had been recognized by several acts of Parliament. By virtue of this authority, he issued a proclamation; suspending the penal laws enacted against all non-conformists, or recusants whatsoever; and granting to the Protestant dissenters, the public exercise of their religion, to the Catholics the exercise of it in private houses. A fruitless experiment of this kind, opposed by the Parliament, and retracted by the King, had already been made a few years after the restoration; but Charles expected that the Parliament, whenever it should meet, would now be tamed to greater submission, and would no longer dare to controul his measures. Meanwhile the dissenters, the most inveterate enemies of the court, were mollified by these indulgent maxims: and the Catholics, under their shelter, enjoyed more liberty than the laws had hitherto allowed them.

Two days after, the King published his declaration of war against the States, dated the 17th of March.†

This war was so contrary to the interests of England and all Europe, the defence of which Charles had so often boasted to undertake by means of the triple-league; it was so directly opposite to justice, equity, faith, and the religion of the English, publicly professed by the King, that no man could believe it till the blow was struck. The Hollanders imagined, he only intended to exact some money from them, or at most, to intimidate them in order to oblige them to restore the Prince of Orange his nephew to the post enjoyed by his ancestors. France herself could hardly believe, but that he intended to deceive her, till he had fallen upon the Smyrna fleet. But all were mistaken in ascribing to the King any affection for his people. His sole aim was to render himself absolute, in order to enjoy all the riches of England without controul, and without any obligations to his Parliament. The Duke of York, his presumptive heir, found his account in so fine a scheme, and, besides, thought of establishing his religion, for which he was excessively zealous. As for the Cabal, they were men entirely destitute of all principles of honour, justice, or religion, each of whom was solely intent upon making his fortune by sacrificing the interest of the public.

The same day that the declaration of war against the States was published at London, the like was published at Paris, founded upon no juster grounds. For the King of France gave no other reason of the war, than his displeasure at the conduct of the States.

About a month after, the Bishop of Munster also proclaimed war against the Dutch, on pretence, that they had endeavoured to corrupt the Governors of his frontier-places. As for the Elector of Cologne, he had already introduced French troops into his dominions, to provide, as he pretended, for his security. But though he protested an intention to observe an exact neutrality, the States were perfectly informed of his treaty with France. Thus these four Princes were united for the utter destruction of the Republic of the United-Provinces, without mentioning several Princes of Germany engaged by the King of France to stand neutral, that they might not assist Holland.

The States having some time foreseen this impending storm, had endeavoured to divert it, by giving the King of England all the satisfaction he could reasonably expect. They had offered to agree to whatever he desired concerning the flag, and besides, they had on the 24th of February, made the Prince of Orange Captain-General, and Admiral, though he was then but twenty-two

* It had been usual for the bankers to carry their money to the Exchequer, and to advance it upon security of the funds, by which they were afterwards reimbursed, when the money was levied on the public. The bankers, by this traffic, got eight, sometimes ten, per cent. for sums which either had been consigned to them without interest, or which they had borrowed at six per cent. profits, which they daily paid for by this egregious breach of public faith. The income was so suddenly taken, that none had warning of the danger. A general confusion prevailed in the city, followed by the ruin of many. The bankers stopped payment; the merchants could answer no bills; distrust took place every where, with a stagnation of commerce, by which the public was universally affected. And many, full of dismal apprehensions, asked each other, what must be the scope of those mysterious counsels, whence the Parliament, and all men of honour were excluded, and which commenced by the forfeiture of public credit, and an open violation of the most solemn engagements, both foreign and domestic.

† Reasons more false and frivolous never were employed to justify a flagrant violation of treaty. Some complaints are there made of injuries done to the East India company, which yet that company disavowed: the detention of some English in Surinam is mentioned, though it appears that these persons had voluntarily remained there: the refusal of a Dutch fleet, on their own coasts, to strike to an English yacht, is much aggravated: and to piece up all these pretensions, some abusive pictures are mentioned, and represented as a ground of quarrel. The Dutch were long at a loss what to make of this article; till it was discovered, that a portrait of Cornelius de Wit, brother to the pensionary, painted by order of certain magistrates of Dort, and hung up in a chamber of the town house, had given occasion to this complaint. In the perspective of this portrait, the painter had drawn some ships on fire in a harbour. This was construed to be Chatham, where De Wit had really distinguished himself, and had acquired honour; but little did he imagine, that, while the insult itself, committed in open war, had so long been forgiven, the picture of it should draw such severe vengeance upon his country. The conclusion of this manifesto, where the King still professed his resolution of adhering to the triple alliance, was of a piece with the rest of it.

years of age. They believed, this would suffice to content the King his uncle, for they were yet ignorant that his design was to overturn their Republic, without any regard to the interests of the Prince of Orange. This change in favour of the young Prince, would, perhaps, have never been made, had it not been deemed necessary to appease the King of England. There were three parties in Holland: that of the Pensionary, (which was the more powerful, and called the Louvestein party, from the name of the castle where the Prince's father had confined the leading men of this faction:) that of the Prince of Orange; and a third which affected a neutrality, and had hitherto joined with neither of the two first, but on this occasion believed it necessary to join with the second, in hopes of satisfying the King of England. The States therefore sent a deputation to the Prince, to offer him the dignities of Captain General, and Admiral; and the Pensionary de Wit, to his mortification, was appointed head of this deputation. Thus the Prince of Orange saw himself Captain-General, but without an army, or at least, with an army so inconsiderable, and filled for the most part with inexperienced officers, chosen more for their attachment to the Pensionary, than their personal merit.

The King of France took the field the beginning of May; made himself master of several places on the Rhine, without almost any opposition; and swimming that river, subdued all Guelderland with the towns upon the Yssel, and at last arrived at Utrecht, which had sent deputies to Doesburgh to offer their submission to his orders. At the same time, the Bishop of Munster, after ravaging the Province of Overyssel, invaded Friseland and Groninghen, so that only Holland and Zealand remained free, of which the former was threatened with a like invasion.

But this was not all the States had to fear. Whilst three of their Provinces were lost, and two others attacked, the danger from sea was no less. The two fleets from France and England joined the beginning of May; the first consisting of forty, and the last of a hundred, men of war. That of the States had seventy-two large ships, and forty frigates and fireships, and consequently was very inferior in number to the combined fleet of England and France. It was commanded by the famous Ruyter, assisted by Cornelius de Wit, the Pensionary's brother, as deputy from the States. Ruyter having put to sea before the enemies' fleets were joined, had endeavoured to prevent the junction. But not succeeding, and being informed, that the two fleets lay at anchor in Solebay in Suffolk, he resolved to attack them. He had like to have surprized them, but being disappointed, prepared for battle. The two fleets of France and England (now composing but one) were ranged in three squadrons. The Duke of York, High-Admiral of England, commanded the red squadron; the Count de'Estrees, the white; and the Earl of Sandwich, the blue. The fleet of the States was likewise divided in the same manner; Ruyter was opposed to the Duke of York, Bankert to Count d'Etrees, and Van Ghent, to the Earl of Sandwich. In this battle, fought the 28th of May, both sides displayed all the art and skill which experience had taught the commanders and officers; they fought with equal bravery, with almost equal loss, and both sides challenged the victory. The Admiral-ship of the English being disabled, the Duke of York was obliged to hoist his flag in the London. The Royal James, commanded by the Earl of Sandwich, not being able to disengage from a fire-ship, after she had sunk two, was blown up, with the Earl and her whole crew.* The English lost two ships more, the Hollanders three, and Van Ghent was killed. Bonfires were equally made at London, and the Hague, for the success of this battle, though with very little reason. The English complain, the French did not discharge their duty, and only fought at a distance, after having separated from the fleet. This conduct is ascribed to secret orders given to Count d'Estrees, not to expose too much his Majesty's ships, but to leave the English and Dutch fleets to destroy one another.†

Some time before, the King had created the Earl of Lauderdale, Duke of the same name; the Lord Ashley Cooper, Earl of Shaftsbury; the Lord Arlington, Earl of Arlington; and Sir Thomas Clifford, Lord Clifford. About the same time Sir Thomas Osborn was sworn into the Privy-Council, and the new Duke of Lauderdale, and the Earl of Arlington, received the Order of the Garter. This was doubtless, to recompence these members of the cabal, for their great services, in advising him to suspend, by his whole authority, the execution of two acts of Parliament,‡ till he should think fit to take off the suspension.

We have already taken notice of the sad condition of the States of the United Provinces. There were two Provinces, Guelderland, and Utrecht, in the power of the French. Overyssel was in the hands of the Elector of Cologne, and the Bishop of Munster. The two Provinces of Frieseland and Groninghen were not only threatened, but attacked. In short, the Province of Holland found no readier way to stop the progress of the French King,§ who was at Utrecht, than by opening the sluices, and laying the country under water.‖ This melancholy situation of affairs raised a great discontent in the people of Holland, and as the Pensionary de Wit had been many years at the head of the government, all the calamities of his country were charged to his ill conduct. Moreover, the people openly accused him of betraying his country. At last, this general discontent rose into sedition, and caused the States of Holland to annul the perpetual edict made in the year 1667, by which they had obliged themselves never to own the Prince of Orange for Stadtholder, and to dispense with that oath; after which the Prince was made Stadtholder. Some time after, the two brothers, Cornelius, and John de Wit, the first grand bailiff of Putten, and the other Pensionary of Holland, but who had lately thrown up his employ, were torn in pieces by the mob of the Hague. It suffices to say, the Prince of Orange remained in peaceable possession of the government of Holland and Zealand; for Frieseland, and Groninghen had a separate Stadtholder, namely, the young Prince John Casimir of Nassau, under the tuition of the Princess his mother, and three Provinces were in the hands of the enemy.

The King of France, who had ever feared the Prince of Orange's advancement, no sooner saw him invested with his eminent dignity, than he endeavoured to corrupt him with the offered sovereignty of Holland. But he found this young Prince deaf to all his offers, and resolute to serve the State which had intrusted him with its government, to the last moment of his life. The King of England seconded his ally in this design. The States had sent Ambassadors to him with proposals of peace, as they had also to the King of France at Utrecht. But the King, after a refusal to treat but in conjunction with France, and fearing the States' design was to disunite them, or render them jealous of each

* Of the thousand men on board, six hundred were killed on the deck. When the ship was on fire, the Earl retired to his cabin, where he was followed by his Captain Sir Richard Haddock, who finding him with a handkerchief before his eyes, told him of the danger; but he answered, "He saw how things went, and was resolved to perish with the ship." It seems, the day before the Earl observing, that the English fleet rode in Solebay, in danger of being surprised by the Dutch, advised, that they should weigh anchor, and get out to sea. But the Duke of York, slighting the advice, told the Earl, "That he spake that out of fear:" which the Earl is thought to have so highly resented, that it rendered him careless of his own safety.

† There were two English ships burnt, three sunk, and one taken; and of the French, one was burnt, and another sunk. The English also lost the Captains of the following ships; of the Henry, Cambridge, Prince, St. George, Ann, Triumph, and Alice. They lost also the Lord Maidstone, Mr. Montagne, Sir Philip Cartwright, Sir Charles Harbord, Mr. Cotterel, Mr. Napier, &c.——The body of the Earl of Sandwich was discovered by one of the King's ketches, (being known by the George he had on) and being taken up, and brought to Harwich, was thence removed to London, and solemnly buried in Westminster abbey.

other, dispatched the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Arlington, and Lord Hallifax into Holland, on pretence of treating of a peace jointly with France. These Ambassadors passing through the Hague, in their way to Utrecht, affected to give out, that they were come to bring peace. But when they came to treat, their proposals were so exorbitant, that it was evident peace was not the King's view in this embassy. It was rather to draw closer the alliance between France and England, and concert new measures for the prosecution of the war, as the sequel clearly discovered. In repassing through the Hague, the Duke of Buckingham asked the Prince, what it was he proposed to himself in the desperate situation of his country. To which the Prince replied, "That it was true, their condition was dangerous, but he had one way still not to see its ruin completed, and that was to die in the last dyke." It is reported, the same Duke, in a visit to the Princess of Orange, having told her that they were good Hollanders, was immediately answered by her, "That was more than they asked, which was only that they should be good Englishmen." For this war was so evidently contrary to the interest of England, that the English themselves openly murmured at it.

In the meantime, the King of France seeing, that the drowning of Holland put a stop to his conquests, marched his army into Flanders, leaving the Duke of Luxemburgh at Utrecht, and came to Paris in August, attended by the Duke of Monmouth, who, in pursuance of Charles's engagement in their treaty, had brought him at the opening of the campaign, six thousand effective men.

The States had some success against the Bishop of Munster; but their affairs were reduced to a wretched condition, and the neighbourhood of the Duke of Luxemburgh, scarcely gave them time to breathe. Their whole refuge lay in the alliances they expected to make with the Emperor, Spain, and some Princes of Germany, and in the hopes that the English Parliament which was to meet, according to the prorogation, the 30th of October, would see the interest of England, and of all Europe. But the King deprived them of this last resource, by proroguing the Parliament to February.

The 4th of December the King declared in Council, that he would raise more forces, and dispose of them in convenient quarters, to be employed on occasion. And for payment of them, he ordered that the Exchequer should continue shut till the 1st of May, 1673, though he had positively promised it should be opened the beginning of the year.

The ways and means used by the King to effect a peace, consisted, in that his two Ambassadors at Utrecht were contented to demand in his name, a million of pounds sterling, for the expences of the war; the compliment of the flag without any exception; a hundred thousand pounds yearly for the liberty of fishing; the sovereignty of all that should remain of the United Provinces, for his nephew the Prince of Orange; a participation of the whole of the India trade; the town of Sluis, the Isles of Cadsant, Walcheren, Goree, Voorne, and lastly, an entire satisfaction to the King of France.

Sir John Trevor dying this year, Sir Henry Coventry, lately returned from Sweden, where he had successfully negotiated for the King, succeeded him in the office of Secretary of State.

Sir Orlando Bridgeman resigning the Great Seal, the new Earl of Shaftsbury was made Lord-High Chancellor.* A few days after, the King performed his promise to Clifford, by making him Lord-Treasurer.

Hitherto the Cabal had sailed with a prosperous gale on a very dangerous sea, famous for wrecks, without any opposition. But at last they were stopped in their course by the Parliament. It was now almost two years since the Parliament was assembled, and as, in that interval, the King had taken some steps which instilled great fears into his subjects, the new session was expected with the utmost impatience, in hopes, that the Parliament would apply proper remedies to the present evils, and find means to prevent those with which the kingdom was still threatened. The Parliament therefore met the 4th of February, and chose a Speaker by the direction of the court, Sir Edward Turner, the last Speaker, having been made Chief Baron of the Exchequer. The choice falling upon Sir Job Charleton, he desired to be excused; but the Lord Chancellor Shaftsbury told him, before the King and both Houses, that no excuses would be admitted. "The conjuncture of time, (says he,) and the King's and kingdom's affairs, require such a House of Commons, and such a Speaker. For, with reverence to the Holy Scripture, the King may on this occasion say, 'he that is not with me is against me:' For he that doth not now put his hand and heart to support the King in the common cause of this kingdom, can hardly ever hope for such another opportunity, or find a time to make satisfaction for the omission of this." Presently after the King addressed them with all the appearance of cordiality and confidence. He said, that he would have assembled them sooner, had he not been desirous to allow them leisure for attending to their private affairs, as well as to give his people respite from taxes and impositions: that since their last meeting, he had been forced into a war, not only just but necessary; necessary both for the honour and interest of the nation: that in order to have peace at home, while he had war abroad, he had issued his declaration of indulgence to dissenters, and had found many good effects to result from that measure: that he heard of some exceptions which had been taken to this exercise of power; but he would tell them plainly, that he was resolved to stick to his declaration; and would be much offended at any contradiction: and that though a rumour had been spread, as if the new levied army had been intended to control law and property, he regarded that jealousy as so frivolous, that he was resolved to augment his forces next spring, and did not doubt but they would consider the necessity of them in their supplies. The rest of the business he left to the Chancellor.—The Chancellor enlarged on the same topics, and added many extraordinary positions of his own. He told them, that the Hollanders were the common enemies of all monarchies, especially that of England, their only competitor for commerce and naval power, and the sole obstacle to their attaining an universal empire, as extensive as that of ancient Rome: that, even during their present distress and danger, they were so intoxicated with these ambitious projects, as to slight all treaty, nay, to refuse all cessation of hostilities: that the King, in entering on this war, did no more than prosecute those maxims which had engaged the Parliament to advise and approve of the last; and he might therefore safely say, that it was their war: that the States being the eternal enemies of England, both by interest and inclination, the Parliament had wisely judged it necessary to extirpate them, and had laid it down as an eternal maxim, that "delenda est Carthago," this hostile government by all means is to be subverted: and that though the Dutch pretended to have assurances that the Parliament would furnish no supplies to the King, he was confident that this hope, in which they extremely trusted, would soon fail them.

The House of Commons had given some indications of vigour, before the King and Chancellor had delivered their speeches. Presently after their meeting, they loudly complained of writs issued out by the Lord Chancellor, for electing and returning of persons to sit in their House, in the room of such as were dead, or removed. This complaint caused the King, immediately after the two speeches, to declare to the Commons, "That he had given order to the Lord Chancellor to send out writs, for the better supply of their House, having seen precedents for it; but if any scruple or question did arise about it, he left it to the House to debate as soon as they could." Accordingly, the next day the Commons voted those writs and returns irregular, and expelled all the members thus elected.

Though the Chancellor's speech made but little impression on the Commons, they would however show, that in demanding a redress of grievances, as was their intention, they did not act through a spirit of passion and revenge. Wherefore, though they were by no means convinced of the necessity or justice of the war undertaken by the King, they voted a supply of an eighteen months' assessment of seventy thousand pounds per month, which in all amounted to twelve hundred and sixty thousand pounds, for the King's extraordinary occasions, without specifying that it was for the support of the war. But for fear the King should prorogue them when the money-bill was passed, they resolved that the redress of grievances should keep an even pace with it.

For this purpose, the 19th of February the Commons presented an address to the King, against the declaration of indulgence, as an undue exercise of prerogative. The King defended his measure. The commons persisted in their opposition to it; and they represented, that such a practice, if admitted, might tend to interrupt the free course of the laws, and alter the legislative power, which had always been acknowledged to reside in the King and the two Houses. All men were in expectation with regard to the issue of this extraordinary affair. The King seemed engaged in honour to support his measure; and in order to prevent all opposition, he had positively declared that he would support it. The Commons were obliged to persevere, not only because it was dishonourable to be foiled, where they could plead such strong reasons, but also because, if the King prevailed in his pretensions, an end seemed to be put to all the legal limitations of constitution.

At this time, Sir Job Charleton, Speaker of the House of Commons, being taken ill, humbly prayed his Majesty, that he might be eased of the burden he was not able longer to sustain. Edward Seymour, so famous in the reign of William III. was, by the court's recommendation, chosen in his room.

The King and the cabal were extremely mistaken in imagining, that the declaration for liberty of conscience, would gain the Presbyterians, in return for so great a favour. The leaders of the Presbyterians were too wise to be taken in so palpable and dangerous a snare. It was easy for them to see, they were only designed for instruments to advance the interests of the Romish religion. When they reflected, that this favour was received from the King, the Duke of York, and the members of the Cabal, they could not believe, it flowed from a principle of religion or humanity. They saw besides so many extraordinary proceedings, so many invasions upon the rights of the people; the Papists indulged in their religion; the King making exorbitant demands upon his Parliament; an army encamped at the very gates of London * in the midst of winter; a war begun, to destroy the only Protestant State capable of supporting religion; and the Papists in the principal posts; all this sufficiently demonstrated, that the suspension of the penal laws was not for their sake. So, instead of thanking the King for this pretended favour, Alderman Love, a city member, and an eminent dissenter, spoke with great warmth against the declaration.† This declaration for liberty of conscience, wrought a great change in the House of Commons. For that House, which had been so fiercely animated against the Presbyterians, seeing them sacrifice their own, to the interest of religion and the kingdom, ordered a bill to be brought in for their ease; a bill by which all the penalties against them in the act of Uniformity were removed, and nothing required but the taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. This bill was read the first time on the 27th of February, and in a very few days was completed. But the Lords having made some amendments, the King prorogued the Parliament before these amendments could be agreed to by the Commons.

There is no plainer indication of what the Parliament thought of the designs of the court in favour of the Papists, than the address presented by both Houses to the King about the same time. This address contained, first complaints on the growth of Popery; on the great resort of Romish priests and jesuits in the kingdom; on the admission of so many recusants into places of trust, and particularly in the army. Upon this address, the King published a proclamation in the usual stile, the seventh of that kind, by which (after a declaration, that as he had always adhered to the church of England, against all temptations whatsoever, so he was resolved to maintain and defend it) he strictly commanded all jesuits and Romish priests to depart the kingdom, and the laws to be put in due execution, against all popish recusants, or justly suspected to be so, &c. This proclamation was not satisfactory to the Commons, because it extended but to one single article of their petition, without any mention of the removal of Papists from places of trust. Wherefore, they proceeded to a new bill, in order to obtain their end, being resolved not to finish the money-bill, till they had procured a redress of their grievances, and particularly a revocation of the declaration for liberty of conscience.

The King was never so perplexed since his restoration. The Cabal had promised to make him absolute, but, after all, suggested no other means, that the using of force, at all hazards. But as the Commons were proceeding, the time was come, that the King must either give way, or break with the Parliament. In this last case, he had too much sense to believe, that a handful of Papists, with a few flattering courtiers and ministers, were able to support him, at a time when he could expect no assistance from France, and when the malcontents might be countenanced by a Dutch fleet. Besides, his Exchequer was empty.

All this was very capable to hold the King in suspence. It is believed, the ladies engaged in this affair, and fearing that a rupture would deprive them of the King's bounties, strongly solicited him to recall his declaration. However that be, the King, after some hesitation, called for the declaration, and with his own hands broke the seal.

The 8th of March the King came to the Parliament, and after pressing the Commons to dispatch the money-bill, said to both Houses,—— "If there be any scruple yet remaining with you touching the suspension of the penal laws, I here faithfully promise you, that what hath been done in that particular, shall not for the future be drawn into example and consequence; and as I daily expect from you a bill for my supply, so I assure you, I shall as willingly receive and pass any other you shall offer me, that may tend to the giving you satisfaction in all your just grievances."

This speech was so agreeable to the Parliament, that both Houses went in a body and thanked the King for so full and satisfactory an answer.

But if the two Houses were pleased, the Cabal was not so. They had formed a project, and prepared a scheme to render the King absolute. They had even taken some steps towards the execution. They saw, to their great astonishment, the King was retreating, when he should have prepared for battle, and consequently the hopes of victory were entirely vanished. But this was not all they had to fear; they were in danger of being abandoned by the King, after this first step, to the resentment of the two Houses.

The Earl of Arlington had, in some measure, deserted the cabal, by his advice to the King, to revoke his declaration for liberty of conscience. The Earl of Shaftsbury soon followed him, but in a manner more surprising, more public, and with more remarkable circumstances. As soon as he saw, the King had not sufficient resolution to execute the great work which was projected, he thought it but just to forsake a Prince, who had forsaken himself, and left his counsellors exposed to danger. This was the second time the Earl had experienced the King's inconstancy, and want of resolution. This affair of the declaration was common to him with the rest of the Cabal. But the writs issued out of chancery for the election of members to fill the vacancies in Parliament, were peculiar to him. He had undertaken to issue these writs as Chancellor, on precedents which were never known, upon the King's positive promise to stand by him, and yet, he was deserted by the King, at the first instance of the Commons, or rather before their complaints.

The Earl of Shaftsbury believed, therefore, he had no other way to divert the impending storm, than by quitting the King's party, and throwing himself into the contrary. "He executed this resolution, says Father Orleans, the day after the King resolved to revoke his declaration for liberty of conscience. It was eleven at night before the King had taken his last resolution, and the next morning the Earl of Shaftsbury appeared in the House of Lords, at the head of the most violent party, against the Catholic religion, the Dutch war, and the union with France."

Immediately after this change in the Earl of Shaftsbury, the Commons passed a bill, afterwards called the Test act, intituled, "An act for preventing the dangers which may happen from Popish recusants." This act required, that all persons enjoying any office or place of trust or profit, should take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy in public and open court, and should also receive the sacrament in some Parish church, immediately after divine service; and deliver a certificate signed by the ministers and church wardens, attested by the oaths of two credible witnesses, and put upon record: and that all persons taking the said oaths of allegiance and supremacy should likewise make and subscribe this following declaration——"I do declare, that I do believe, that there is not any transubstantiation in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, or in the elements of bread or wine, at, or after the consecration thereof, by any person whatsoever."——This bill readily passed the House of Commons, and after some difficulties, was also approved by the Lords.

Besides this bill there was another preparing to prevent intermarriages between Protestants and Papists. This tended directly to break the present negotiation of the Duke of York's marriage with an Archduchess of Inspruck,* and to hinder him from marrying any other Catholic Princess. The King, in the meanwhile, was very uneasy, as he saw, the Parliament was informed of his secret resolutions, and effectual measures were taken to prevent their execution. Wherefore he quickened the Commons by several messages, to finish the money bill. But, instead of satisfying him, the Commons, having provided for the security of religion, presented him two addresses of grievances, one concerning England, the other Ireland. In the former they mentioned an arbitrary imposition on coals for providing convoys, the exercise of martial law, the quartering and pressing of soldiers; and they prayed, that after the conclusion of the war, the whole army should be disbanded. The King gave a gracious, though an evasive answer. When business was finished, the two Houses adjourned themselves.

After this the money bill passed without opposition. But, not to approve expressly the war for which this money was intended, the bill was intituled, "A supply for his Majesty's extraordinary occasions,"† and a particular proviso was tacked to it, "That no Papist should be capable of holding any public employment."

A. D. 1673.] Before the bill in favour of the Protestant dissenters and some others were ready, the King came to the Parliament the 29th of March, and passed several acts, amongst which were the money bill, the Test act, and an act for a general and free pardon, but with many exceptions. Then he adjourned the Parliament to the 20th of October.

The Test act having received the royal assent, most of the Catholic officers quitted their places. The Duke of York himself who was Lord High Admiral, resigned that profitable office, and the Lord Clifford that of High Treasurer. He retired to his paternal estate in Devonshire, where he died shortly after.

While these things passed in the Parliament, preparations for the sea war were making in England and Holland with equal ardour and vast expence. The Duke of York having resigned his office of Lord High Admiral, Prince Rupert was appointed to command the fleet. Ruyter having secret intelligence, that the English fleet would not be ready so soon, put to sea with forty-two men of war, and sixteen vessels to be sunk in the Thames.‡ He came into the mouth of the river the 2d of May, where he found he had been misinformed, and that forty-five large ships were coming to attack him. Upon this disappointment, he retired to expect the rest of his fleet at Schonevelt in Zealand. In this interval, Prince Rupert sailed to meet the French fleet coming from Brest, and joined them in the channel the 16th of May. After this junction, the combined fleet consisted of one hundred and forty sail of all sorts, of which there were thirty large French ships. The Dutch fleet had but a hundred and nine sail, namely, fifty-four large ships, fourteen frigates, twenty-four fireships, eleven advice-boats, and six galliots. This year was signalized by three naval engagements, fought with such equal loss, that neither could justly boast of victory, though both challenged it in every battle. The first was fought near Schonevelt the 28th of May. The second off Flushing the 4th of June, but this was rather a cannonading of about four hours, after which, both sides retired to their respective coasts. The third, fought the 11th of August, was the most obstinate. The English lost Vice Admiral Spragg, who was drowned in changing his ship,§ and the Dutch, Vice Admiral Sweers. The loss of the great ships in these three engagements was inconsiderable, but on both sides many lesser ones were either burnt or sunk.

The King of France took Maestricht in June, and the Prince of Orange, Naerden, a town near Amsterdam, in September, and afterwards Bonn, the residence of the Elector of Cologne, in October. These two conquests, and the necessity the King of France was under to maintain the war against Spain, (which had at last declared against him, besides that the Emperor, and several German Princes, were also upon the point of declaring for the States) obliged him to abandon all his conquests in the United Provinces, except Maestricht and Grave, where he left garrisons, after having drawn out all the rest in November.

In the mean time, a congress was held at Cologne for peace, but with no success.

The 19th of June the King, at Buckingham's recommendation, made Sir Thomas Osborne, afterwards Earl of Danby, Lord Treasurer.

The Parliament was now assembled (October 20,) and discovered much greater symptoms of ill humour than had appeared in the last session. They had seen for some time a negotiation of marriage carried on between the Duke of York and the Archduchess of Inspruck, a Catholic of the Austrian family; and they had made no opposition. But when that negotiation failed, and the Duke applied to a Princess of the House of Modena, then in close alliance with France; this circumstance, joined to so many other grounds of discontent, raised the Commons into a flame and, they remonstrated with the greatest zeal against the intended marriage. The King told them, that their remonstrance came too late; and that the marriage was already agreed on, and even celebrated by proxy. The Commons still insisted; and proceeding to the examination of the other parts of government, they voted the standing army a grievance, and declared, that they would grant no more supply, unless it appeared, that the Dutch were so obstinate as to refuse all reasonable conditions of peace.

* The articles of that marriage were concluded in October 1672; and, as the Earl of Arlington sent word to Sir William Godolphin, "upon terms somewhat incongruous as to our government here, but in substance much to his Majesty's and Royal Highness's satisfaction." But though the Princess of Inspruck's religion pleased the French King, the interest this marriage would bring with it, did not; so that he pronounced for the Princess of Modena. The Duke had, before this, made his addresses to the Lady Bellasis, who was a Protestant.

The 4th of November, the King came unexpectedly to the House of Peers, and sent for the Commons. It happened that the Speaker and the Usher of the Black Rod met both at the door of the House of Commons, but, as the Speaker was within the House, the door was immediately shut against the Usher, who came with the King's message. The Speaker was forced into the chair, and while the Usher continued knocking at the door, the House voted:

"I. That the alliance with France was a grievance.

"II. That the evil counsellors about the King were a grievance.

"III. That the Duke of Lauderdale was a grievance, and not fit to be trusted or employed in any office or place of trust."

Upon which there was a general cry, to the Question, to the Question! But, the Black Rod knocking earnestly at the door, the Speaker leaped out of the chair, and the House rose in great confusion. When the Commons came to the House of Lords, the King made a short speech to both Houses, in which he represented the great advantages which the enemy would reap from the least appearance of a difference between him and his Parliament.——He told them, he would not be wanting to let all his subjects see, "That no care could be greater than his own in the effectual suppressing of Popery." He then prorogued the Parliament to the 7th day of January following, and thus put an end to the twelfth session of this long Parliament, which had continued but nine days.

Immediately after the prorogation of the Parliament, the King took the Great Seal from the Earl of Shaftsbury, and gave it to Sir Heneage Finch, with the title of Lord Keeper. Soon after the King ordered that no person who was a Roman Catholic, or reputed to be so, should presume to come near his person or court. He likewise published a proclamation for the rigorous execution of the laws against Papists. This was the eighth of the kind since his restoration, and executed as the other seven.

But this proclamation was not capable to remove the fears occasioned by the Duke of York's marriage with the Princess of Modena, which was consummated the 21st of November, on the day of her arrival in England with the Duchess her mother.

A. D. 1673-4.] The Parliament meeting the 7th of January, the King represented to both Houses—— "That no proposals of peace from the Dutch had been yet offered with an intent to conclude, but only to amuse; that therefore, the way to a good peace, was to set out a good fleet, which there was time enough to do effectually, if the supply was not delayed.——That a speedy, a proportionable, and above all, a cheerful aid, was now more necessary than ever."

In a word, the King's and the Keeper's speeches were founded upon this principle, that the war with the States was just and necessary, and consequently to be vigorously maintained, in order to an honourable peace. The Parliament, without regarding his words, considered his actions, and laboured to take effectual measures, to prevent the execution of the court's designs. There were many things concerning which they openly expressed their fear and discontent.

I. The growth of Popery publicly encouraged by the court.

II. The exorbitant power of France, which in the end could not but prove prejudicial to England.

III. The Dutch war, undertaken directly contrary to the interest of England, and for which however the King was incessantly demanding supplies, on a supposition of its being just and necessary, though he had alledged no lawful cause for it.

IV. The management of affairs in Ireland, where the act of establishment was openly trampled upon, and Papists continually advanced or encouraged.

V. The King's proceedings in England, which were clear evidences of his principles and designs; namely, his raising a land army without any necessity; his granting liberty of conscience by his sole authority; his shutting up the Exchequer; his dispensing with acts of Parliament; his making a strict alliance with France, when he should rather have used his endeavours to oppose the increase of her greatness.

VI. The open profession of the Popish religion by the Duke of York, and his marriage with a Popish Princess, authorised by the King notwithstanding the remonstrances of the Parliament.

VII. The three ministers, still employed by the King, namely, Arlington, Buckingham, and Lauderdale, all three of the most arbitrary principles, plainly shewed, it was not for the good of the kingdom, that the King used their counsels.

These were too real causes of complaint to be silenced by the King's general protestations, on every occasion, to maintain the laws and religion. Something more substantial than words was necessary to dispel the suspicions and fears of the people and Parliament. Wherefore the Parliament began with applications for a general fast; by which they intimated, that the nation was in a very calamitous condition: they addressed against the King's guards, which they represented as dangerous to liberty, and even as illegal, since they never yet had received the sanction of Parliament: they took some steps towards establishing a new and more rigorous test against Popery; and what chiefly alarmed the court, they made an attack on the members of the Cabal, to whose pernicious counsels they attributed all their present grievances. Clifford was dead, Shaftsbury had made his peace with the country party, and was become their leader; Buckingham was endeavouring to imitate Shaftsbury; but his intentions were as yet known to very few. A motion was therefore made in the House of Commons for his impeachment: he desired to be heard at the bar; but expressed himself in so confused and ambiguous a manner, as gave little satisfaction. He was required to answer, precisely, little queries, which they proposed to him. These regarded all the articles of misconduct above mentioned; and among the rest, the following query seems remarkable: "By whose advice was the army brought up to overawe the debates and resolutions of the House of Commons?" This shews to what length the suspicions of the House were at that time carried. Buckingham, in all his answers, endeavoured to exculpate himself, and to blame Lord Arlington. He succeeded not in the former intention: the Commons voted an address for his removal. But Arlington, who was on many accounts obnoxious to the House, was attacked: articles were drawn up against him, though the impeachment was never prosecuted.

After this, the Commons proceeded to prepare a bill for a general test, by which every person refusing to take it, should be made incapable to enjoy any office civil or military, to sit in either House of Parliament, or to come within five miles of the court. The test was in these words:

"I do solemnly, from my heart, and in the presence of Almighty God profess, testify and declare, that I do not believe in my conscience that the church of Rome is the only Catholic and universal church of Christ, out of which there is no salvation; or that the Pope hath any jurisdiction or supremacy over the Catholic church in general, or over myself in particular; or that it belongs to the said church of Rome, alone to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Holy Scriptures; or that in the Holy Sacrament of the Eucharist, there is made a perfect change of the whole substance of the bread into Christ's body, or of the whole substance of the wine into Christ's blood, which change the said church of Rome calleth transubstantiation; or that the Virgin Mary, or any other saint, ought to be worshipped or prayed unto: and all these aforesaid doctrines and positions, I do renounce and disclaim, as false and erroneous, and contrary to God's word, and the Christian religion."

The King had already given his consent to an act which imposed much the same oath. But that was only for those who were in office or employment, whereas this was universally, and might be required of all suspected persons. But, before the bill was ready, the King prorogued the Parliament, and so defeated both this, and several other bills tending to the same end.

Since the States General had perceived that the Parliament approved not of the war the King was making upon them, they had never ceased to solicit the King to a separate peace, and had offered him whatever he could reasonably expect. But he first pretended to find in the offers of the States, only ambiguous or insolent propositions, and from thence took occasion to reject them. But affairs at length took a turn which obliged him to come into other measures. He did not know which way to turn himself for the continuance of the war, as he saw his Parliament little inclined to furnish the means. He therefore began by degrees, to discover, that he should not be averse to a reasonable peace, provided the States would have such regard to his honour as he had room to expect. When there was no other difficulty, the States wrote him a very submissive letter, and at the same time sent full powers to the Marquis del Fresno, the Spanish ambassador at London, to conclude a peace in their name, on the conditions already offered, but rejected by the King, on pretence they were only designed to amuse him. These proposals were so reasonable, and offered in so solemn a manner, that they could not be rejected without alarming the whole kingdom, and confirming the suspicions, which were but too general, that this war was not designed for the advantage of the people. Besides, the King's affairs required a speedy peace.*

Presently after the receipt of the States' letter, the King came to the Parliament the 24th of January, and communicated to both Houses the offers from the Dutch, desiring their advice on this affair. They answered, that it was their opinion, his Majesty should proceed in a treaty with the States, in order to a speedy peace. From that time, all difficulties relating to the peace were removed, in the conferences between the Marquis del Fresno, and the King's commissioners, and the treaty was concluded in a few days.

The Commons proceeded to take into consideration the grievances of the nation. They insisted chiefly upon keeping an army composed of regular troops, and after a vote that it was a grievance to the kingdom, they resolved to address the King for disbanding all forces raised since the year 1663. The examination of this affair gradually led them to that of the horse and foot guards, established by the King without the concurrence or approbation of the Parliament. It was found, that they were of vast charge to the King and kingdom: that they were a standing army in disguise, which might be easily augmented: that guards were only in use in arbitrary governments: that they were altogether useless, as appeared from the King's daily trusting his person to his people without a guard.

This debate was interrupted by the King's coming to the House of Peers, the 11th of February. The Commons being sent for, the King communicated to both Houses, that he had signed the peace with the Dutch. He told them moreover, in answer to their address concerning the forces, that he had given orders for disbanding even more than were desired, and for sending back the Irish regiments. He added, that he must needs acquaint them, that there was a great want of capital ships, and he should be glad to be equal in number with his neighbours: he hoped therefore to have their assistance on such an occasion, to preserve the honour and safety of the nation. The Houses thanked him for the peace he had made, and for his gracious answer to their address.

This however was not capable to induce the Commons to suspend their debates upon the grievances.

The King, therefore, to defeat their designs, made use of his constant method, and coming to the Parliament the 24th of February, prorogued it to the 10th of November following, before any bill was ready for the royal assent. Thus ended the 13th session of this Parliament, after sitting six weeks and three days. The prorogation was afterwards continued, and lasted about fourteen months.

The peace was proclaimed the 28th of February in London, with much greater demonstrations of joy and satisfaction from the people, than the war had been two years before. The sole difference between this peace and that of Breda was, that the ships and vessels belonging to the States, whether single or in fleets, should strike the flag, and lower their top-sail to those of England,† whether single or in fleets, provided they carried the King's flag. Moreover the States were to pay the King eight hundred thousand patacoons, at four payments, namely, two hundred thousand on the exchange of the ratifications, and the rest at three payments, within the space of three years. Thus the people of England discharged the expence of this war, and the King alone reaped the benefit.

A. D. 1674.] The King finding himself freed from the cares of war, and the uneasiness caused by the Parliament, abandoned himself entirely to a soft, indolent, and effeminate life. The Duchess of Orleans his sister had brought him, at their interview at Dover, the daughter of a gentleman of Bretagne, called de Queroualle, who commanded the King's affection beyond any of his mistresses, and was created Duchess of Portsmouth. But his particular fondness for her did not prevent his having many others, by whom he had several children, educated with no small expence. In a word, not to dwell on what passed at a court so corrupted as that of Charles II. we shall only say, that the King's mistresses had engrossed the whole credit of the court, and that he could refuse them nothing.

It does not appear, that France complained much of Charles for deserting her, in making a separate peace with the Dutch. This caused several politicians to think, that the King of France had given a full consent to this peace in order to make Charles mediator between him and his enemies, whose number was greatly increased, since the last year. When the King was assured that his mediation was accepted by France, he sent Sir William Temple into Holland to offer the same to the States. As their towns and provinces were now recovered, except Maestricht, and Grave, they passionately wished for peace.

At the very time, however, that Charles performed the office of a mediator, he received from France an annual pension of one hundred thousand pounds sterling. Moreover it appears in Coleman's letters, the Duke of York's secretary, that there was a close union between the King of France, and the Duke of York, and that the latter entirely relied on the assistance of France for the execution of the project formed in favour of the English Papists. This manifestly shows, that Charles had not desisted from his first designs, and only waited a favourable opportunity to execute them, when France, discharged from the burden of this present war, should be in a condition to grant him the necessary assistance.

During these transactions, the Papists of England were labouring to prevail with the King to dissolve a Parliament which was so opposite to them: this appears also in Coleman's letters. But the King did not think proper to take such a step so soon.

In September, the Earl of Arlington was made Lord

* Lewis IV. strenuously opposed the conclusion of this peace, and offered King Charles five millions and a half, with forty men of war, if he would break the negotiations. After the signing of the peace, King Charles told the French Ambassador, that he had been doing a thing that went more against his heart, than the losing of his right hand.

† From Cape Finisterre, to Point Van Staten in Norway.

Chamberlain of the King's household, and Sir Joseph Williamson, who had been plenipotentiary at the congress of Cologne, was made secretary in his room. The Duke of Buckingham, who had been the King's principal favourite, so far lost his favour and credit, that the King declared his office of Chancellor of Cambridge vacant, and influenced the election in favour of his natural son the Duke of Monmouth.

A. D. 1675.] The fourteenth session of this Parliament began the 13th of April. The Commons thanked the King for the speech with which he opened it, and immediately proceeded to a new bill against the growth of Popery, and particularly Popish priests, who had received orders from the see of Rome. This done, they presented an address against the Duke of Lauderdale, in which they humbly besought his Majesty to remove the said Duke for ever from his person and council. The King did not think proper to grant this request, and gave some reasons for his refusal, which were not satisfactory to the Commons. And therefore they prepared a second address against the Duke.

The Commons, after attacking the old members of the cabal, proceeded against a new one, namely, the Lord Treasurer Danby, who was believed to be deeply engaged in the design of making the King absolute. They examined his whole conduct since his admission to his high post, and drew up several articles, in which they accused him of great misdemeanors. But as sufficient proofs were not found to support the charge, it was dropped.

The Commons showed their distrust in another point no less grievous to the King. By an address they prayed him to recall his troops out of France, and prevent his subjects from engaging in that service for the future. The King rejected the first part of the address, on pretence that, in the treaty concluded with the States, he had not engaged to recall those troops, and that it could not be done without prejudice to the peace, which he now enjoyed with all his neighbours: but by a proclamation he prohibited his subjects from entering into the service of France.

The House of Lords were at last apprehensive, that the Commons intended to overturn every thing established concerning the royal prerogative and the church's security, and that by degrees the nation would again become Republican and Presbyterian. To prevent an evil which to them appeared very dangerous, the Earl of Lindsey brought into the House of Lords a bill, intituled, "An act to prevent the dangers which may arise from persons disaffected to the government." By this bill all persons who enjoyed any office, ecclesiastical, civil, or military, all privy counsellors and members of Parliament, were obliged, under a penalty, to take the oath which had been introduced, first in the corporation act, then in the militia act, and afterwards more fully in the five-mile-act.*

This bill occasioned debates in the Upper House, which lasted seventeen days, without a possibility of coming to any conclusion. There were two powerful parties in the House, one for, and the other against the bill, and the votes of the Bishops turned the scale on the side of the former.

This affair was interrupted by an accident which raised a violent contest between the two Houses. One Dr. Shirley having brought an appeal in the House of Lords, from a decree in Chancery, against Sir John Fagg, a member of the House of Commons, they ordered Shirley to be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms for a breach of privilege. The warrant for taking Shirley into custody was forcibly taken from the serjeant's deputy, by the Lord Mohun. The Commons demanded justice of the Peers against the Lord Mohun, and were answered by the Lords, that he had only done his duty. The quarrel thus begun, daily increased, so that the Houses, in their answers and replies, came to language so reproachful, that there was no hope of an accommodation. Wherefore the King came to the House of Peers the 9th of June, and prorogued the Parliament to the 13th of October. Thus ended the 14th session of this Parliament, before the money bill, and other public bills were ready for the royal assent.†

During the campaign of 1675, the King of France lost the famous Marshal Turenne, who had done him very great services. He was killed by a cannon ball in an action not important in itself, but rendered so by the death of this general, his army being obliged to repass the Rhine. Their retreat facilitated the recovery of Treves to the allies, which was yet in the hands of the French. In the beginning of the year, the contending powers had agreed, after long negotiations, to treat of a peace in the city of Nimeguen. But nothing considerable was done this year.

The 13th of October the King opened the 15th session of this Parliament with a very short speech, in which, after recommending union to both Houses, and the interests of the church of England, he demanded money, as well for building ships, as for taking off the anticipations upon his revenues, desiring them to remember, it was now above three years since he had asked any thing of them for his own private use.

But the Commons, instead of being moved by such unseasonable rhetoric, and by such ill grounded reasons, resumed the consideration of the bills left unfinished the last session, for the liberty of the subject, and added others for its better security. Afterwards they took into consideration the sums granted to the King for the last war, and the expences of the same, and found, that the charges amounted to a million less than the receipt, and without being able to discover to what uses this million had been applied.

In the report made of this affair, it was said, that the Parliament was not obliged to pay the King's private debts by a tax, for if this pretension was admitted, they would have to pay the like debts about a year and half hence, and so encourage the court to exact yearly a million and a half, as they had hitherto done: that since the end of the war, the whole charge of the government, both by sea and land, amounted not to above seven hundred thousand pounds sterling, and the clear income of the revenue came at least to sixteen hundred thousand, and consequently there ought to have been a yearly remainder of near a million: and yet the King had anticipated his revenues near a million more, to pay which, would be to entail perpetual anticipation upon the kingdom, to its utter ruin and desolation. The Parliament therefore resolved to grant the King nothing for taking off these anticipations. Nevertheless, a few days after they voted a supply of three hundred thousand pounds sterling for the building of twenty large ships of war, but withal resolved to appropriate tonnage and poundage to the use of the navy, which could not but be very disagreeable to the King.

But all the bills prepared by the Commons, were unhappily stifled in their birth by the revival of the former contest between the two Houses. This dispute about privileges was managed with such heat on both sides, that it was moved in the House of Lords, to present an address to the King to dissolve the Parliament, and the question being put, it was passed in the negative by only two voices. At last, the King seeing, no expedient could be possibly found to reconcile the two Houses, prorogued the Parliament from the 22d of November to the 15th of February 1677.

A. D. 1675-6.] As there was to be no meeting of

* The oath, was thus expressed, "I do declare that it is not lawful upon any pretence whatsoever to take up arms against the King; and that I do abhor the traiterous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him, in pursuance of such commission: and I do swear, that I will not at any time endeavour the alteration of the government either in church or state. So help me God."

† The Commons had designed to grant the King three hundred thousand pounds sterling, but at the same time resolved to apply the ancient tonnage and poundage, to the maintenance of the navy, according to its original design, which amounted to four hundred thousand pounds a year.

Parliament the next year, the Catholics, and the court, which openly protected them, were less reserved, and appeared more active. This gave great uneasiness to the people, who, besides, saw with concern the growing greatness of Lewis XIV. and the indolence of the King, who, instead of being uneasy or jealous, manifestly seemed to behold it with pleasure. It may be affirmed, that the principal article of Charles II.'s reign consists, in the perpetual opposition between the particular interests of the King, and those of the English nation. All the world saw and were sensible of it. It was the common talk, and the subject of daily libels. The King therefore by proclamation suppressed all coffee houses, on pretence of being places where disaffected persons met, and devised malicious and scandalous reports against the King and his ministers. Immediately after was published another proclamation, for discovering and punishing the writers, who daily published libels in London against the government.

Though all the contending powers had, the last year, consented to send their plenipotentiaries to Nimeguen, to treat of a peace, by the mediation of England, there was no great likelihood of a general peace. Sir William Temple and Sir Leoline Jenkins, the English mediators and ambassadors, repaired to Nimeguen in July, and only found there the plenipotentiaries of France, and those of the States General. The Emperor, the King of Spain, the Elector of Brandenburg, retarded the negotiations, as much as possible, in hopes, that the King of England, being concerned in the preservation of the Netherlands, would not suffer them to fall under the dominion of France, and that this would oblige him in the end to declare for the allies. But they were extremely mistaken in imagining that the interest of England was that of the King. It was this that made the proceedings of the English court always unintelligible to them, as well as to the rest of the Princes of Europe, who were ignorant of Charles's secret designs, and his engagements with France.

At the beginning of the campaign of 1676, the King of France took Condé and Bouchain, after which, in June he returned to Paris, leaving his army to the conduct of the Count de Schomberg. On the other side, the Prince of Orange besieged Maestricht towards the end of July, which gave Schomberg time to take Aire, and march to the relief of Maestricht. His approach, and some other accidents, obliged the Prince to raise the siege.

The campaign being ended, all eyes were turned to the negotiations at Nimeguen. It soon appeared, that the design of France was only to divide the allies, and make a separate peace with the States. The King of England had also the same view, and therein assisted France with all his power, having sent orders to Sir William Temple, to endeavour to persuade the States, and the Prince of Orange, to give their consent. The States were inclineable enough, but the Prince of Orange could not be prevailed with, who thought, it would be a betraying of the common cause, and the interests of the Princes, who had engaged in the preservation of Holland, which without their assistance had been irrecoverably lost.

Since the King had made peace with Holland, the French privateers infested the Channel in such a manner, that without any regard to the neutrality of England, they seized her ships, and, as if in open war, made prizes of them.* It was proved, that they had taken fifty three since the peace. The King sent orders to his ambassador at Paris to make complaints on this occasion; but that was all the satisfaction the merchants could obtain.

A. D. 1676-7.] This prorogation, the longest that ever was known, raised a doubt, whether by it the Parliament was not actually dissolved. This doubt was owing to a statute of Edward III. never repealed, whereby it was enacted, that a Parliament should be held once every year, and oftener if occasion required. This dispute made a great noise in the kingdom, and books were published on both sides of the question. In general the court party maintained, that the Parliament was not dissolved, and the contrary party pretended it could not meet, after a fifteen months' interruption.

The Parliament however met the 15th of February, according to the prorogation. The King in his speech to both Houses declared, "That he was prepared to give them all the satisfaction and security in the great concerns of the Protestant religion as established in the church of England, that should be reasonably asked, or could consist with Christian prudence. And he declared himself as freely, that he was ready to gratify them in a further security of their liberty and property, (if they could think it was wanted) by as many good laws as they should propose, and as could consist with the safety of the government, without which there could be neither liberty nor property left to any man." After this, he told them, "That he expected and required from them, that all occasions of differences between the two Houses should be carefully avoided. In the next place, he desired them to consider the necessity of building more ships, and how much all their safeties were concerned in it—And as they knew him to be under a great burden of debts, he hoped, they would not deny him the continuance of the additional revenue of excise, which was near expiring—— And, that they might be satisfied how impossible it was (whatever some men thought) to support the government with less than the present revenue, they might at any time see the yearly established charge, by which it would appear, that the constant and unavoidable charge being paid, there would remain no overplus towards the discharging those contingencies which might happen in all kingdoms, and which had been a considerable charge to him the last year."

As soon as the Commons were withdrawn, the Duke of Buckingham made a long speech, to prove, that the Parliament was dissolved by the last prorogation. He grounded his opinion chiefly upon the statute of Edward III. namely, "That a Parliament should be holden every year once, and more often, if need be." The Duke was seconded by the Earls of Salisbury and Shaftsbury, and the Lord Wharton. At last, after great debates, the House sent all four to the Tower, whence they were shortly after released, except the Earl of Shaftsbury, who was continued there above a year, because he would not own the justice of his imprisonment.

A few days after, the Commons voted the King a tax of five hundred and eighty-four thousand pounds, to build thirty ships, without appropriating tonnage and poundage. Besides, they continued for three years the additional tax upon beer, which was to expire the 24th of June.

It appeared soon after, that their grand affair was to stop the great progress of France in the Netherlands, and engage the King in a war with that kingdom, for which purpose they addressed him, representing the danger to which the kingdom was exposed from the greatness of France, and praying, that his Majesty, by such alliances as he should think fit, would both secure his own dominions and the Spanish Netherlands, and thereby quiet the fear of his people. The King, desirous of eluding this application, which he considered as a kind of attack on his measures, replied in general terms, that he would use all means for the preservation of Flanders, consistent with the peace and safety of his kingdoms. This answer was an evasion, or rather a denial. The Commons, therefore, thought proper to be more explicit. They entreated him not to defer the entering into such alliances as might attain that great end: and in case war with the French King should be the result of his measures, they promised to grant him all the aids and supplies, which would enable him to support the honour and interest of the nation. The King was also more explicit in his reply. He told them, that the only way to prevent danger, was to put him in a condition to make preparations for their security. This message was understood to be a demand of money. The Parliament accordingly empowered the King to borrow on the additional excise 200,000 pounds at seven per cent: a very small sum indeed; but which they deemed sufficient, with the ordinary revenue, to equip a good squadron, and thereby put the nation in security, till farther resolutions should be taken. But this concession fell far short of the King's expectations. He therefore informed them, that, unless they granted him the sum of 600,000 pounds upon new funds, it would not be possible for him, without exposing the nation to manifest danger, "To speak or act those things," which would answer the end of their several addresses. The House took this message into consideration: but before they came to any resolution, the King sent for them to Whitehall, where he told them, upon the word of a King, that they should not repent any trust which they would repose in him for the safety of his kingdom; that he would not for any consideration break credit with them, or employ their money to other uses than those for which they intended it: but that he would not hazard, either his own safety or theirs, by taking any vigorous measures, or forming new alliances, till he were in a better condition both to defend his subjects and to offend his enemies.

This Speech occasioned great debates in the Commons. The court-party proposed a speedy grant of the desired supply, to enable the King to make alliances, otherwise, they could not be expected to be made; and alledged, that the King had the same power of making war and leagues, as the House had in giving money; he could not have money without them, nor they alliances without him. The contrary party remarked, that nothing positive was promised by the King, except that he would provide for the safety of the kingdom, which might be explained several ways, without any assurance it should be understood in the sense of the Commons. As for saying that the King would make alliances when he should have the supply, the expression was too general to hazard upon it a sum of six hundred thousand pounds. But if alliances were made forthwith, and declared to day, the six hundred thousand pounds would be granted to morrow.

This last opinion prevailed, such was the distrust conceived of the King. So, the House voted an address, wherein they "brought his Majesty to enter into a league offensive and defensive, with the States-General of the United Provinces, against the growth and power of the French King, and for the preservation of the Spanish Netherlands; and to make such other alliances with the confederates as should appear fit and useful to that end." They supported their advice with reason, and promised speedy and effectual supplies, for preserving his Majesty's honour, and ensuring the safety of the public.

The King receiving this address the 26th of May, sent two days after for the Commons to Whitehall, and sharply reproved them for invading his prerogative, in requiring him to enter into a league offensive and defensive with the States General. At the conclusion he declared his pleasure to them, that the House be adjourned till the 16th of July, telling them, he would give them notice by his proclamation when he intended they should sit again, which, he said, would not be till winter, unless some extraordinary occasion should happen.

We learn from Sir William Temple himself, that whilst he was at Nimeguen as Plenipotentiary-mediator for a peace, he was sent for to London by the King, on pretence of making him Secretary of State, but in reality to dispatch him to the Hague, to endeavour to persuade the Prince of Orange to consent to a separate peace with France. But Temple declined a commission which he had before tried to execute, without being able to succeed. This shows with what zeal the King endeavoured to serve France, which only wanted to divide the allies by such an expedient. It is certain, the King of France, though till now superior to his enemies, was little able longer to sustain a war with almost all Europe united against him. It was therefore in the King of England's power to procure a just and reasonable peace, by declaring against France, as he was desired by the Parliament. But this could never be obtained of him. On the contrary, fearing to be forced to it at last by the clamours of his people, he secretly laboured to procure France an advantageous peace, by the division of her enemies.

Sir William Temple having refused to be employed upon this errand, Mr. Laurence Hyde was sent to the Hague, to try to gain the States and Prince of Orange.

The King had the more hopes of prevailing with the Prince; as there had been some time since a proposal from him for his marriage with the Princess Mary, eldest daughter of the Duke of York, and as he did not doubt, that to succeed in that affair, the Prince would grant every thing desired of him concerning the separate peace with France. It was for this end probably, that the King permitted the Prince his nephew to come to his court, and solicit his affairs in person: but without any positive assurance that his addresses would be well received. The Prince could not leave the army before the campaign was ended, and therefore arrived not in England till the 9th of October, when he landed at Harwich, and from thence went to the court. The court, which was then at New-market, being returned to London, the Prince had a sight of the Princess, and then demanded her in form of the King and Duke of York, by whom his proposal was differently received. The Duke of York seemed very cold, and the King appeared to embrace it with joy: but it was on condition that he and the Prince should previously agree upon the terms of a general peace. The Prince was absolutely against speaking of a peace till after the marriage, and the King as resolute to agree upon the plan of a peace before the marriage should be concluded. They continued five or six days fixed to their resolutions. The Prince acquainted the King, by Sir William Temple, "That his allies, who were likely to have hard terms of the peace, as things then stood, would be apt to believe, that he had made his match at their cost, and for his part he would never sell his honour for a wife." All this was not capable to divert the King from his resolution, and the affair seemed upon the point of breaking off. But all was reconciled. Temple paying a visit to the Prince one night after supper, was told by him, "That he repented coming into England, and resolved to be gone in two days, if the King continued in his mind of treating upon the peace before he was married; but that before he went, the King must chuse how they should live hereafter; for he was sure it must be either like the greatest friends, or the greatest enemies; and desired Sir William to let his Majesty know so next morning, and give him an account of what he should say upon it." Sir William, in discharge of his commission, represented to the King the ill consequences of a breach with the Prince, considering the ill humours of so many of his subjects on account of his engagements with France, and the invitation made the Prince by several of them during the late war. The King having heard him with great attention, answered, "I never yet was deceived in judging a man's honesty by his looks,——and if I am not deceived in the Prince's face he is the honestest man in the world; and I will trust him, and he shall have his wife, and you shall go immediately and tell my brother so, and that it is a thing I am resolved on." The Duke of York appeared at first a little surprized, but however answered, the King would be obeyed, and he should be glad his subjects should learn from him the obedience which they owed to their Sovereign,——adding, "I tell him my opinion very freely upon any thing, but when that is done, and I know his pleasure upon it, I obey him." Immediately after Sir William waited on the Prince with the agreeable news. The same day, the marriage-articles were drawn and agreed, the Princess's portion being forty thousand pounds sterling, and the day after the King declared the marriage in full council. The city of London testified an extraordinary joy at the news, and Sir Francis Chaplin the Lord Mayor invited the King to a magnificent entertainment the 29th of October. The marriage was consummated on the Prince's birth-day, the 4th of November.

A few days after, the King, the Duke of York, the Prince of Orange, the Lord-Treasurer, and Sir William Temple, entered into conference for settling the scheme of a general peace, and after some debates, agreed upon these terms: "All should be restored by France to the Emperor, that had been taken from him in the war, the Duchy of Lorraine to that Duke, and all on both sides between France and Holland: and to Spain, the towns of Aeth, Charleroy, Oudenard, Courtray, Tournay, Condé, Valenciennes, St. Guillain, and Binch. That the Prince of Orange should endeavour to procure the consent of Spain; and the King that of France, for which purpose he should send some persons immediately over with the proposition, who was to demand a positive answer in two days." The Lord Duras, afterwards Earl of Faversham, a creature of the Duke of York, was the person fixed upon to execute this commission.

The Prince and Princess of Orange embarked for Holland shortly after. The King positively assured the Prince, he would never depart from the scheme agreed upon for a general peace, and that if France refused her consent, he would declare war against her. Yet, the Prince had the mortification before his departure, to see the adjournment of the Parliament prolonged from the 3d of December to the 4th of April.

The court of France was extremely surprized, as well with the scheme of the peace, as the manner in which it was pretended to impose it on them. But whether the Lord Duras had secret orders to give hopes, that the scheme might be altered, or it was not despaired to gain the King of England, the Envoy, after staying some days beyond his commission, returned without an answer, or at least with an answer of no signification. It contained only, "That the most Christian King hoped, his brother would not break with him upon one or two towns, to which England had no pretension, but however, he would send orders to his Ambassador at London, to treat with his Majesty himself." It is known, the King of France offered Mr. Montague, the English Ambassador, large sums for the King, and the Treasurer, which were not accepted, at least openly; but on the other hand, the King suffered himself to be so mollified by the offers or artifices of France, that the scheme of peace agreed on with the Prince of Orange, was at last reduced to nothing, and no more heard of.

From the Lord Duras's return, to the meeting of the Parliament, the King was actually negotiating with the King of France, the terms on which he was to resist the solicitations of his Parliament, and prevent his declaring for the allies. This appeared openly in the Parliament itself, by the letters of the Lord-Treasurer Danby, produced before the Commons in 1678, by Mr. Montague, Ambassador at the French court; and subsequently a fuller conviction was given of this by Mr. Montague's letters, published by the Earl of Danby, in the reign of William III.

The King, after prolonging the adjournment to April 1678, thought proper to assemble the Parliament, the 15th of January, and as soon as they met, to adjourn the Commons, by a message, to the 28th of the same month.

A. D. 1677-8.] The King had not prolonged the adjournment of the Parliament to the 28th of January, in order to find expedients for a general peace, as the Treasurer told Montague in his letter of the 26th of January, but to have time to receive the news of a league with Holland, which was indeed signed the 16th of January. This league was very far from answering the desires of the Parliament. It was properly but defensive, to prevent the King of France from pursuing his conquests in the Netherlands. Supported by this league, however, which, according to him, was to produce wonderful effects, he made a Speech to both Houses, in which he allowed, that a good peace could no longer be expected from negotiation, and assured them that he was resolved to enter into a war for that purpose.

In the House of Commons were men of sufficient abilities to discover the King's artifices, and instruct their fellow members, wherein they succeeded the more easily, as above two thirds of the House were little inclined to trust to the King's word. It was therefore resolved, after great debates, to present an address to the King, the substance of which was,——"That they besought him not to admit of any treaty of peace, whereby the French King should be left in possession of any greater dominion or power, than was left him by the Pyrenean treaty: that no trade be admitted with France, or any goods suffered to be imported from thence, on pain of forfeiture. And when he should be pleased to communicate his alliances to them in Parliament, they would give such ready assistance, on all occasions, as might bring the war to a happy conclusion."

This address threw the King, in his turn, into a great perplexity. However, upon his reproving the Commons, they seemed penitent, and voted, that they would assist his Majesty in the prosecution of the war. A fleet of ninety sail, an army of thirty thousand men, and a million of money, were also voted. Great difficulties were made by the Commons with regard to the army, which the House, judging by past measures, believed to be intended more against the liberties of England than against the progress of the French Monarch.

While so much time was spent in England in deliberations about war, the King of France taking the field in February, made himself master of Ghent and Ipres in March, and then put his forces into quarters for refreshment. These conquests so alarmed the Dutch, that from this time they resolved upon a separate peace, though they durst not publicly own it. Lewis IV. who knew their intentions, and had nothing to fear from England, began to talk like a conqueror, and to form himself the plan of the peace he was willing to grant the allies, and which was different from that agreed on between Charles and the Prince of Orange.

On the other hand, the Commons of England alarmed at the progress of the French arms, made haste to finish a bill for raising money by a poll-tax. The 14th of March they resolved upon an address to the King, to pray him to declare war against France, to dismiss the ambassador of that crown, and recall his own from Paris, with a promise of necessary and plentiful supplies. This address was sent the next day to the Lords, for their concurrence: but, before an answer was given, the King came to the House of Lords the 20th of March, and after passing the poll-bill, and some others, adjourned the Parliament to the 11th of April.

A. D. 1678.] The Parliament meeting the 11th of April was farther adjourned to the 29th, when the Chancellor acquainted the two Houses, that the King had discovered that the Dutch were thinking of a separate peace without his consent or privity, and desired their advice how to proceed. The Commons gave their advice for an actual war with France, and at the same time voted, "That the late leagues made with the States-General of the United-Provinces, were not pursuant to the addresses of the House, nor consistent with the good and safety of the kingdom." The King returned an answer, which testified his resentment of this vote. But the Commons, not at all dicouraged, presented a second address, in which——"They besought him to communicate to them his resolutions upon their advice."——They added, "That the inconveniencies and dangers which the kingdom lay under, might have been totally, or in a great measure prevented, in case his Majesty had accepted of the advice by them given in their address of the 26th of May last, and the 31st of January: they besought him therefore, that he would be pleased to remove those counsellors that advised him to give those answers which he did to the said addresses —In fine, that he would be pleased to remove the Duke of Lauderdale from his presence and council."—The King immediately answered, "that he was much surprised at the extravagancy of their address, and unwilling at present to give it such a due answer as it deserved." served." Two days after, namely, the 13th of May, he prorogued the Parliament to the 23d of the same month. Nevertheless, the King would still have it believed, he was disposed to the war. To this end, immediately after the poll-bill had passed, he raised thirty thousand men, who were completed in six weeks.

While these forces were raising, and before the prorogation of the Parliament, the States-General sent Van Lewen to the King, to acquaint him, that they were disposed to a peace, because they saw, there was no reliance on the uncertain measures of England. That however, if the King would immediately declare war against France, they would break off all negotiations, and vigorously prosecute the war pursuant to their alliances, and that his declaration was the only thing that could prevent a peace. This was declared to the King by Sir William Temple, from the States' Ambassador. The King now finding that a positive answer was to be returned, which he had hitherto avoided, told Sir William Temple, "that since the Dutch would have a peace upon the French terms, and France offered money for his consent to what he could not help, he did not know why he should not get the money."

The weakness of this evasion is manifest: for though the Ambassador of the States had declared, there should be no peace, if the King would really engage in a war, the King, suppressing this positive declaration, supposed that the States were for a peace upon any terms. Upon this false supposition, he ordered Sir William Temple to treat with Barillon the French Ambassador; but Sir William wisely declined such a negotiation. What Temple refused was undertaken by others, and the same author says, that amongst the articles proposed by the Ambassador of France, for concluding a private treaty with the King, there was one article which was so offensive, that the King assured him he would never forget it while he lived.*

Affairs were in this situation when the Parliament met the 23d of May, after a prorogation of ten days. When the Commons came to debate on the additional revenue demanded by the King, it was unanimously rejected. Moreover, the House refused to give a compensation for the loss sustained by the King in the prohibition of French commodities. In short, the Lords having passed the bill for disbanding the army, with an enlargement of the time prefixed for one month longer, the Commons absolutely refused their consent to the amendment. The King perceiving by this, what he was to expect from the Commons, came to the Parliament the 15th of July, and passed several bills, of which these were the principal.

I. An act for granting a supply of six hundred and nineteen thousand three hundred and eighty pounds, for disbanding the army, and other uses therein mentioned.

II. An act for granting an additional duty to his Majesty upon wines for three years.

III. An act for burying in woollen.†

These acts being passed, the King prorogued the Parliament to the 1st of August.

While the Parliament was sitting, the States-General seeing that nothing was to be hoped for from England, treated with France, both for themselves and Spain, with regard to the Netherlands. At last, every thing being settled, and the King of France promising to restore to the Spaniards, Ghent, Aeth, Charleroy, Audenard, Courtray, and Limburg, the States ordered their Plenipotentiaries at Nimeguen to sign the peace the last of June. It was universally expected, that the peace would be signed that day. But as the time for this restitution had been neglected to be fixed (the Spaniards and Dutch, not doubting but it was to be immediately after the exchange of the ratifications) the Spanish Ambassador happened the day before, to ask the French plenipotentiaries, when they would restore the towns? To this they positively answered, that it would not be till after the restitution of the towns taken from the King of Sweden, by the allies in the north. This unexpected pretension put a stop to the signing of the peace, and the Dutch plenipotentiaries received express orders from their masters not to sign, unless France would engage to restore the six places, upon the ratification of the treaty. But the French were immoveable, and appeared resolute to continue the war, unless Sweden was satisfied.

Charles being informed of this new difficulty, and told moreover by the French Ambassador, that it was his master's intention, immediately sent Sir William Temple to Holland, with full power to sign a league with the States, by which they should be mutually bound to continue the war, in case France should not agree to evacuate the six towns within such a time. This league was really concluded and signed the 26th of July, to the great satisfaction of the Prince of Orange, and those who thought the peace very disadvantageous.

The readiness with which this resolution was taken by the King, much surprised those who from his former proceedings had no great opinion of his sincerity. But when it was seen that the league was concluded, and France continued obstinate, it was hoped, the war would be renewed with more vigour than ever, and that England would incline the balance to the side of the allies. It is difficult to discover the motive of the King's vigorous resolution. Some have believed, he was really offended at the contempt France seemed to show, of his mediation, in starting such an incident. Others have thought, that foreseeing France would at last comply, notwithstanding her seeming resolution, he had a mind to redeem his credit by his vigour with the English, who till then strongly suspected him of too close a correspondence with that crown. Others have judged, that he took this resolution, in order to obtain a large supply from the Parliament, not doubting but he should be afterwards able to procure a peace.

However this be, it appeared shortly after, that the King repented of what he had done, and feared that his league would rekindle the war. At the time that the Dutch were preparing to improve this happy juncture, to break off this negotiation with France, and to rise in their demands, one Du Cros, an agent of Sweden at London brought an express order from the King for Sir William Temple to repair immediately to Nimeguen, and use his utmost endeavours to persuade the plenipotentiaries of Sweden to consent to the evacuation of the six towns within a limited time. The King ordered him likewise to assure them, that after the peace he would use the most effectual endeavours he could, for the restitution of all the territories the Swedes had lost in the war. It was not difficult for Sir William Temple to infer from hence, that the King had no inclination to quarrel with France. But he was still more fully convinced, when he was informed from Pensionary Fagel, that Du Cros had been with the States' Depu-

* Temple says no more; but Dr. Swift, who published Sir William's Letters, acquaints us with that remarkable passage; namely, "That France, in order to break the force of the confederacy, and elude just conditions of a general peace, resolved by any means to enter into separate measures with Holland, to which end it was absolutely necessary to gain the good offices of the King of England, who was looked upon as the master of the peace when ever he pleased. The bargain was struck for either three or four hundred thousand pounds: but when all was agreed, M. Barillon, the French Ambassador, told the King, he had orders from his master before payment to add a private article, by which his Majesty should be engaged, never to keep above eight thousand men of standing troops in his three kingdoms." This unexpected proposal put the King in a rage, and made him say, "God's fish! Does my brother of France think to serve me thus? Are all his promises to make me absolute master of my realms come to this? Or does he think that a thing to be done with eight thousand men?"—Hence it appears, for what the thirty thousand men the King was raising were intended. They could not be levied for a war against France, though the King used that pretence, since he had already made his bargain with that crown for four millions of livres. Nothing else therefore can be thought, but that the King seeing the peace upon the point of conclusion, which he only could, but would not prevent, imagined, that after the peace, the King of France would assist him to become absolute master in his kingdoms, and furnish him with money to maintain the thirty thousand men without his applying to the Parliament.

† This act, which was very serviceable to the flannel manufacture, by causing a great consumption of wool, remained in force till the year 1814, when it was deemed no longer necessary.

ties, and acquainted them with the order he had brought; that he had also said, the terms of the peace were absolutely agreed between the Kings of France and England, and from some expressions he had heard the King use, intimated, it would be in vain to pretend to prevent it. As Sir William and the Pensionary could not doubt that Du Cros was sent by the King, they concluded, either the King had changed his mind, or had never designed to enter into a war with France. Wherefore, the States, instead of forming new schemes, were contented with the plan already agreed on, with a resolution however not to sign the treaty, till the restitution of the six towns was assured within such a time.*

Since the league had been concluded at the Hague, the King of France, to whom it was communicated, had used all possible artifices to elude, and bring it to a negotiation, with an offer to treat upon it, either at St. Quintin or Ghent. But the States, on the contrary, had expressly ordered their Ambassadors to break off the negotiation, if the peace was not signed by such a day, with the article of the evacuation of the towns in a limited time. Sir William Temple came to Nimeguen but three days before the expiration of the time fixed by the States. On his arrival he found very little disposition on either side towards signing the peace; the French and Dutch appeared equally inflexible, and the latter would not hear either of any negotiation or delay. At last came the critical day, the 11th of August, fixed by the treaty at the Hague, in the morning of which the Ambassadors desisted from their pretensions, and the peace was signed before twelve that night. This gave France the desired satisfaction of making a separate peace with Holland, which was immediately followed by a peace between France and Spain, and some months after with all the confederate powers, except the Duke of Lorraine, who could never obtain his re-establishment.

The King of France had, by his General the Duke of Luxemburgh blockaded Mons. All his artifice to draw the affair of the evacuation into a negotiation, were only to gain time of Luxemburgh to become master of Mons before the peace was signed. But the Dutch being bent not to enter into treaty upon that affair, the French General had not time to make any great progress before that place. Meanwhile the Prince of Orange being informed that peace was upon the point of being signed, and desiring to distinguish himself by some great action, marched directly to the Duke of Luxemburgh, surprised him, and gave him a considerable check. This battle, called afterwards the battle of St. Denys, being fought the 14th of August, three days after the peace was signed, gave occasion to various opinions concerning this action of the Prince of Orange. Some said he knew not the peace was signed. Others pretended, the news was brought him by an express, but not from the States, and therefore he might improve the present advantages. However, with this action ended a war which had lasted six years, and was at first so fatal to Holland, that the Republic saw itself on the brink of destruction.

We are now come to the discovery of the famous conspiracy known by the name of the Popish plot, which makes one of the principal periods of this reign.

The 12th of August, (the day after the signing of the treaty of Nimeguen) Dr. Ezreal Tonge, a London Divine, applied himself to one Christopher Kirby, who had some interest at court, to tell the King, there was a plot against his person. Kirby discharging his commission the next day, whilst the King was walking in St. James's Park, the King ordered him to bring Tonge to him at eight that evening. Tonge came to him at Whitehall at the appointed hour; and delivered to the King a writing or narrative, which in forty-three articles, contained the particulars of a plot. The King, after looking over it superficially, told Tonge, he was going to Windsor the next day, but would put the paper into the hands of the Lord-Treasurer Danby, on whom he ordered him to wait the next morning. Tonge declared to Danby, that the papers had been secretly thrust under his door, and that, though he suspected, he certainly did not know, who was the author. After a few days, he told the Treasurer, that the author of the intelligence had acknowledged the whole matter, but desired that his name might be concealed, lest the Papists should murder him. The intelligence, however, was so vague and unsatisfactory, that the King concluded the whole was an imposture.

Three days after, Tonge wrote to the Earl of Danby, that a packet of letters was to go to the post-house in Windsor, directed to one Bedingfield, a priest.† The packet came indeed, and Bedingfield, after reading the letters, carried them to the Duke of York, telling him, "He feared some ill was intended him by the said packet, because the letters therein seemed to be of a dangerous nature, and that he was sure they were not the hand-writing of the persons whose names were subscribed to the letters."‡ The King being more confirmed in the belief that there was nothing real in the pretended plot, seemed resolved not to permit the papers or informations received from Tonge, to be produced. But the Duke of York was so very earnest to have the letters, directed to Bedingfield, examined by the council, that the King at last consented, and gave the Treasurer leave to declare at the same time the intelligence received from Tonge, and so the affair became public.

Kirby and Tonge were now further inquired after, and found to be living in close connection with Titus Oates, the person who was said to have conveyed the first intelligence to Tonge. Oates affirmed, that he had fallen under suspicion with the jesuits; that he had received three blows with a stick, and a box on the ear from a provincial of that order, for revealing their conspiracy: and that, overhearing them speak of their intentions to punish him more severely, he had withdrawn, and concealed himself. But he thought proper, before he was presented to the council, to go with his two companions to Sir Edmundsbury Godfrey, a noted and active justice of peace, and to give evidence before him of all the articles of the conspiracy.—The wonderful intelligence, which Oates conveyed both to Godfrey and the council, and afterwards to the Parliament, was to this purpose. The Pope, he said, considered himself entitled to the possession of England and Ireland on account of the heresy of the Prince and people, and had assured the Sovereignty of these kingdoms. This supreme power he had thought proper to delegate to the jesuits; and de Oliva, General of that Order, in consequence of the papal grant, had supplied all the chief offices, both civil and military. Lord Arundel was created Chancellor; Lord Powis, Treasurer; Sir William Godolphin, Privy-Seal; Coleman, the Duke's Secretary, was made Secretary of State; Langhorne, Attorney-General; Lord Bellasis, General of the Papal army; Lord Petre, Lieutenant-General; Lord Stafford, Pay-Master; and inferior commissions, signed by the Provincial of the jesuits, were distributed all over England. All the dignities too of the church were filled, and many of them with Spaniards and other foreigners. The King, whom the jesuits called the Black Bastard, was tried and condemned as a heretic; and a resolution taken to put him to death. Father le

* This affair of Du Cros was transacted, one morning, in an hour's time, in the Duchess of Portsmouth's apartments, where the orders were dispatched, by the intervention and pursuit of Monsieur Barillon, the French ambassador.

† The Duke of York's confessor.

‡ The Duke carried them to the King. And he fancied they were written either by Tonge or Oates, and sent on design to have them intercepted, to give the more credit to the discovery. The Duke's enemies, on the other hand, gave out, that he had got some hints of the discovery, and brought these as a blind to impose on the King. Titus Oates was an abandoned miscreant, obscure, illiterate, vulgar, and indigent. He had been once indicted for perjury, was afterwards chaplain on board a man of war, and dismissed for unnatural practices. He then professed himself a Roman Catholic, and crossed the sea to St. Omer's, where he was for some time maintained in the English seminary at that place. The fathers of that College sent him with some dispatches to Spain; but after his return, when they became better acquainted with his character, they would not suffer him to remain among them; so that he was obliged to return to London, where he was ready to encounter every danger for his support.

Shee

Shee (for so this great plotter and informer called father La Chaise, the confessor of the French King) had consigned to London ten thousand pounds, to be paid to any man who should merit it by this assassination. A Spanish provincial had expressed like liberality; the Dominicans approved of the action, but pleaded poverty. Ten thousand pounds had been offered to Sir George Wakeman, the Queen's Physician, who demanded fifteen thousand, as a reward for so great a service: his demand was complied with; and five thousand had been paid him in advance. Lest these means should fail, four Irish ruffians had been hired by the jesuits, at the rate of twenty guineas a-piece, to stab the King at Windsor, and Coleman, Secretary to the late Duchess of York, had given the messenger, who carried them orders, a guinea to quicken his diligence. Grove and Pickering were also employed to shoot the King with silver bullets: the former was to receive a reward of fifteen hundred pounds; the latter, being a pious man, was to be rewarded with thirty thousand masses, which, estimating masses at a shilling a-piece, amounted to the like value. Pickering would have executed his purpose, had not the flint at one time dropped out of his pistol, at another time the priming. Coniers, the jesuit, had bought a knife at the price of ten shillings, which he thought was not dear, for the purpose for which he intended it, of stabbing the King. Letters of subscription were circulated amongst the Catholics, all over England, to raise a sum for the same purpose. No less than fifty jesuits had met in May last, at the White Horse Tavern, where it was unanimously agreed to put the King to death; and Oates was employed to carry notes and letters from one to the other, all tending to the same end, of murdering the King. A wager of a hundred pounds was laid, and stakes made, that the King should eat no more Christmas pies. In short, it was determined, to use the expression of a jesuit, that if he would not become R. C. (Roman Catholic) he should no longer be C. R. (Charles Rex.) The great fire of London had been the work of the jesuits, who had employed eighty or eighty-six persons for that purpose, and had expended seven hundred fire balls; but they had a good return for their money, for they had been able to pilfer goods from the fire to the amount of fourteen thousand pounds. A paper model was also framed for firing the city again: the stations were regularly marked out, where the several fires were to commence. Fire-balls were familiarly called among them Tewksbury mustard-pills; and were said to contain a notable biting sauce. Twenty thousand Catholics in London, were to rise in twenty-four hours or less; and Jennison, a jesuit, said that they might easily cut the throats of a hundred thousand protestants. Coleman had remitted two hundred thousand pounds to promote the rebellion in Ireland; and the French King was to land a great army in that island. Poole, who wrote the Synopsis, was particularly marked out for assassination; as was also Dr. Stillingfleet, a controversial writer against the papists. Burnet tells us, that Oates paid him the same compliment.—After all this havoc, the crown was to be offered to the Duke, but on condition of his pardoning the incendiaries, and the murderers of his brother and of the people; and his consent to the extirpation of the Protestant religion. If he refused these conditions, he himself was immediately to be poisoned or assassinated. "To pot James must go;" according to the expressions ascribed by Oates to the jesuits.—This abandoned wretch, Titus Oates, when examined before the council, betrayed his impostures in such a manner, as would have utterly discredited the most consistent story, and the most reputable evidence. While in Spain, he had been carried, he said, to Don John, who promised great assistance, to the execution of the Catholic designs. The King asked him, what sort of a man this Don John was: he answered, a tall lean man; directly contrary to the truth, as the King well knew. He totally mistook the situation of the jesuits' college at Paris. Though he pretended great intimacies with Coleman, he knew him not, when placed very near him; and had no other excuse than that his sight was bad by candle-light. He fell into similar mistakes with regard to Wakeman, the Queen's Physician.—Notwithstanding these objections, great attention was paid to Oates's evidence, and the plot became very soon the subject of conversation, and even the object of terror to the people. The violent animosity, which had been excited against the Catholics in general, made the public listen to the grossest absurdities, when they accompanied an accusation of those religionists: and the more diabolical any contrivance appeared, the better it suited the tremendous idea entertained of a jesuit. Danby likewise, who stood in opposition to the French and Catholic interest at court, was willing to encourage every story, which might serve to discredit that party. By his suggestion, when a warrant was signed for arresting Coleman, there was inserted a clause for seizing his papers; a circumstance attended with the most important consequences Coleman, partly on his own account, partly by orders from the Duke, had been engaged in a correspondence, with father La Chaise, with the Pope's nuntio at Brussels, and with other Catholics abroad; and being himself a fiery zealot, busy and sanguine, the expression in his letters often betrayed great violence and indiscretion. His correspondence, during the years 1674, and 1675, and part of 1676, was seized, and contained many extraordinary passages; but yet there was nothing in them, which could serve as proof in the present information. But when the contents of these letters were publicly known they diffused the panic, with which the nation began already to be seized on account of the popish plot. Indeed men reasoned more from their fears and passions, than from the evidence before them. Thus Oates's plot, and Coleman's supposed one in favour of the introduction of popery, were confounded; and the evidence of the latter being unquestionable, the belief of the former took possession of the people's minds.—There was danger, however, lest time might open the eyes of the public, when the murder of Sir Edmundsbury Godfrey completed the general delusion, and rendered the prejudices of the nation absolutely incurable. This magistrate had been missing some days; and after much search, and many surmises, his body was found lying in a ditch at Primrose Hill, near the Hampstead Road: the marks of strangling appeared about his neck, which was dislocated, and some contusions on his breast; his own sword was sticking in the body; but as no blood appeared on drawing it, it was concluded, that it had been thrust in some time after his death, and that he had not killed himself: he had rings on his fingers, and money in his pocket; it was therefore inferred, that he had not fallen into the hands of robbers. Without farther reasoning, it was inferred, that he had been assassinated by the papists, on account of his taking Oates's evidence. This clamour was quickly propagated, and met with universal belief. The panic spread itself on every side, with infinite rapidity; and all men, astonished with fear, and animated with rage, saw in Godfrey's fate, all the horrible designs attributed to the Catholics; and no further doubt remained of Oates's veracity. The voice of the nation united against that hated sect, and notwithstanding that the bloody conspiracy was supposed to be now detected, men could scarcely be persuaded that their lives were in safety.—In order still farther to propagate the popular frenzy, several artifices were employed. The dead body of Godfrey was carried into the city, attended by vast multitudes. It was publicly exposed in the streets, and viewed by all ranks of men. The funeral pomp was celebrated with great parade. The corpse was conducted through the chief streets of the city; seventy-two clergymen marched before it; above a thousand persons of distinction followed after; and at the funeral sermon, two able-bodied Divines mounted the pulpit, and stood on each side of the preacher, lest, in paying the last duties to this unhappy magistrate, he should, before the whole people, be murdered by the papists.—While the nation was in this ferment, the Parliament was assembled, on the 21st of October, 1678. In his speech the King told them, that, though they had given money, for disbanding the army, he had found Flanders so exposed, that he had thought it necessary still to keep them on foot, and doubted not but this measure would meet with their approbation. He informed them that his revenue lay under great anticipations, and, at best, was never equal to the constant and necessary expence of government; as would appear from the state of it, which he intended to lay before them.—He was anxious to keep the question of the popish plot from the Parliament, but Danby, the Prime Minister, opened the matter in the House of Peers, the very first day of their cession. The King was extremely displeased with this temerity, and told his minister, "Though you do not believe it, you will find, that you have given the Parliament a handle to ruin yourself, as well as to disturb all my affairs, and you will surely live to repent it," which actually came to pass.—The cry of the plot was immediately echoed from one House to the other. An address was voted for a solemn fast; a form of prayer was contrived for that solemnity; and because the popish plot had been omitted in the first draught, it was carefully ordered to be inserted, lest Omnipotence should want intelligence.—In order to continue and propagate the alarm, addresses were voted, for laying before the House such papers as might discover the horrible conspiracy; for the removal of popish recusants from London; for administering every where the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; for denying access at court to all unknown or suspicious persons; for appointing the train-bands of London and Westminster to be in readiness. The Lords Powis, Stafford, Arundel, Petre, and Bellasis were committed to the Tower, and were, soon after, impeached for high-treason. And both Houses, after hearing Oates's evidence, voted, "That the Lords and Commons are of opinion, that there hath been, and still is, a damnable and hellish plot, contrived, and carried on by the popish recusants, for assassinating the King, for subverting the government, and for rooting out, and destroying the Protestant religion,"

The Commons not satisfied with these slight precautions, prepared a bill to prevent the danger from so many papists sitting in Parliament, and particularly in the House of Lords.

But this was only a preparative for the more easy prevention of the danger with which religion was threatened, from the hopes conceived by the Papists, of seeing the Duke of York on the throne after his brother, who neither had, nor expected to have any legitimate issue. This danger caused several members of the House of Commons, to form the project of a bill for excluding the Duke of York from the succession to the crown: but this was done by degrees. On the 4th of November, a debate was suffered to arise in the House, for an address to his Majesty, that he would be pleased to remove the Duke of York from his person and counsels. But this debate was adjourned to the 8th, and afterwards to the 12th of the month.

During these transactions, one William Bedloe, who took upon him the title of Captain Bedloe, because he had served in the Low-Countries, going from London to Bristol, wrote to Secretary Coventry from Newbury, that he had many secrets to discover, and therefore desired that he might be arrested on his arrival at Bristol, and sent to London.

He was accordingly apprehended at Bristol, and brought to London the 6th of November, when the Parliament was very busy upon the affair of the plot. A guard was immediately assigned him for his security, and a pension for his subsistence, with a lodging at Whitehall. When he appeared before the council, he gave intelligence of Godfrey's murder only, which, he said, had been perpetuated in Somerset House, where the Queen lived, by papists, some of them servants in her family. He was questioned about the plot; but utterly denied all knowledge of it, and also asserted, that he had no acquaintance with Oates. Next day, when examined before the committee of Lords, he bethought himself better, and was ready to give an ample account of the plot, which he found so anxiously inquired into. This narrative he made to tally, as well as he could, with that of Oates, which had been published: but that he might make himself acceptable by new matter, he added some other circumstances, and these still more tremendous and extraordinary. He said, that ten thousand men were to be landed from Flanders in Burlington Bay, and immediately to sieze Hull: that Jersey and Guernsey were to be surprized by forces from Brest; and that a French fleet, was, all last summer, hovering in the Channel for that purpose: that the Lords Powis and Petre were to form an army in Radnorshire, to be joined by another army, consisting of twenty or thirty thousand men and pilgrims, who were to land at Milford Haven from St. Jago in Spain: that there were forty thousand men ready in London; besides those, who would, on the alarm, be posted at every ale-house door, in order to kill the soldiers, as they came out of their quarters: that Lord Stafford, Coleman, and Father Ireland, had money sufficient to defray the expences of all those armaments: that he himself was to receive four thousand pounds, as one that could murder a man; as also a commission from Lord Bellasis, and a benediction from the Pope: that the King was to be assassinated; all the Protestants massacred, who would not seriously be converted; the Government offered to ONE, if he would consent to hold it of the church, but if he should refuse that condition, as was suspected, the supreme authority would be given to certain Lords, under the nomination of the Pope.—In a subsequent examination before the Commons, Bedloe added, that Lord Carrington was also in the conspiracy for raising men and money against the government; as was likewise Lord Brudnel. These noblemen, with all the other persons mentioned by Bedloe, were immediately committed to custody by the Parliament.—In order to support the panic among the people, especially among the citizens of London, a pamphlet was published with this title.—"A Narrative, and Impartial Discovery of the horrid Popish Plot, carried on for burning and destroying the Cities of London and Westminster with their suburbs; setting forth the several consults, orders, and resolutions of the jesuits, concerning the same: by Captain William Bedloe, lately engaged in that horrid design, and one of the popish committee for carrying on such fires." Every fire, which had happened for several years past, is in this pamphlet ascribed to the machinations of the jesuits, who proposed, as Bedloe said, by such attempts, to find an opportunity for a general massacre of the Protestants; and in the mean time, were well pleased to enrich themselves, by pilfering goods from the fire.—The King, though he scrupled not, wherever he could speak freely, to throw the highest ridicule on the plot, and on all who believed in it, yet found it necessary to adopt the popular opinion, before the Parliament. A bill was introduced for a new test, in which popery was denominated idolatry; and all members, who refused this test, were excluded from both Houses. The bill passed the Commons, without much opposition; but in the Upper House the Duke moved, that an exception might be made in his favour. With great earnestness, and even with tears in his eyes, he told them, that he was now to cast himself on their kindness, in the greatest concern which he could have in this world, and he protested, that, whatever his religion might be, it should only be a private thing between God and his own soul, and never should appear in his public conduct. Notwithstanding this strong effort, in so important a point, he prevailed only by two voices; a sufficient indication of the general disposition of the people. "I would not have"—said a noble peer, in the debate on this bill—"so much as a popish man or a popish woman to remain here; not so much as a popish dog or a popish bitch; not so much as a popish cat, to pur and mew about the King."—This was wretched eloquence, but it was admirably suited to the times, and therefore met with praise and approbation.—Encouraged by this general fury, the witnesses went yet a step farther in their accusations; and though both Oates and Bedloe had declared often, that there was no other person of distinction, whom they knew to be concerned in the plot, they had now the audacity dacity to accuse the Queen herself of entering into the design against the life of her husband. The Commons, in an address to the King, gave countenance to this scandalous accusation; but the Lords could not be prevailed with to join in the address. The King, it was well known, bore no great affection to his consort, but Charles, notwithstanding all allurements of pleasure, or interest, or safety, had the generosity to protect his injured Queen. "They think"—said he—"I have a mind to a new wife; but for all that, I will not suffer an innocent woman to be abused." He immediately ordered Oates to be strictly confined, seized his papers, and dismissed his servants; but this daring informer's favour with the Parliament soon procured his release.—While these things were in agitation, the Parliament gave new attention to the militia. They passed a bill, by which it was enacted, that a regular militia should be kept in arms, during six weeks of the year, and a third part of them do duty every fortnight of that time. But Charles refused his assent to the bill, and told the Parliament, that he would not, were it for half an hour, part so far with the power of the sword: but if they would contrive any other bill for ordering the militia, and still leave it in his power to assemble or dismiss them when he thought proper, he would willingly give it the royal assent. The Commons, dissatisfied with this negative, immediately voted that all the new-levied forces should be disbanded. They passed a bill, granting money for that purpose; but, besides appropriating the money by the strictest clauses, they ordered it to be paid, not into the Exchequer, but into the Chamber of London. The Lords demurred with regard to so extraordinary a clause, which threw a violent reflection on the King's ministers, and even on himself; and by that means the act remained in suspense. During the sitting of the Parliament, and after its prorogation and dissolution, the trials of the pretended criminals were carried on; and the courts of judicature, places which ought to be kept pure from injustice, were strongly infected with party rage, and bigotted prejudice. Edward Coleman, the most hated of the conspirators, was first brought to trial. His letters were produced against him. They contained much indiscretion; but they proved nothing criminal, much less treasonable against him. Oates and Bedloe deposed, that he had received a commission, signed by the superior of the jesuits, to be Papal Secretary of State, and had consented to the poisoning, shooting, and stabbing the King: he had even, according to Oates's deposition, advanced a guinea to promote these bloody purposes. These wild stories were confounded with the projects contained in his letters; and Coleman received sentence of death. The sentence was executed upon him on the 3d of December. He suffered with calmness and constancy, and, to the last, persisted in the strongest protestations of his innocence.—Coleman's trial was succeded by that of Father Ireland, who, it is pretended, had signed, together with fifty jesuits, the great resolution of murdering the King—Grove, and Pickering, who had undertaken to shoot him, were tried at the same time. The only witnesses against the prisoners were still Oates and Bedloe. Ireland affirmed, that he was in Staffordshire all the month of August, a time when Oates asserted he was in London. Ireland proved his assertion by good evidence, and would have proved it by undoubted, had he not, most iniquitously, been denied the liberty of sending for witnesses. All these men, before their arraignment, were condemned in the opinion of the Judges, Jury, and spectators; and to be a Jesuit, or even a Catholic, was of itself a sufficient proof of guilt. The Chief Justice, Sir William Scroggs, gave sanction to all the narrow prejudices of the populace. Instead of being counsel for the prisoners, as his office required, he pleaded the cause against them, brow-beat their witnesses, and represented their guilt as certain and uncontroverted. And, when the jury brought in their verdict against the prisoners, he said,—"You have done, gentlemen, like very good subjects, and very good Christians, that is to say, like very good Protestants, and now much good may their thirty thousand masses do them!"—alluding to the masses by which Pickering was to be rewarded for murdering the King. All these unhappy men went to execution, on the 14th of January, 1679, protesting their innocence; a circumstance which made no impression upon the spectators.

The affair of the conspiracy must now be interrupted, in order to proceed to another which made a great noise at this time.

The Earl of Danby Lord Treasurer, was considered as the King's prime minister. He had a great genius, and a solid judgment, and as he disapproved of the principles of the Cabal, endeavoured to disengage the King from the methods he had been led into by their counsels. This drew upon him the enmity of the Duke of York, and all the French faction, with whom joined the Lord Russel, and other mal-contents in the House of Commons; and among the Peers, the Earls of Essex and Shaftsbury, whilst the Duke of Monmouth, and the Duchess of Portsmouth, did their utmost to lessen his credit with the King. In a word, a strong party was formed against him, who were bent to ruin him at any rate. These enemies were also joined by another, who had been his most intimate friend. This was Mr. Montague, ambassador in France, who, aspiring to the office of secretary of state, took it very ill, that the treasurer had engaged to bring in Sir William Temple. Mr. Montague was the Treasurer's most dangerous enemy, because he had private letters in his hands from that minister, and though he could not divulge them without great injury to the King, this gave him no uneasiness, because, resolving to throw himself into the party against the court, which was most prevalent in the Parliament, he knew he should be protected, even against the King himself. To this end, he got himself elected member for Northampton, and suddenly leaving Paris, without the King's consent or knowledge, came to London, and took his seat in the House. The King, offended at so strange a proceeding, and being also informed by the Swedish ambassador of the design of the Treasurer's enemies, and their intention to make use of his letters, sent the 19th of December the following message to the House of Commons,——"That upon information that Mr. Montague, a member of that House, and late ambassador in France, had held several conferences with the Pope's nuntio there, without any directions or instructions from his Majesty; his Majesty, to the end that he might know the truth of that matter, had given orders for the seizing of Mr. Montague's papers."* The leaders of the opposite party to the King, made great objections to this message, pretending, it ought to be first known, whether the information had been given upon oath, and what was the nature of Mr. Montague's crime, before they could consent to the seizure of his papers. Upon this Mr. Montague acquainted the House, "That he had in his custody some papers, which, as he conceived, might tend very much to the safety of the King's person, and the preservation of the government." A committee was immediately appointed to bring the writings to the House, which being accordingly done, and Mr. Montague ordered to select such of them as he thought for the service of the House, and dispose of the rest as he pleased, he produced two letters out of many others,

* Burnet says, the Earl of Danby having broken with Montague, was apprehensive Montague might accuse him, so resolved to prevent him. Jenkins, then at Nimeguen, wrote over, according to a direction sent him, as was believed, that he understood Montague had been in a secret correspondence with the Pope's Nuntio at Paris. Montague, it seems, had made use of him, and given him money, which he loved, for such secrets as he could draw from him. Upon Jenkins's letter, the King sent the above message to the Commons. This was a device of the Lord Danby's, to find his own letters and destroy them, and then to let the prosecution drop. But Montague had put a box, in which the letters were, in sure hands, out of the way. Whilst the debate about the message was in hand, the box was brought to him, which he opened, and took out two of the Lord Danby's letters, that contained instructions to him to treat with the King of France for three hundred thousand pounds a year, for three years, if a peace succeeded; since it would not be convenient for the King to meet a Parliament in all that time, and he was charged to mention no part of this to the Secretary of State.

both subscribed, Danby, and sent to him at Paris, on the negotiation of the money which his Majesty expected from the King of France, at the bottom of one of which were these words, "This letter is writ by my order, C. R." *. These letters discovering to the House, from whence had proceeded the King's delays with regard to the war against France, they immediately resolved, "That there was sufficient matter of impeachment against Thomas Earl of Danby, Lord Treasurer of England," and within two days, by the help of Mr. Montague, the articles of impeachment were drawn up, and sent to the House of Lords. But this impeachment was rather against the King himself, than the Earl of Danby, who had only acted by his express orders. The King easily perceived the design of the Earl of Danby's impeachment, and therefore, before the Lords could resolve, whether the Earl of Danby should be sent to the Tower, he came to the Parliament the 30th of December, and prorogued it to the 4th of February, after passing a single act against the Papists.

Immediately after the prorogation of the Parliament, Sir Joseph Williamson, Secretary of State, resigned the seals into the hands of the King, who appointed the Earl of Sunderland, in his room, though he had given hopes of the place to Sir William Temple, then ambassador in Holland, and had called him over for that purpose. But Temple at his arrival found the post filled, the Earl of Sunderland having paid Williamson six thousand pounds, and five hundred guineas, which Temple was not able or willing to give. Shortly after, the King dismissed the Earl of Danby, and put the treasury into commission.

A. D. 1678-9.] After the prorogation, the King was extremely embarrassed, not only by reason of the Earl of Danby's impeachment, which properly fell upon him, but also by fresh discoveries, both of the plot, and Godfrey's murder. The 21st of December, Miles Prance, a goldsmith of London, a Papist, who had sometimes worked for the Queen in her chapel of Somerset-house, was taken up by a warrant from the council, upon the information of one Wren, a lodger in his house, that he was concerned in the murder of Godfrey. On his denial of this charge, he was thrown into prison, loaded with heavy irons, and confined to the condemned hole, a place, cold, dark, and full of nastiness. Shaftesbury and Buckingham, in examining the prisoners, usually employed threatenings and promises, rigour and indulgence, and every art, under pretence of extorting the truth from them. Prance, being promised a pardon upon making a confession, had not courage to resist, but confessed himself an accomplice in Godfrey's murder. Being asked concerning the plot, he also thought proper to be acquainted with it, and conveyed some intelligence to the council. All the information which he gave with regard to the plot, as well as to the murder of Godfrey, Prance solemnly retracted, both before the King and the secret committee; but, being again thrown into prison, he was induced, by new terrors and new sufferings, to confirm his first information, and was now produced as a sufficient evidence. The murder, he said, was committed in Somerset-house, by the contrivance of Gerard and Kelly, two Irish priests. That Lawrence Hill, footman to the Queen's Treasurer; Robert Green, Cushion Keeper to her Chapel; and Henry Berry, Porter of the Palace; followed Sir Edmundsbury Godfrey, at a distance, from ten in the morning till seven in the evening; but that passing by Somerset-house, Green throwing a twisted handkerchief over his head, he was soon strangled, and the body carried to a high chamber in Somerset-house, from whence it was carried to another apartment, where it was seen by Bedloe. Hill, Green, and Berry were tried upon this evidence; and though Bedloe's narrative and Prance's information were totally irreconcileable, the prisoners were condemned and executed, on the 21st and 28th of February, 1679. They all denied their guilt at their execution, and as Berry died a Protestant, this circumstance was regarded as very considerable; but, instead of its giving some check to the general credulity of the people, men were only surprised, that a Protestant could be induced at his death to persist in so manifest a falsehood.

While these things were transacted, the King was by no means at ease. The plot, and the impeachment against the Earl of Danby, which entirely reflected upon him, could not but greatly perplex him.

About this time too, was discovered a college of jesuits at Lower Come in Herefordshire. Moreover, a fresh witness appeared, one Stephen Dugdale, who pretended to make new discoveries in the plot, and accused five jesuits, and one priest.† This obliged the King to publish a proclamation against Evers, Gawen, Vavasor, alias Gifford, and Levison, jesuits, and Broadstreet, a priest, with a promise of a hundred pounds to any that should apprehend Evers, and fifty pounds for each of the rest.‡

Meanwhile, as the time for the meeting of the Parliament approached, the King perceiving, that in the present disposition of the Commons, he should receive no advantage from them, but rather new mortifications, on the 24th of January dissolved this Parliament by proclamation, promising withal, to issue out writs for the calling of a new Parliament the 6th of March following. Thus ended the long Parliament, which had continued almost eighteen years, and had been for twelve years so favourable to the King.

Upon the 25th of January, the King issued out writs for the new elections, which put the whole nation into a ferment. The people being discontented with the court, and full of suspicions and fears, affected to choose representatives the most averse to Popery and arbitrary government. And as the high church men had been for several years a little too strongly attached to the King; and had, in the last Parliament, passed acts to raise the royal power higher than ever, the people in general were not for trusting their interests in such hands. On the other side, the Presbyterians, though long oppressed, were still numerous in the corporations, so that by the superiority of their votes, they commonly carried the elections in favour of their own party, or at least of men, who had only outwardly conformed to the church of England. In a word, when the returns were made, it was found, that most of the representatives were men very opposite to the principles and designs of the court. The King, to prevent these impressions, affected an extraordinary severity against the Papists, and by proclamation, on complaint of the neglects of the prosecution of recusants, ordered the chancellor to put out of commission, all justices of peace, who were remiss in their duty.

The time for the meeting of the Parliament drawing near, the King, after examining the elections, foresaw a storm gathering against the Duke of York. Wherefore, to prevent it, and persuade the new Parliament that his counsels were not influenced by his brother, he resolved to send him away, and for that purpose, the 28th of February, wrote him the following letter:

"I have already given you my resolves at large, why I think it fit that you should absent yourself for some time beyond the seas: as I am truly sorry for the occasion, so may you be sure, I shall never desire it longer than it will be absolutely necessary for your good, and my service. In the mean time, I think it proper to give it you under my hand, that I expect this com-

* The first was dated January 17, 1677-8, and the second, March 25, 1678.

† Burnet gives the following account of this Dugdale and his evidence. He had been the Lord Aston's bailiff, and was a man of sense and temper. He behaved himself decently, and had somewhat in his air and deportment that disposed people to believe him: so that the King himself began to think there was somewhat in the plot, though he had little regard to Oates or Bedloe. He made a discovery of a correspondence that Evers held with the jesuits in London, who had written to Evers of the design of killing the King, and desired him to find out proper men for executing it. Three other jesuits pressed Dugdale to undertake it, promising he should be canonized for it, and the Lord Stafford offered him five hundred pounds, if he would set about it.

‡ Gawen was soon after taken into custody, but the rest absconded.

pliance from you, and desire it may be as soon as conveniently you can. You may easily believe with what trouble I write; there being nothing I am more sensible of, than the constant kindness you have ever had for me. I hope you are as just to me, to be assured, that no absence, nor any thing else, can ever change me from being truly and kindly yours. C. R."

The Duke immediately obeyed, and the 3d of March departed for Holland, with his Duchess, and the Princess Anne his daughter, from whence he went and resided at Brussels.*

Meantime, the King fearing that the new Parliament would impeach the Earl of Danby, and that the Earl, in prevention of his own danger, would be obliged to reveal secrets, which he wished to be concealed, granted him, under the great seal, as full and complete a pardon as could be drawn.

The new Parliament meeting the 6th of March, the King made a speech, tending to show how well-affected he was to the laws of the land, and the Protestant religion.

The Parliament began with a warm dispute between the King and the Commons, about the choice of a speaker. The Commons having chosen Mr. Edward Seymour, the King, who knew Seymour was a particular enemy of the Earl of Danby, refused his approbation, and ordered the Commons to proceed to a new choice. The House was extremely displeased with this refusal, alledging, "That it was never known that a person should be excepted against, and no reason at all given, and that the thing itself of presenting a speaker to the King, was but a bare compliment." The King, on his side, insisted on the approbation or refusal of a speaker when presented to him, as a branch of his prerogative. At last, as the Commons would not desist from what they thought their right, the King went to the Parliament, and prorogued it from the 13th to the 15th; that is, for one day's interval between the two sessions. The Parliament meeting the 15th, the King ordered the Commons to proceed to the choice of a speaker. Then, to avoid a revival of the dispute, they chose Mr. William Gregory, serjeant at law, who was approved by the King.†

The Commons began with appointing a committee to examine controverted elections, threescore petitions having been already presented.

This affair being put into a way of determination, the Commons appeared resolved to pursue the matters which the late Parliament had left undecided. For this purpose, the 20th of March, they appointed a secret committee, to take informations, prepare evidence, and draw up articles against the Lords that were impeached, and to take such further informations as should be given relating to the plot against his Majesty and the government, and the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey. At the same time, they desired the Lords, by an express message, to remember the impeachment of high treason exhibited against Thomas Earl of Danby, in the names of the Commons of England, and to commit him to safe custody. They resolved also, that it should be referred to the committee of secrecy, to draw up further articles against him.

The 11th of April was appointed to be kept as a public fast day. The 22d of March, the Commons ordered a bill to be brought in, to secure the King and kingdom against the danger and growth of Popery.

The same day the King going to the Parliament, spoke to both Houses in favour of the Earl of Danby. He told them, that as Danby had acted in every thing by his orders, he was in no respect criminal: that his pardon, however, he would insist upon, and if it should be found anywise defective in form, he would renew it again and again, till it should be rendered entirely complete: but that he was resolved to deprive him of all employments, and to remove him from court. The Commons were no-wise satisfied with this concession. They pretended that no pardon of the crown could lie in bar of an impeachment by the Commons. The prerogative of mercy had hitherto been understood to be unlimited in the King; and this pretension of the Commons, it must be confessed, was entirely new. It was however not unsuitable to the genius of a monarch strictly limited; where the King's ministers are supposed to be for ever accountable to national assemblies, even for such abuses of power as they may commit by orders from their master. The present emergency, while the nation was so highly inflamed, was the proper time for pushing such popular claims; and the Commons failed not to avail themselves of this rage. They still insisted on the impeachment of Danby. The Peers, in compliance with them, departed from their former scruples, and ordered Danby to be taken into custody. Danby absconded. The Commons passed a bill, appointing him to surrender himself before a certain day, or, in default of it, attainting him. A bill had passed the Upper House, mitigating the penalty to banishment; but, after some conferences, the Peers thought proper to yield to the violence of the Commons, and the bill of attainder was carried. Rather than undergo such severe penalties, Danby appeared and was immediately committed to the Tower.

A. D. 1679.] The 3d of April, articles of impeachment against the five Popish Lords in the Tower were drawn up by the Commons, and carried to the House of Lords.

By the advice of Sir William Temple, the King now resolved to establish a new council, into which were admitted some Lords most opposite to him, as the Earls of Shaftsbury and Essex. This council consisted of thirty members, fifteen of whom were ever to be the present chief officers of his crown and household. Ten were to be taken out of the nobility, and five out of the Commons. But he took care in this model of his council, to have a majority of such as were devoted to him. The Earl of Shaftsbury was made president of this council, though no man was more hated by the King. His aim was to persuade the public and the Parliament, that he was resolved entirely to change his manner of governing, and be guided in all affairs whatsoever, by the advice of the new council. But this was only to amuse the public. The Earl of Shaftsbury would have been extremely pleased with being president of the council, if his authority had been proportionable to his office. But he quickly perceived, he was there only for show, and to be subservient to the King's designs. There were chiefly four who had the direction of affairs committed to them; namely, the Earls of Sunderland and Essex, the Lord Hallifax, and Sir William Temple.

The King had no sooner made this alteration, than he came to the Parliament to acquaint them with it. But though the city of London, and the rest of the kingdom resounded with joyful acclamations, and were persuaded that things were going to change for the better, the House of Commons received the news with great coldness. They had not sufficient confidence in the King, to believe he really intended to govern otherwise than he had hitherto done, but thought this was some new artifice, which would soon produce its effects.

While the alterations the new council was to bring in the affairs of the government, were impatiently expected, the Commons were suddenly alarmed by an information of a fresh design of the Papists to burn London a second time. The house of one Bird in Fetter Lane being set on fire, his servant, Elizabeth Oxley, was suspected of firing it on purpose, and sent to prison. She confessed the fact, and declared, she had been employed to do it by one Stubbs, a Papist, who had promised her five pounds. Stubbs being taken up, confessed, he persuaded her to it, and that father Gifford his confessor put him upon it, telling him, "It

* The Duke first required an order, signed by the King, lest his absenting himself should be interpreted as a proof of fear, or of guilt. He also desired that his brother should satisfy him, as well as the public, by a declaration of the illegitimacy of the Duke of Monmouth. With this the King readily complied.

† Burnet adds, the point was settled, that the right of electing was in the House, and that the confirmation was a thing of course.

was no sin to burn all the houses of Heretics." He added, that he had frequent conferences on this affair with Gifford, and two Irishmen. Moreover, Stubbs and the maid servant declared, the Papists were to make an insurrection, and expected an army of sixty thousand men from France. The Commons obtained a pardon for Stubbs and the servant, in consideration of their ready confession. But it was generally inferred from this incident, that it was not Gifford's fault that the city of London was not burnt, as in the year 1666.

The Commons next ordered a bill to be brought in to banish all Papists, or reputed Papists, within London and Westminster, twenty miles from the same, for six months; and then they voted, nemine contradicente, "That the Duke of York being a Papist, the hopes of his coming such to the crown, has given the greatest countenance and encouragement to the present conspiracies and designs of the Papists against the King and the Protestant religion." This vote was sent to the Lords for their concurrence.

The 25th of April the Earl of Danby appeared at the bar of the House of Lords, and there produced the King's pardon for all crimes and offences whatsoever committed before the 28th day of February last. After which he was sent back to the Tower. The Lords having given notice of this to the Commons, they appointed a committee of secrecy to examine the nature of the Earl's plea, who made their report, "That there was no precedent, of a pardon granted to any person impeached by the Commons of high treason, or other high crimes depending in the impeachment." After this report, the Commons desired the Lords to demand of the Earl of Danby, "Whether he would rely upon, and abide by the plea of his pardon." This was the next day, and the Earl praying time to answer, the Lords allowed him four days.

The vote of the Commons concerning the Duke of York touched the King very sensibly, for he saw, they did not intend to stop there. He therefore went to the Parliament the 30th of April, and in a short speech recommended to both Houses the dispatch of three affairs:

I. The prosecution of the plot.

II. The disbanding of the army.

III. The providing a fleet for the common security.

Then to give them a proof of his care to preserve their religion for the future, he told them, "That he had commanded his Chancellor to mention several particulars, which he hoped would be an evidence, that in all things that concerned the public security, he should not follow their zeal but lead it."

These proposals were not received by the House of Commons with that applause, the King had expected. The day after, the Commons proceeded on the bill for preventing the dangers arising from Popery, as well in his reign, as his successor's.

They also read the first time a "Bill for better prevention of illegal exaction of money from the subject;" and ordered another to be brought in, "That when any member of the House was preferred to any office or place of profit, a new writ should immediately be issued out for electing a member to serve in his stead."

The 5th of May they resolved, "That the pardon pleaded by the Earl of Danby was illegal and void," and the speaker, with the whole House, went up to the Lords' bar, and demanded judgment against him.

Shortly after they drew up an address against the Duke of Lauderdale, in the strongest terms that could be used, which was carried in a full body to the King. But it seems the King could not then part with this minister, the last of the Cabal, and therefore he coldly answered, "That he would consider of it, and return an answer."

After this, the Commons finished the money-bill for disbanding the army, which the King passed the 9th of May. By this act a supply was granted to the King of two hundred and six thousand, four hundred and sixty-two pounds, seventeen shillings and three-pence, for paying off and disbanding the forces raised since the 29th of September, 1677. The act had a clause in it, that for the future, "Soldiers should not be quartered in any person's house against his consent."

At the same time the Lords informed the Commons, that the Earl of Danby resolved to adhere to the plea of his pardon; and that the Commons having demanded judgment against him, as conceiving his pardon illegal and null, the tenth instant was appointed for hearing the Earl of Danby to make good his plea. The Lords likewise acquainted the Commons, that they had resolved, that the five Lords in the Tower should be brought to their trials the 14th instant.

The part of the message concerning the Earl of Danby so offended the Commons, that they resolved, "That no Commoner whatsoever should presume to maintain the validity of the pardon pleaded by the Earl of Danby, without the consent of the House first had, and that the persons so doing, should be accounted betrayers of the liberties of the Commons of England." The true reason of these proceedings was, that by the examination of the several articles of the Earl's impeachment, the Commons hoped to discover the King's secret practices with the court of France; whereas the King by his pardon had put the affair in such a state, that there would have been no occasion to examine the Earl of Danby's answers to the articles exhibited against him.

The vote of the Commons much inflamed the differences that were already begun between the two Houses, about the manner of proceeding against the five Lords in the Tower. For the Lords had addressed the King to appoint a Lord High Steward to preside in the trials; but the Commons, thinking it unnecessary, proposed, "That a committee of both Houses might be nominated to consider of the most proper ways and methods of proceeding upon impeachments." And this is what the Lords refused, which occasioned a warm dispute; but at last the Lords agreed to the nomination of the committee.

The same day the Lords communicated to the House of Commons, a petition from the Earl of Danby, in which he set forth, "That he met with informations severally from his council, that he durst not appear to argue the validity of his pardon, by reason of the vote of the House of Commons." Their Lordships therefore desired to know, "Whether there was any such vote as was alledged in the petition?"

It appears plainly in the proceedings of the Commons, that they only sought occasion to drive things to extremity. With this view, they presented an address to the King, taking notice, "That multitudes of Jesuits, Popish priests, and Popish recusants, resorted to the cities of London and Westminster, in contempt of his Majesty's laws and royal proclamations. Wherefore they humbly besought his Majesty, that the militia of London, Westminster, Southwark, the Tower-Hamlets, Middlesex, and Surrey, might immediately be raised, and put in a posture of defence." The next day, though Sunday, they ordered a bill to be brought in, (pursuant to their resolve that day fortnight) "To disable the Duke of York to inherit the imperial crown of England." Immediately after they resolved, nemine contradicente, "That in defence of the King's person, and the Protestant religion, they would stand by his Majesty with their lives and fortunes; and that if his Majesty should come by any violent death, they would revenge it to the utmost upon the Papists." This was soon after put into the form of an address, and presented to the King, who thanked them, and said, "That he would do what in him lay to secure the Protestant religion, and was willing to do all such things as might be to the good and benefit of his subjects."

The committee of both Houses meeting to consider of the way and method of trying the impeached Lords, there was a warm dispute between the two Houses, concerning the Bishops; the Commons pretending, that the Bishops could not sit upon the trial of the impeached Lords, because it was a case of blood. The Peers on the other hand maintained, "That the Lords spiritual have a right to stay and sit in court, till the court proceed to the vote of guilty, or not guilty." This affair made a great noise, and occasioned several books to be written on both sides.*

At last, on the 15th of May, the Commons read the first time their bill, "To disable the Duke of York from inheriting the imperial crown of England," now called the Exclusion bill.†

Five days after, this bill was read a second time, upon which the question being put, whether the bill should be committed, it was carried by two hundred and seven votes against one hundred and twenty-eight.

The Commons next proceeded to an inquiry after the pensioners in the last Parliament. By means of Sir Stephen Fox, eighteen were discovered who had received annual pensions from the King, two of one thousand pounds, six of five hundred pounds, two of four hundred pounds, four of three hundred pounds, four of two hundred pounds. Besides these, there were six others who had received certain sums at one time: three more were brought in for sums received upon account; and five for uncertain sums.

In the mean time, the King being highly offended with the Commons, and hearing moreover, that they intended to present to him a remonstrance, much like that presented to the King his father in 1641, and of which the design was to inflame the nation against him, resolved to prorogue the Parliament. For this purpose he went to the House of Lords the 27th of May, and sending for the Commons, passed some bills, and particularly one for securing the liberty of the subject, called the Habeas Corpus Act, and then prorogued the Parliament to the 14th of August. By this the Exclusion bill was defeated for a time.

The news of the proceedings of the English Parliament had so raised the hopes of the Scotch mal-contents, that they thought the time was come to be revenged of their persecutors. Sharp, Archbishop of St. Andrew's, was the most hated of their enemies. Sharp is said to have abundantly merited the hatred of the Presbyterians. For pretending, an extraordinary zeal for their party, he had prevailed to be deputed to London after the restoration, to take care of their interests, but had basely betrayed them. This raised him to the Archbishopric of St. Andrew's, and from that time he became their most violent persecutor. Wherefore in this juncture, when they expected great alterations, twelve of them resolved to begin their revenge upon their enemies with the Archbishop. For this purpose they waited for him about two miles from St. Andrew's, where he was going in a coach and six, and most inhumanly and barbarously murdered him, calling him, "Apostate, betrayer of the godly, and persecutor of Christ's church." This murder was committed the 2d of May.‡ In the end of the same month, eighty Presbyterians appeared in arms, and in a few days their number increased to fifteen hundred. They seized Glasgow, and some other towns in the neighbourhood, and committed great outrages.

The King hearing of this rebellion, and that it daily gathered strength, sent the Duke of Monmouth at the head of some English forces, who were joined by some Scotch regiments. The Duke discharged his commission with such bravery and success, that the 22d of June he entirely defeated the rebels, at Bothwell-bridge, killed eight hundred, and took about twelve hundred prisoners. Several were hanged, and the rest were transported.

Shortly after the prorogation of the Parliament, the five jesuits, Whitebread, Harcourt, Fenwick, Gawen, and Turner, were tried. Besides Oates and Bedloe, Dugdale, the new witness, appeared against the prisoners. This man had been steward to Lord Aston, and, though poor, possessed a character somewhat more reputable than the other two: but his account of the plot was equally monstrous and incredible. Amongst other things, he asserted, that two hundred thousand Papists in England were ready to take arms. The prisoners proved, by sixteen witnesses from St. Omer's, students, and most of them young men of family, that Oates was in that seminary, at the time when he swore that he was in London: but as they were Catholics, and disciples of the jesuits, their testimony was totally disregarded. Even the reception which they met with in court was full of outrage and mockery. One of them saying that Oates always continued at St. Omer's, if he could believe his senses;—"You Papists," said the chief justice—"are taught not to believe your senses." Oates, however, in opposition to the students of St. Omer's, found means to bring evidence of his having been at that time in London: but this evidence, though it had, at that time, the appearance of some solidity, was afterwards discovered (when Oates himself was tried for perjury) to be altogether deceitful. In order farther to discredit that witness, the jesuits proved that he had perjured himself in Father Ireland's trial, whom they shewed to have been in Staffordshire, at the time when Oates swore he was committing treason in London.

* The Lords Nottingham and Roberts argued for the Bishops voting. But the Lords Essex, Shaftsbury, and Holles were against it. Upon a debate, it was carried by the majority that the Bishops had a right to vote. Whereupon the Commons declared they would not proceed, unless the Bishops were obliged to withdraw during the whole trial. Upon this breach the Parliament was prorogued, and soon after dissolved. And the blame was cast chiefly on the Bishops. It seems they desired to withdraw, but the King would not suffer it. He was so set on maintaining the pardon, that he would not venture such a point on the votes of the temporal Lords. He told the Bishops they must stick to him and his prerogative, as they would expect that he should stick to them if they came to be pushed at. By this means they were exposed to the popular fury, and every where censured as a set of men that, for their own ends, would expose the nation and Protestant religion to ruin. And in revenge many began to declare openly in favour of the non-conformists, who upon this behaved very indecently, and fell very severely on the body of the clergy. On the other hand, the Bishops and clergy set themselves to write against the late times, and to draw a parallel between them and the present times: which was not managed decently enough by those who undertook the argument, and who were believed to be set on and paid by the court. Particularly Sir Roger L'Estrange for four years published three or four sheets a week under the title of the Observator, all tending to defame the contrary party, and make the clergy apprehend their ruin was designed. Upon this the greatest part of the clergy delivered themselves up to much heat and indiscretion, which were vented both in their pulpits and common conversation. They seemed now to lay down all fears of popery: and nothing was so common in their mouths as the year forty-one, which, as they hinted, was near being acted over again. Both city and country were full of many indecencies that broke out on this occasion.

† After the particulars of this conspiracy against the King, the established government, and the Protestant religion, the bill set forth:

"That the emissaries, priests, and agents for the Pope, had traiterously seduced James Duke of York, presumptive heir to these crowns, to the communion of the church of Rome; and had induced him to enter into several negotiations with the Pope, his Cardinals, and Nuncios, for promoting the Romish church and its interests; and by his means and procurements had advanced the power and greatness of the French King, to the manifest hazard of these kingdoms, that by descent of these crowns upon a papist, and by foreign alliance and assistance, they might be able to succeed in their wicked and villanous design."—Then, after another preamble, it was enacted to this effect:

"I. That the said James Duke of York, Albany, and Ulster, should be incapable of inheriting the said crowns of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with their dependencies; and of enjoying any of the titles, rights, prerogatives, and revenues, belonging to the said crowns.

"II. That in case his Majesty should happen to die, or resign his dominions, they should devolve to the person next in succession, in the same manner as if the said Duke were dead.

"III. That all the acts of sovereignty and royalty that Prince might then happen to perform, were not only declared void, but to be high-treason, and punishable as such.

"IV. That if any one, at any time whatsoever, should endeavour to bring the said Duke into any of the forementioned dominions, or correspond with him, in order to make him inherit, he should be guilty of high-treason.

"V. That if the Duke himself ever returned into any of these dominions, considering the mischiefs that must ensue, he should be looked upon as guilty of the same offence; and all persons were authorized and required to seize upon and imprison him, and in case of resistance made by him and his adherents, to subdue them by force of arms.

‡ Burnet says, as a party of furious men were riding through a moor near St. Andrew's, without any design then upon Sharp, they saw the Archbishop's coach appear. He was coming from a council-day, and was driving home, having sent some of his servants before to let them know he was coming, and others he had sent off on compliments; so that there were no horsemen about the coach. They seeing this, concluded, according to their frantic enthusiastic notions, that God had now delivered up their greatest enemy into their hands. Seven of them made up to the coach, and one fired a pistol at him, which burnt his coat and gown, but did not touch his body. Upon this they drew him out of his coach, and murdered him barbarously.

don. But these pleas availed them nothing; the jesuits received sentence of death, and were executed; persisting to the last in asserting their innocence. The next trial was that of Langhorne, an eminent lawyer, by whom all the concerns of the Jesuits were managed. Oates and Bedloe swore, that all the papal commissions by which the chief offices in England were filled with Catholics, passed through his hands. He was in course found guilty, and when a verdict was given against the prisoner, the spectators expressed their savage joy by loud acclamations. So high indeed had the popular rage mounted, that the witnesses for this unhappy man, on approaching the court, were almost torn in pieces by the rabble: one in particular was bruised to such a degree as to render his life in danger: and another, a woman, declared, that, unless the court could afford her protection, she durst not give evidence: but as the judges could go no farther than promise to punish such as should do her any injury, the prisoner himself had the humanity to wave her testimony.

The 10th of July, the King, contrary to the advice of his new council, dissolved the Parliament, and summoned another to meet the 17th of October. He hoped to find the next more tractable, but was very much deceived. The people, who no longer regarded what came from the court, affected to send such members as were of the country party, as being the most proper to oppose the designs of the King. The Earl of Shaftsbury was at the head of this party, and without doubt greatly contributed to inflame the passions of the people.

The 18th of June, Sir George Wakeman the Queen's physician was brought to his trial, together with James Corker, William Marshal, two benedictine monks, and William Rumley, a lay brother of that order. Oates and Bedloe were the witnesses against them: but, besides that their depositions were imperfect, and the greatest part upon hearsay, and could pass for proofs only on the supposition of the design to poison the King, which was not well proved, the jury doubtless considered that a person of Sir George Wakeman's sense, would never trust such a secret to Bedloe, whom he scarcely knew. He even swore that he never saw Bedloe before in his life. However this be, the prisoners were acquitted, to the great mortification of the two witnesses, since it was easy to see, that Oates and Bedloe were evidences capable of swearing to things of which they had no perfect knowledge.*

About the end of August, the King being at Windsor, was seized with an intermitting fever, which gave great apprehension. The Earl of Essex and the Lord Hallifax, two of the four counsellors which then managed the King's affairs, fearing, if the King died, to fall into the hands of the Duke of Monmouth, and the Earl of Shaftsbury, advised the King to send for the Duke of York, which was done with all possible speed and secrecy; for the Duke was at Windsor the 2d of September. But the King, being then out of danger, pretended a surprize at his arrival. This dissimulation however was not capable to deceive the Duke of Monmouth and the Earl of Shaftsbury. On the other hand, the Earl of Essex and the Lord Hallifax, finding that they had made Monmouth and Shaftsbury their irreconcileable enemies, joined with the Duke of York for their destruction. They succeeded so well, that the King removed the Duke of Monmouth from his post of Captain-General, and sent him into Holland, to the great surprize of the whole court, for the Duke of Monmouth was in the height of the King's favour before the Duke of York's arrival. Shortly after, Shaftsbury also was turned out from being president of the council. Thus the court had a new face, and the Duke of York was more powerful than ever. He improved this happy juncture to obtain the King's leave to retire to Scotland, representing to him the danger of his being in the Low Countries, in case of his Majesty's death. Accordingly he returned to Brussels, to bring home his Duchess and the Princess Anne, and arriving shortly after at London, departed for Scotland.

Every one impatiently expected, where would end the late alterations at court, and it was not long before it appeared. The 15th of October the King summoning his council, after a little pause told them, "That upon many considerations which he could not at present acquaint them with, he found it necessary to make a longer prorogation of the Parliament than be intended: that he had considered all the consequences so far as to be absolutely resolved, and, not to hear any thing that should be said against it: that he would have the meeting put off, till that time twelvemonth."

This proceeding caused several counsellors to surrender their commissions to the King, and others to absent themselves from the council,† not thinking proper to encourage by their presence, the King's secret resolutions, and give occasion to believe, they approved them. The Earl of Essex resigned his place of first commissioner of the treasury. The Lord Hallifax, Sir William Temple, and some others, retired into the country. Thus the council which the King had appointed to amuse the people, was almost dissolved, and the direction of the public affairs remained in the hands of the Earl of Sunderland, Mr. Laurence Hyde, and Mr. Sidney Godolphin, or rather the Duke of York, whose interests they had embraced; and who, though absent, directed their resolutions.

In the latter end of October, about a fortnight after the prorogation of the Parliament, a sham plot was discovered, contrived by the Papists to bring an odium upon the Presbyterians, and the heads of the country-party. This project had been formed the beginning of August, by the Countess of Powis, Elizabeth Cellier a midwife, the Earl of Castlemain, and the five Lords in the Tower. The design was to make use of false witnesses to accuse Oates of perjury and sodomy; to assassinate the Earl of Shaftsbury, and to charge the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Essex, the Duke of Monmouth, the Lord Hallifax, and several considerable citizens of London, with being concerned in a plot against the King. One Dangerfield was to be the principal actor in this scene.‡ He received his instructions from the Lady Powis, and the Lords in the Tower, with a list of the persons whom he was to accuse. Moreover, the Lady Powis gave him a plan of this plot, which he was to convey into the house of some pretended conspirator, and there cause it to be found.

Dangerfield, furnished with these instructions and papers, informed the Duke of York of it, after his arrival from Brussels. The Duke of York made him a present of twenty guineas, and introduced him to the King, who, after hearing him, gave him forty more. Then he made some attempts to assassinate the Earl of Shaftsbury, but was prevented by several accidents. At last, on pretence of seeing some rooms, which he said he intended to hire, he went to Colonel Mansel's lodgings, and found means to pin some dangerous papers behind his bed's head. This done, he informed two officers of the custom-house, that there were, in those lodgings, prohibited goods, to the value of two thousand pounds. The officers repairing thither the 22d of October, searched every where in hopes of finding their prey; but as they did not think to search behind the bed, Dangerfield himself found the papers. The officers carrying these papers to their superiors, had orders to return them to Mansel. Four or five days after, the Colonel meeting Dangerfield in the street, carried him directly to Whitehall, and brought

* The Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, who had been very violent against the prisoners hitherto, was observed, far contrary to his former practice, to turn against the witnesses in this trial. The Portugal ambassador went next day with great state to thank Scroggs for his behaviour in Wakeman's trial. By which the chief justice was exposed to much censure. This was looked on, it seems, as the Queen's trial as well as Wakeman's. For Oates and Bedloe had both deposed, that she was to assist him in poisoning the King.

† Namely the Lord Russel, the Lord Cavendish, Sir Henry Capel, and Mr. Powle.

‡ Burnet gives him this character; "That he was a subtle and dextrous man, who had gone through all the shapes and practices of roguery, and in particular, was a false coiner. He was in goal for debt, and was in an ill intrigue with one Cellier a Popish midwife, who had a great share of wit, and was abandoned to lewdness."

him before the King and council. He was strictly examined, and, after a full hearing, his contrivance being detected, he was sent to Newgate the 27th of October.

Two days after, Sir William Waller, a magistrate of London, searching Cellier's house, found the plan of the pretended plot, written very fair, in a paper book tied with ribbands, and hid in a meal-tub, which gave it the name of the Meal-Tub Plot. Dangerfield perceiving himself ruined, if he persisted in a thing which he could not support, applied himself to the Lord-Mayor of London, and gave him a writing in long confession upon oath, with a discovery of the persons by whom he was employed. This confession being transmitted to the council, several persons were apprehended,* and amongst the rest Roger Palmer, Earl of Castlemain. The Lady Powis, accused by others, besides Dangerfield, of conspiring the death of the King, was sent to the Tower, and ordered to be prosecuted for high-treason. This affair greatly contributed to the resolution taken by the Earl of Essex and the Lord Hallifax, to retire from court, because they observed, that though they were mentioned in the plot, they were left out of secret examinations about it.

Affairs, in the beginning of the year 1680, were in such a situation, that the King had need of all his patience and address. There were visibly two parties in the kingdom, that of the court, and that of the country. To the endeavours of the court to gain proselytes, the country-party opposed swarms of libels to inflame the people, by representing the mischiefs with which England was threatened, if the designs of the court and the papists were not prevented. When it was known, that the King had resolved to prorogue the Parliament till November, not only anonymous libels were published, but petitions flowed from all parts, for the sitting of the Parliament the 26th of January, according to the last prorogation. The King received these petitions with great trouble, and failed not to return a disobliging answer to those who had the boldness to present them.

However, the King resolved to meet the Parliament the 26th of January, but it was only to tell both Houses, that the unsettled condition of the nation, rendered a long interval of the Parliament absolutely necessary, for composing and quieting of men's minds. That nevertheless he would only prorogue them till April, in order to meet them again in that month, if the condition of his allies abroad demanded their assistance.

Two days after the King declared in council, "That he had sent for his Royal Highness, not having found such an effect from his absence, as should incline him to keep him longer from him, when questions were started of such a nature, as made it reasonable that he should be present at the next session." Upon this invitation the Duke of York appeared at court the 24th of February, where he was received with great pomp and satisfaction by the King his brother.

The Duke's arrival, and the King's late firmness in proroguing the Parliament, notwithstanding the clamours of the mal-contents, greatly encouraged the court-party, so that multitudes of addresses were presented to him, testifying an abhorrence of the liberty taken by some men to require him to hold the Parliament, and in that from Norfolk he was thanked for recalling the Duke of York.

As soon as the Parliament was prorogued, and the Duke of York at court, many addresses were presented in abhorrence of the former, so that two parties were formed, called the Petitioners and the Abhorrers; and as the animosity between the two parties gradually increased, they bestowed upon each other names of reproach, and from hence arose the so much famed distinction of WHIG and TORY. The Petitioners looking upon their adversaries as entirely devoted to the court, and the popish faction, gave them the name of Tories, a title given to the Irish robbers, villians, and cut-throats. The Abhorrers, on their side, considering the Petitioners, as men entirely in the principles of the Parliament of 1640, and as Presbyterians, gave them the name of Whig, or Sour-Milk, formerly appropriated to the Scotch Presbyterians, and rigid covenanters.

The Whigs were directed by the Earl of Shaftsbury, who, looking upon the Duke of York not only as his own, but also as the mortal enemy of his party, believed there was no medium between perishing, or ruining that Prince. To this end, he made it his business to extol the Duke of Monmouth, and render him the darling of the people, imagining, that when he had the people on his side, the supplanting of the Duke of York would not be impracticable. With this view it was, at least it is pretended, that the Earl of Shaftsbury found means to spread a rumour, that the King was lawfully married to Mrs. Walters, the Duke of Monmouth's mother, and that the marriage contract was in a black-box, in the custody of Sir Gilbert Gerard. The King and the Duke of York easily perceived the tendency of this rumour, and therefore omitted nothing to undeceive the people. To this end the King called an extraordinary council the 26th of April, in which he had declared, "That the said report was altogether false, and that he thought himself obliged in honour and conscience to have the matter thoroughly examined and searched into." Gerard appearing before the council, declared upon oath, "that he never had any such writing, as was reported, committed to his charge, nor did he ever see or know of such writing." In short, after many fruitless enquiries after the author of this report, the King was forced to content himself with publishing, the 3d of June, a declaration, to confirm one made January the 6th, and another made March the 3d, which was entered in the council-books, and signed by sixteen Privy-Counsellors, wherein he said, "that to avoid any dispute which might happen in time to come, concerning the succession to the crown, he did declare in the presence of Almighty God, that he never gave, nor made any contract of marriage, nor was married to Mrs. Barlow, alias Walters, the Duke of Monmouth's mother, nor to any other woman whatsoever, but to his present wife Queen Katherine, then living."

This summer were several prosecutions and trials, and the 23d of June, Roger Palmer Earl of Castlemain, a papist, husband to Barbara Villiers Duchess of Cleveland, the King's mistress, was brought to his trial and acquitted. Cellier the midwife, who had assisted the Lady Powis in the sham plot, was likewise acquitted. Shortly after she published a narrative of her trial, with severe reflections upon some persons, then in credit, for which she was tried a second time, and sentenced to stand three times in the pillory, and pay a thousand pounds fine. The grand jury found not the bill against the Countess of Powis. Thus all the persons concerned in the Meal-Tub Plot were acquitted.

Bedloe, the famous witness of the popish plot, died at Bristol the 20th of August. Three or four days before his death, he sent to the Lord Chief-Justice North, then on his circuit; confirmed all his former evidence, except that with regard to the Duke and the Queen; and desired North to apply to the King for some money to relieve him in his necessities. The whole party triumphed extremely in these circumstances of his death; as though the perseverance of one profligate could outweigh the last words of so many men, guilty of no crime but that of popery.

The city of London was then in the country-party, which gave it great reputation. The choice, on Midsummer day, for sheriffs, fell upon two famous Presbyterians, by a majority of voices, both accounted fanatic by the contrary party. These were Slingsby Bethel, and Henry Cornish, who took care to qualify themselves by receiving the sacrament in the church of England, abjuring the covenant, and doing every thing as appointed by act of Parliament. While this election was depending, their favourite bill was thrown out by the Lords. It was pretended, that Bethel's party had committed some violence against the other, which obliged the King to order a commission of Oyer and Terminer to be issued out for trial of the riot. Meanwhile, the two sheriffs, contrary to the King, being chosen, Thomas Papillon, Esq. presented an address to the Lord Mayor, in the name of the city, wherein, after disowning all tumultuous and disorderly proceedings, and testifying an inviolable fidelity to the King, they desired his Lordship, "That he would, in their names, humbly beseech his Majesty, that the Parliament might speedily assemble." Whether the address produced any effect, or the King had already taken his resolution, a few days after, it was made known by a public proclamation, that the Parliament should sit on the 21st of October.

While the time of the meeting of the Parliament was yet remote and uncertain, the court-party had some advantage, but, as it approached, the country-party gained the superiority. The Duke of Monmouth was returned from Holland without leave, and instead of going to court, made several progresses in the kingdom to encourage his friends, and increase their number. This party were resolved to run all hazards, and ruin themselves or the Duke of York, the next session of Parliament. To this end, the Earl of Shaftsbury, attended by twelve Lords and Gentlemen of note, went publicly to Westminster-Hall, and at the King's Bench Bar, by a bill in form, presented the Duke of York as a popish recusant.* The thing was but too true, and the whole kingdom was sensible of it. But till this time no man had dared to take such a step, which was considered as a formal design to break all measures with the Duke. This action so surprized the three principal ministers, that they concluded the contrary party must necessarily be assured beforehand of the resolutions of the Parliament, and they advised the King to send the Duke of York into Scotland. The King approving their reasons, obliged the Duke to return to Scotland, after repeated assurances, that he would never forsake him.

At last, the Parliament met the 21st of October, as the King had promised in his proclamation. After the Speaker was chosen, and approved by the King, the House of Commons immediately discovered what was to be expected from them, by expelling some of their members, for having been Abhorrers. But not content with punishing their own members, they ordered an address to be presented to the King, to remove from all public offices Sir George Jefferies, Serjeant at Law, Recorder of London, and Chief-Justice of Chester, as guilty of the same crime, and betrayer of the rights of the subject.

As this was a new Parliament, and as the affair of the plot was to be resumed at the King's own desire, the witnesses who had already deposed, laid before the House their informations, and were joined by Dangerfield, Jennison, Dugdale, and one Tuberville, a new evidence. Some likewise came from Ireland. Upon a report made to the House, that Dr. Tonge, who had first discovered the plot to the King, had received no gratuity, he was now recommended to his Majesty for the first good ecclesiastical preferment that fell in his gift. But the Doctor was disappointed of the benefit of this recommendation, by leaving the world not long after. The King on this occasion discovered no less zeal than the Commons, and issued out a proclamation, with a promise of his pardon to any person who should, within two months, give farther information and evidence concerning the horrid and execrable popish plot.

But this dissimulation was not capable of deceiving the Commons. Five days after the opening of the Parliament, Lord Russel moved, "That they might in the first place take into consideration how to suppress popery, and prevent a popish successor." He was seconded by Sir Henry Capel, brother to the Earl of Essex, who, in a long speech, related what had been done to the prejudice of the kingdom during the present reign. He ascribed the whole to the Popish councils. He spoke of the first Dutch war; of the division of the fleet; of the affair of Chatham; of the fire of London; of the discharge of the prisoners concerned in that wicked act, without trial; of the violation of the Triple League; of the seizing the Dutch Smyrna fleet before war was proclaimed; of the second Dutch war; of the permission to the Irish papists to wear arms; of the alteration of the government of Scotland, by lodging it in a commissioner and a council, besides an army of twenty thousand men. He said, the papists were emboldened to act any thing, by the hopes of having the Duke of York for King: that they were moreover encouraged by the French Ambassador, who by his frequency at court, seemed to be rather one of the family, and of the King's household, than a foreign Ambassador; and by his free recourse to his Majesty, rather a prime minister of state of this kingdom, than a counsellor to another prince: that since all these irregularities and enormities proceeded from the popish party, supported by the Duke of York, it was high time to think of some effectual expedient to prevent popery and a popish successor.

Several other members spoke to the same effect, some more, some less; and, in conclusion, it was resolved "That a bill be brought in to disable the Duke of York to inherit the Imperial Crown of this realm."

In the course of the debates on this bill, Sir Francis Winnington alledged, "that an act of the thirteenth of Elizabeth made it treason for any man to say, that the Parliament could not alter the succession." To which Mr. Finch replied, "I will not say that acts of Parliament cannot dispose of the succession, because it was made treason by a statute in the 13th of Elizabeth. But I will deny that the Kings of England rule by virtue of any statute law, as was suggested; for their right is by so ancient a prescription, as that it may justly be said to be from God alone, and that no power on earth ought to dispute it."

At last, after several days' debates, the Exclusion-bill passed the House by a great majority. This bill was much the same with the other brought in during the last Parliament, only it had this additional clause, "That, during the life of James Duke of York, the act should be given in charge at every assizes and general sessions, and read openly in every cathedral, Parish-church and chapel, twice every year immediately after Divine Service, that is to say, on the 25th of December, and upon Easter-day."

While the Commons were proceeding on this bill, the King endeavoured to interrupt their debates by two messages. By the first he desired them to expedite such matters as were depending before them, relating to popery and the plot. Assuring them, that all remedies they could tender to him, conducing to these ends, should be very acceptable to him, provided they were such as might consist with preserving the succession of the crown in the legal course of descent. The other message was concerning Tangier, to recommend to the Commons the preservation of that place. But the House not being disposed to content the King, took occasion from this message to present a long address, or rather remonstrance, setting forth, in eighteen articles, the dangerous state of the kingdom, with regard to popery.

Two days afterwards, on the 15th of November, the Exclusion-bill was sent up to the House of Lords. It passed only by two voices upon the first reading. But on the second reading it was thrown out by a superiority of sixty-three, against thirty. Of fourteen Bishops that day in the House, three only gave their votes for, and eleven against the bill. The King was present at the whole debate, which lasted till near midnight.

It was a great mortification to the Commons, to see

* They that attested the bill were the Earls of Huntington and Shaftsbury; the Lords Grey of Werk, Brandon, Gerard, Russel, and Cavendish; Sir Gilbert Gerard, Sir Edward Hungerford, Sir Scroop How, Sir William Cooper, Sir Thomas Wharton, John Trenchard, Thomas Thynne, and William Forrester, Esquires. By the sudden dismission of the grand jury, the matter had no consequence in the forms of the court.

grew so sullen and out of humour, that they fell upon several members of their own House; expelling some, and impeaching and imprisoning others; as well as upon persons not of their House, for being Abhorrers, or for having advised and assisted in drawing up the proclamation against petitioning for the sitting of the Parliament. But this served only to discover their rage at their disappointment concerning the Exclusion-bill.

On the 30th of November a new scene was opened, namely, the trial of William Howard, Lord Viscount Stafford, one of the five popish Lords in the Tower, who were accused of being concerned in the plot. He was tried before the Lords in Westminster-Hall, the Chancellor being appointed by the King, to perform the office of High-Steward. The managers for the Commons began with the plot in general, and laid open the malice, wickedness, and horror of so dreadful, bloody, and hellish a design: they strenuously insisted on the express positive oaths of the witnesses, upon whom the credit of the plot depended: they expatiated on Coleman's letters and others, clearly proving the designs and activity of the writers: they pressed home the execrable murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, charged upon the papists, as well by the oaths of self-acknowledged partners in the fact, as by a letter sent from London to Tixall, intimating this very murder, the third day after it was committed: they fully displayed the sham plots, and counter-contrivances, whereby the papists would have suborned the King's evidence, and turned all the guilt upon his Majesty's loyal subjects: they urged the firing the city, the burning the navy, the calling in French armies, wild Irish, Spanish pilgrims, &c. They recapitulated the several trials of Ireland, Whitebread, Langhorn, &c. and alledged the votes of both Houses of Parliament, declaring the plot. To corroborate all which, they repeated the cruelties of Queen Mary, the French and Irish massacres, the powder-plot, &c. And they anatomised the wicked principles and practices of murdering, lying, equivocating, for-swearing, faith-breaking, &c. imputed to the papists, as held by them lawful and meritorious. In fine, they produced witnesses to prove the plot in general, but chiefly three appeared against the accused Lord, namely, Dugdale, Oates, and Turberville.—Dugdale gave testimony, that the prisoner, at Tixal, a seat of Lord Aston's, had endeavoured to assist him in the design of murdering the King; and had promised him, besides the honour of being sainted by the church, a reward of five hundred pounds for that service. Turberville deposed, that the prisoner, in his own house at Paris, had made him a like proposal.

The accused Lord, in his defence, alledged many things to invalidate the credit of the plot; and particularly, the reputation of these three witnesses. It had been sworn by Dugdale, that Stafford had assisted in a great consult of the Catholics held at Tixal; but Stafford proved, by undoubted testimony, that at the time assigned he was in Bath, and in that neighbourhood. Turberville had served a noviciate among the Dominicans; but having deserted the convent, he had enlisted as a trooper in the French army; and being dismissed that service, he now lived in London, abandoned by all his relations, and in great poverty. Stafford proved, by the evidence of his gentlemen and his page, that Turburville had never, either at Paris or at London, been seen in his company; and it might justly appear strange, that a person, who had so important a secret in his keeping, was so long entirely neglected by him. The accusations and depositions were express, and the prisoner's defence consisted,

I. In an absolute denial of the crime for which he was impeached.

II. In several allegations against the witnesses.

III. In an improbability alledged against Oates, that if he had been so well acquainted with the secrets of so many rich men, they would never have suffered him to be reduced to such want.

IV. In a witness who deposed, that Dugdale was a person of an infamous life, and guilty of several cheats.

However, after the Lord Stafford had made a long and pathetic speech, and in the presence of God protested his innocence, he was found guilty by fifty-five votes against thirty-one. The Lord High-Steward asking him, "What he could say for himself, why judgment of death should not pass upon him, according to law?" He replied, "My Lord, I have very little to say; I confess, I am surprized at it, for I did not expect it. But God's will be done; I will not murmur at it. God forgive those that have falsely sworn against me."*

The 29th of December he was beheaded, being sixty-eight years of age.†

The 15th of December, the King came to the House of Lords, and sending for the Commons, made a speech to both Houses, which was a repetition of that made at the opening of this session, relating to his alliances with Spain and Holland, for the repose of Christendom, and concerning Tangier. After which he renewed his promise of concurring with them in any remedies for the security of the Protestant religion, which might consist with preserving the security of the succession of the crown in its due and legal course of descent.

The Commons returning to their House, instead of taking the King's speech into consideration, resolved

* When the high steward told him that the Peers would intercede with the King for remitting the more cruel and ignominious parts of the sentence, hanging and quartering, he burst into tears: but he told the Lords, that he was moved to this weakness, by his sense of their goodness, not by any terror of that fate which he was doomed to suffer. It is remarkable that, after Charles, as is usual in such cases, had remitted to Stafford the hanging and the quartering, the two sheriffs, Bethel and Cornish, indulging their own republican humour, and complying with the prevalent spirit of their party, ever jealous of monarchy, stated a doubt with regard to the King's power of exercising even this small degree of lenity. "Since he cannot pardon the whole," said they, "how can he have power to remit any part of the sentence." They proposed the doubt to both Houses: the Peers pronounced it superfluous; and even the Commons, apprehensive lest a question of this nature might make way for Stafford's escape, gave this singular answer—"This House is content, that the sheriffs do execute William late Viscount Stafford, by severing his head from his body only." Nothing can be a stronger proof of the fury of the times, than that Lord Russel, notwithstanding the virtue and humanity of his character, seconded in the House this barbarous scruple of the sheriffs.

† In the interval between the sentence and the execution, many efforts were made to shake the resolution of the infirm and aged prisoner, and to bring him to some confession of the treason for which he was condemned. It was even rumoured, that he had confessed; and the zealous party men, who, no doubt, had secretly, notwithstanding their credulity, entertained some doubts with regard to the reality of the Popish conspiracy, expressed great triumph on the occasion. But Stafford, when again called before the House of Peers, discovered many schemes, which had been laid by himself and others, for procuring a toleration to the Catholics, at least a mitigation of the penal laws enacted against them: and he protested, that this was the sole treason of which he had been guilty.—Stafford now prepared himself for death, with the intrepidity which became his birth and station, and which was the natural result of the innocence and integrity, which, during the course of a long life, he had ever maintained: his mind seemed even to collect new force from the violence and oppression under which he laboured. When going to execution, he called for a cloak to defend him against the rigour of the season. "Perhaps" said he, "I may shake with cold, but I trust in God not for fear." On the scaffold, he continued, with reiterated and earnest asseverations, to make protestations of his innocence; all his fervour was exercised on that point: when he mentioned the witnesses, whose perjury bereaved him of his life, his expressions were full of mildness and of charity. He solemnly disavowed all those immoral principles, which over zealous Protestants had ascribed without distinction to the church of Rome: and, he hoped, he said, that the time was now approaching, when the present delusion would be dissipated; and when the force of truth, though late, would engage the whole world to make reparation to his injured honour.—The populace, who had exulted at Stafford's trial and condemnation, were now melted into tears at the sight of that tender fortitude, which shone forth in each feature, and motion, and accent of this aged noble. Their profound silence was only interrupted by sighs and groans. With difficulty they found speech to assent to those protestations of innocence, which he frequently repeated: "We believe you, my Lord! God bless you, my Lord!" These expressions, with a faultering accent, flowed from them. The executioner himself was touched with sympathy: twice he lifted up the axe, with an intent to strike the fatal blow, and as often felt his resolution to fail him. A deep sigh was heard to accompany his last effort, which laid Stafford for ever at rest. All the spectators seemed to feel the blow. And when the head was held up to them with the usual cry, "This is the head of a traitor," no clamour of assent was uttered. Pity, remorse, and astonishment had taken possession of every heart, and displayed itself in every countenance.—This is the last blood which was shed on account of the Popish plot.

themselves into a grand committee, how to secure the kingdom against popery and arbitrary government. Besides insisting on the exclusion, they proceeded to bring in bills of an important, and some of them of an alarming nature: one, to renew the triennial act, which had been so inadvertently repealed in the beginning of the reign: a second, to make the office of judge during good behaviour: a third, to declare the levying money without consent of Parliament to be high-treason: a fourth, to order an association for the safety of his Majesty's person, for defence of the Protestant religion, for the preservation of the Protestant subjects against all invasions and opposition whatever, and for preventing the Duke of York or any papist from succeeding to the crown. The memory of the covenant was too recent for men to overlook the consequences of such an association: and the King, who was particularly conversant in Davila, could not fail of recollecting a memorable foreign instance, to fortify his domestic experience. The Commons also passed many votes, which, though they had not the authority of laws, served however to discover the temper and disposition of the House. They voted, that whoever had advised his Majesty to refuse the Exclusion-bill, were promoters of popery, and enemies to the King and kingdom. In another vote, they named the Marquis of Worcester, the Earls of Clarendon, Feversham, and Halifax, Lawrence, Hyde, and Edward Seymour, as those dangerous enemies; and they requested his Majesty to remove them from his person and councils for ever: they voted that, till the Exclusion bill were passed, they could not, consistent with the trust reposed in them, grant the King any manner of supply. And lest he should be enabled, by any other expedient, to support the government, and preserve himself independent, they passed another vote, in which they declared that whoever should hereafter lend, by way of advance, any money upon those branches of the King's revenues, arising from customs, excise, or hearth-money, should be judged a hinderer of the sitting of Parliament, and be responsible for the same in Parliament. The King might presume that the Peers, who had rejected the Exclusion-bill, would still continue to defend the throne, and that none of the dangerous bills, introduced into the other House, would ever be presented for the royal assent and approbation. But as there remained no hopes of bringing the Commons to any better temper, and as their farther sitting served only to keep faction alive, and to perpetuate the general ferment of the nation, he came secretly to a resolution of proroguing them. They got intelligence about a quarter of an hour before the black rod came to their door. Not to lose such precious time, they passed in a tumultuous manner some extraordinary resolutions. They voted, that whosoever advised his Majesty to prorogue the Parliament to any other purpose than in order to pass the bill of Exclusion, was a betrayer of the King, of the Protestant religion, and of the kingdom of England; a promoter of the French interest, and a pensioner of France: that thanks be given to the city of London for their manifest loyalty, and for their care and vigilance in the preservation of the King, and of the Protestant religion: that it is the opinion of this House, that that city was burned in the year 1666 by the papists, designing thereby to introduce arbitrary power and popery into the kingdom: that humble application be made to his Majesty for restoring the Duke of Monmouth to all his offices and commands, from which, it appears to the House, he had been removed by the influence of the Duke of York: and that it is the opinion of the House, that the prosecution of the Protestant dissenters upon the penal laws is at this time grievous to the subject, a weakening of the Protestant interest, an encouragement of popery, and dangerous to the peace of the kingdom.

These voteswere scarcely passed, when the King came to the House of Peers, and sending for the Commons, gave the royal assent to two or three acts of little importance, and then, the Chancellor, by his order, prorogued the Parliament to the 20th of January.*

Three days after, the Lord-Mayor and Common Council of London presented the King an address, for the sitting of the Parliament on the day appointed, that they might effect the great affairs before them. This address served only to exasperate the King further. Wherefore, by a proclamation, the 18th of January, he dissolved the Parliament. At the same time he summoned another to meet at Oxford the 21st of March.

Immediately after the dissolution of the Parliament, the King removed the Earl of Sunderland from being Secretary, and gave the place to the Earl of Conway. He likewise struck out of the council-book, the names of the Earls of Essex, Salisbury, Sunderland, and Sir William Temple, and in their room put men whose principles were more agreeable to his own. In a word, by the men whom he advanced, he sufficiently discovered his intention to support the Duke of York his brother, let what would be the consequence.

On the other hand, the contrary party to the court were not idle. The magistracy and common-council of London, being of that party, hastened the elections of members to serve in the ensuing Parliament, and on the 4th of February re-chose their old members. The election was no sooner over, than the new representatives were presented with a paper, in the name of the citizens of London then assembled in Common-Hall, containing "a return of their most hearty thanks for their faithful and unwearied endeavours in the two last Parliaments, to search into and discover the depth of the popish plot; to preserve his Majesty's royal person, the Protestant religion, and the well established government of this realm; to secure the meeting and sitting of frequent Parliaments; to assert their undoubted rights of petitioning, and to punish such as have betrayed those rights; to promote the long-wished for union of his Majesty's Protestant subjects; to repeal the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth, and the corporation act; and more especially for their assiduous endeavours in promoting the Bill of Exclusion of James Duke of York." In fine, they concluded, "that being confidently assured, that they, the said members for the city, will never consent to the granting any money-supply, till they have effectually secured them against popery and arbitrary power, they resolved, by God's assistance, to stand by their said members with their lives and fortunes." The example of London was followed by most places in the kingdom, and not only the old members were re-elected,† but papers of addresses, like that of London, were presented to them. So, when the elections were over, the King with grief saw, he was going to meet the same Parliament he had dissolved.

Meanwhile, the King's precaution to call his new Parliament at Oxford, gave great uneasiness to the country-party. They were desirous that the Parliament should sit at Westminster, where they were sure of the assistance of the Londoners in case of need. And who knows, whether some did not propose to use, for passing the Exclusion-bill in the House of Lords, the same means formerly used to extort from the Peers their consent to the bill of attainder against the Earl of Strafford? Be this as it will, they resolved to use their utmost endeavours to have the place altered, and the Parliament removed to Westminster. For this purpose, the Duke of Monmouth, the Earl of Essex, and fourteen other Peers, presented a petition against assembling the Parliament at Oxford, "where the two Houses," they said, "could not be in safety; but would be easily exposed to the swords of the papists and their adherents, of whom too many had creeped into his Majesty's guards." These insinuations, which pointed so evidently at the King himself, were not calculated to persuade him, but to inflame the people.

To this address the King returned no answer.

All this while the two parties were skirmishing in so hot, or rather so violent a manner, with their pens, that

* The bill for repealing the 35th Eliz. he privately ordered the clerk of the crown not to present to him. By this artifice, which was equally disobliging to the country party as if the bill had been rejected, and at the same time applied some timidity in the King, that salutary act was, for the present, eluded.

† There were a hundred and ten new members chosen.

no measures were kept. Libels swarmed with impunity. Some pretend this was a court-artifice, to prevent the union of the Protestants, and that ill-language, thrown out against the King and the Duke of York, was patiently suffered, in order to cast the blame on the Presbyterians, and give the episcopal party occasion to return the imputation of being too much attached to the court. Thus much is certain, this division, which was carefully fomented, turned to the King's advantage, as will hereafter appear.

One Fitz-Harris, an Irish papist, who had free access to the Duchess of Portsmouth, and kept a correspondence with her favourite-woman, Mrs. Wall, and with the confessor of the French ambassador, having received several presents, and particularly one of two hundred and fifty guineas, undertook to prevail with one Edmund Everard, to write a libel against the King. Everard feigned to consent, and appointed a meeting to receive informations, by which his pamphlet was to be framed. But at the same time he communicated the affair to Sir William Waller, and Mr. Smith, and caused them to be concealed in a place where they might hear what passed between Fitz-Harris and him. The next day, being both together in a room, Fitz-Harris told Everard, that he should write a libel against the King upon the following heads:

"That the King and royal family were papists, and arbitrarily affected from the beginning. That Charles I. had a hand in the Irish rebellion, and that Charles II. did countenance the same, by preferring Fitz-Gerald, Fitz-Patrick, and Mount Garret, who were engaged in the rebellion. That the act, forbidding to call the King a papist, was to stop men's mouths when he should incline to further popery; which appeared by his adhering so closely to the Duke of York's interest, and hindering him from being proceeded against by the Parliament, and hindering the officers put in by the Duke, to be turned out; and for that the Privy-Counsellors and Justices of the peace, who were for the Protestant interest, were turned out of all the places of trust. That it was as much in the power of the people to depose a popish possessor, as a popish successor; and seeing there were no hopes that the Parliament, when they met at Oxford, could do any good, the people were bound to provide for themselves."

Everard afterwards received these instructions in writing, and drew up his libel, which was to be dispersed by the penny-post, to the Protestant Lords, and particularly to the leading Presbyterians, whose houses were to be searched in order to find this libel, which was to serve as a proof of a conspiracy formed by the Presbyterians against the government. This is what Everard affirmed, and that the whole came from the court. At last, Waller having informed the King of the affair, the King ordered Secretary Jenkins to issue out a warrant for apprehending Fitz-Harris, and that Waller should execute it. Yet he was no sooner gone, but Sir William declared, he was informed by two worthy gentlemen, "That the King was highly offended with him, saying, he had broken all his measures." However, Waller arrested Fitz-Harris, and sent him to Newgate.

Here, as in the former affair concerning the plot, it is pretended, that Fitz-Harris was gained by promises or threats, to depose what has been seen. But before this affair could be fully discovered, Fitz-Harris was taken out of Newgate, and sent to the Tower by the King's express order. We shall enter no farther into the particulars of this affair, but content ourselves with saying, that shortly after the dissolution of the Oxford Parliament, when the court began to sail with a prosperous gale, without being controlled by the Parliament, Fitz-Harris was brought to his trial; that the Duchess of Portsmouth owned she had given him money, but merely out of charity; that Fitz-Harris continually insinuated, that what he did was by the order of his superiors, and that, after his death, his wife constantly affirmed that the libel was a court trick. In short, he was condemned and executed, whilst the public could not conceive for what reason an Irish papist had published a libel against the King, if it was not an artifice of the court. This affair began in February, and the last Parliament had taken cognizance of it, so that the Commons had ordered an impeachment against him, and when he was sent to the Tower, declared, that for any inferior court to proceed against him, or any other person lying under an impeachment of Parliament, is a high breach of the privilege of Parliament. He was nevertheless tried, condemned, and executed, to the great disappointment of the Whigs, who hoped by his means, to discover the artifices of the court. But the King and his party thought it for their advantage to be rid of a man, who might throw them into difficulties. He was not executed till June, after the dissolution of the Oxford Parliament.

The meeting of this Parliament was universally expected with the utmost impatience, and by the King, with great uneasiness. He repaired to Oxford seven or eight days before the opening, and as the suspicions and fears of the Whig party were then at the utmost height, it was thought, the King went so soon to Oxford, on purpose to take measures beforehand, for rendering himself master of the Parliament. Accordingly, the members manifestly showed their fears of some violence, by going thither attended with armed retinues. Those for the city of London in particular came with a numerous body of well-armed horse, having ribbands in their hats, with these words woven in them, No Popery! No Slavery! The Parliament meeting the 21st of March, the King, who had employed the most gracious expressions to all his Parliaments, particularly the two last, thought proper to address himself to the present in a more authoritative manner. He complained of the unwarrantable proceedings of the former House of Commons; and said that, as he would never use arbitrary government himself, neither would he ever suffer it in others. By calling, however, this Parliament so soon, he had sufficiently shewn that no past irregularities could inspire him with a prejudice against those assemblies. He now afforded them, he added, yet another opportunity of providing for the public safety; and to all the world he had given one evidence more, that on his part he had not neglected the duty incumbent on him.

After the Commons had spent three days in chusing their Speaker, and taking the usual oaths, they promptly fell into the old measures—the impeachment of Danby, the repeal of the persecuting statute of Elizabeth, the inquiry into the popish plot, and the bill of Exclusion. So violent were they on this last article, that no other expedient, however plausible, could so much as be hearkened to. Ernley, one of the King's ministers, proposed that the Duke should be banished, during life, five hundred miles from England, and that on the King's demise the next heir should be constituted Regent with regal power: yet even this expedient, which left the Duke only the bare title of King, could not, though seconded by Sir Thomas Littleton and Sir Thomas Mompesson, obtain the attention of the House. The past disappointments of the country party, and the opposition made by the court, had only rendered them more united, more haughty, and more determined. No method but their own, of excluding the Duke, could give them any satisfaction. The popular leaders had, all along, been very desirous of having an accusation against the Duke; and though Oates and Bedloe, in their first evidence, had not dared to go so far, both Dugdale and Dangerfield had afterwards been encouraged to supply so material a defect, by comprehending him in the conspiracy. The Commons therefore finding that Fitz-Harris was also willing to serve this purpose, were not ashamed to adopt his evidence, and resolved for that end to save him from the destruction with which he was at present threatened. The King had removed him from the city-prison, where he was exposed to be tampered with by the exclusionists; had sent him to the Tower, and had ordered him to be prosecuted by an indictment at common-law. In order to prevent his trial and exclusion, an impeachment was voted by the Commons against him, and sent up to the Lords. That they might show the greater contempt of the court, court, they voted, that the impeachment should be carried up by Secretary Jenkins; who was so provoked by the intended affront, that he at first refused obedience; though afterwards, being threatened with commitment, he was induced to comply. The Lords voted to remit the affair to the ordinary courts of justice, before whom, as the Attorney-General informed them, it was already determined to try Fitz-Harris. The Commons maintained, that the Peers were obliged to receive every impeachment from the Commons; and this indeed seems to have been the first instance of their refusal: they therefore voted that the Lords, in refusing their impeachment, had denied justice, and had violated the constitution of Parliament. They also declared, that whatever inferior court should proceed against Fitz-Harris, or any one that lay under impeachment, would be guilty of a high breach of privilege. Great heats were likely to ensue; and as the King saw no appearance of any better temper in the Commons, he gladly laid hold of the opportunity, afforded by a quarrel between the two Houses; and he proceeded to a dissolution of the Parliament. The secret was so well kept, that the Commons had no intimation of it, till the black rod came to their doors, and summoned them to attend the King at the House of Peers.

The King immediately took coach, and drove with all speed to Windsor, and the next morning to Whitehall, seeming extremely pleased that he had thus made his escape from the designs of the Commons. This Parliament, which sat but seven days, was the fifth and last of this reign.

From this time, the King, during the rest of his life, governed not only without a Parliament, but with an absolute power. When he saw himself out of the reach of the Parliament, he entirely threw away the mask of dissimulation, and shewed, that the Popish plot, the prosecution whereof he had lately recommended so earnestly to the Parliament, appeared to him but a mere chimera, or at least, he did not think it near so dangerous as he would have had it believed. The four Lords, prisoners in the Tower, whom he would have sacrificed to the Parliament, appeared innocent to him. But what was still more remarkable, even to the end of this reign, was, that the King grew as sanguinary, as he had hitherto appeared merciful, and that as soon as he had the power in his hands, he made his enemies feel the most terrible effects of his vengeance. In a word, he clearly discovered by his conduct, that he was entirely in the principles of despotic power, and had only dissembled his sentiments in his speeches to his Parliament, because he judged such dissimulation proper to conduct him to the end proposed to himself, from the first years of his reign.

Meanwhile, not to alarm the nation by a too hasty discovery of his intentions as to his future government, he contented himself at present with publishing a declaration, containing his reason for dissolving the two last Parliaments. He positively declared, that no irregularities in Parliaments should ever make him out of love with them: and therefore he was resolved to have frequent Parliaments, and both in and out of Parliament, to use his utmost endeavours to extirpate Popery.

Several pamphlets appeared, as well against the dissolution of the Parliament, as against the declaration. It was said, that though the King pretended, that he dissolved the Parliament on account of the votes passed the same day about Fitz-Harris, yet the Duchess of Mazarine published the news at St. James's many hours before it was done.

The declaration having been published and read in the churches by the King's order, addresses flowed from all parts, approving the dissolution of the Parliament, and in general, the King's whole conduct. Not content with thanking the King, these addresses were even filled with invectives against the late House of Commons. One of these addresses being presented at the King's Bench as a public libel, by the grand jury of Middlesex, the court took no notice of it.

The King was not satisfied with discouraging those who would have presented disagreeable addresses to him, but also silenced and imprisoned the news writers which were not of his party, while others had liberty to publish daily invectives against the Whigs, and the late Parliaments.

Shortly after the dissolution of the Parliament, the King made Charles Lenox Duke of Richmond, his son by the Duchess of Portsmouth, Knight of the Garter, at nine years of age. Laurence Hyde Esq. was created Viscount Hyde of Kennelworth; and Lord Chancellor Finch Earl of Nottingham.

Notwithstanding the vote of the Commons on the account of Fitz-Harris, he was indicted of high treason at the King's Bench bar, tried, condemned, and executed. It is pretended, that he confessed to the chaplain of the Tower, that there was a design laid by the Protestant party to seize the person of the King, and imprison him, till he had consented to what should be desired of him, and that he mentioned many particulars.

The same day that Fitz-Harris was executed, Oliver Plunket, the Popish titular primate of Ireland, suffered the same punishment for contriving, with the court of France, to raise an insurrection in Ireland.

The Earl of Shaftsbury was sent to the Tower the beginning of July. He was now called the Protestant Earl, in derision of his having appeared more zealous than any other Lord in support of the Protestant party. The same day, the King also sent to the Tower some persons of a much inferior rank, as Rouse, Hayns, White, and one Colledge, a joiner, of London, who had been very strenuous for the Whigs, while that party was supported by the Parliament. He was also called the Protestant joiner, for the name of Protestant was become the nick-name of those who had most opposed the King and the Papists. The adherents of the court, on the other hand, pretend, that the Whig party in London, perceiving the court began to be revenged upon their enemies, had found means, with the assistance of Cornish and Bethel, sheriffs of London, and zealous Whigs, to secure grand juries entirely at their devotion; so that, to defeat the efforts of the court, these juries were to return Ignoramus upon all bills brought against any of the party, and therefore obtained the name of Ignoramus.

However, the court began their revenge with Colledge the joiner, and for that purpose a bill of indictment of high treason against him was delivered to the grand jury of London, who, not finding it well grounded, threw it out with an Ignoramus. This caused an universal joy in London, and was looked upon as a sort of triumph. But the court was resolved to proceed against Colledge with the utmost severity. For this purpose, on pretence of certain words said to be spoken by Colledge at Oxford, he was ordered to be removed to that city. Colledge was accordingly carried to Oxford, and tried at the assizes, upon the evidence of Dugdale and Turberville, who had been the witnesses in the trial of the Lord Stafford. It is not possible to read the particulars of this trial, the partiality of the judges, and the depositions of the witnesses, without discovering a settled design for the destruction of this man, who was condemned and executed as a traitor. He died, protesting his innocence, and ignorance of any plot but the Popish.

The same day that Colledge was executed, Dr. Oates was by order of council turned out of Whitehall, with a command not to come within the verge of the council chamber.

The time for electing the sheriffs of London being come, Thomas Pilkington and Samuel Shute, both Whigs, were chosen in the room of Bethel and Cornish, which was very disagreeable to the court. But on Michaelmas day they had the satisfaction to see Sir John Moor, an addresser, chosen Lord Mayor.

At the sessions for London, Rouse, one of those sent to the Tower by the King, was indicted of high treason, and the grand jury found the bill Ignoramus.

It was the same with the Earl of Shaftsbury; the King passionately wished to be revenged of this Lord, who, for some time, had shewn him little regard. To this end, he granted a special commission of Oyer and Terminer to all the judges of the kingdom to sit, the 24th of November, with the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, at the Old Bailey, on the Earl's trial. Eight witnesses were heard against him, who deposed upon oath many things from his own mouth, which discovered pernicious designs against the King's person. But the greatest crime objected against him was, the copy of an association (found in his study) against the enemies of the King, of the Protestant religion, and of their country. But notwithstanding the hopes conceived by the court, of being freed from this enemy, the grand jury, consisting of one-and-twenty of the principal citizens of London, considering that the paper, containing the association was only a copy, and not written in the Earl of Shaftsbury's hand, and observing very great improbabilities in the depositions of the witnesses, found no sufficient ground for the bill, and returned it Ignoramus. Immediately the whole city testified their joy for the Earl's deliverance, by bonfires in all the streets, and other marks of satisfaction, and the witnesses against him were in great danger of being torn in pieces by the mob.*

Before we finish this year, it will be necessary to mention the transactions in Scotland, where the Duke of York, as the King's high commissioner, had opened the Parliament the 28th of July. This Parliament, very different from the two last held in England, took a quite contrary course, and passed several acts such as the King desired.

By the first, they acknowledged, that the crown of Scotland is by inherent right, by the nature of monarchy, by the fundamental and unalterable laws of the kingdom, transmitted and devolved by lineal succession, according to proximity of blood, and that no difference in religion, no law, no act of Parliament, can alter or divert the right of succession, and lineal descent of the crown to the nearest and lawful heirs. This act made it high treason, either by word or writing, to endeavour to suspend, or alter, the right of succession.

By the second act, "All former laws for the security of the Protestant religion presently professed in that realm, were ratified;" by which all the laws made by James I. Charles I. and Charles II. against Popery, were confirmed. To this act was annexed a test and oath to be taken by all officers in church and state. Archibald Campbel, Earl of Argyle, son of him beheaded at Edinburgh, was one of the refusers of this oath, unless he might take it with a reserve of his own explanation. But this the Duke of York would never allow him. At last, he was arrested, imprisoned, and brought to a solemn trial, not only for refusing the oath, but for having dissuaded others from taking it; and for this new kind of treason, was condemned to lose his head. It is pretended, the King would have pardoned him; but this can only be said by conjecture. However, he found means to escape out of the castle of Edinburgh, and withdrew into Holland.†

A. D. 1681-2.] The King finding his authority sufficiently established since the dissolution of the Oxford Parliament, resolved entirely to ruin his enemies the Whigs, and consequently the Presbyterians. To this end, he ordered, that the non-conformists should be rigorously prosecuted, which discovered his motive for conveying away in the House of Lords the bill to repeal the act of the 35th of Elizabeth, at the very time it was going to pass into a law. This order of the King occasioned a violent persecution against the dissenters. Since the dissolution of the last Parliament, all the magistrates, judges, justices of the peace, governors, and lord-lieutenants, had been changed, and the most violent tories put in their places. It may easily be imagined, with what joy and zeal these men executed the laws against the Presbyterians, which had been suspended for some years. The clergy particularly distinguished themselves by showing their attachment to the principles and maxims of the court. The pulpits resounded with the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance, which had been espoused by a few in the reign of Charles I. but was now universally preached. The clergy seemed to make it their business to surrender to the King, all the liberties and privileges of the subjects, and to leave them only an unlimited obedience.

The Duke of York returned from Scotland, the beginning of March, and was received by the King with all possible signs of affection. At the same time came a letter to the King from Scotland, subscribed by seven Bishops, full of the Duke of York's praises, and of the happiness enjoyed by the church of Scotland, under his administration.

A. D. 1682.] After two months' stay in England, the Duke returned to Scotland to bring his family from thence. He went by sea, but by an unexpected accident, the ship, though the weather was fair, struck upon the sand called the Lemon and Oar, and in a little time had above seven feet water in the hold. This obliged him to put off in his pinnace, with as many persons as it would hold, and to save himself on board the Mary yacht. It is pretended, he himself named the persons whom he would have in the boat with him, and that some priests and jesuits were preferred to several persons of quality, who were unfortunately drowned, with a hundred and thirty seamen, the ship sinking soon after the Duke put off.‡ The Duke made but a short stay in Scotland. He departed within a few days for England, where he continued, the rest of this reign, with great influence over the actions and counsels of the King his brother. To him is generally ascribed the rigour with which the King treated his enemies the remaining part of his reign. It is said, the King being one day importuned by the Duke to undertake things which he thought very dangerous, told him, "Brother, I am resolved never to travel again; you may do so, if you please."

Though, supported by the court and the magistrates, the tory party had the advantage, the Whigs were not discouraged, in the expectation of causing some turn, by informing the people in pamphlets of their danger from the court. These pamphlets were numberless, and new ones daily appeared, to attack or defend. That which made the greatest noise was, "The Life of Julian the Apostate," in which a parallel was drawn between that Prince and the Duke of York. The necessity of the exclusion was shown, and passive obedience exploded as a Mahometan doctrine. This book did but exasperate the patrons of passive obedience. They took occasion from thence to carry the doctrine so high, that when, in the reign of James II. restrictions became necessary, they knew not how to make them, and many persisted in supporting this doctrine, rather than own they had been in the wrong to carry it to such a height.

Though the Whigs had a great disadvantage in the kingdom, they still preserved their superiority in London, where almost all the magistrates were of their party; but they were not suffered long to enjoy them. Moor, the Lord Mayor, who had been an Abhorrer,

* A medal was also struck upon this occasion, having on one side the Earl's effigies; and on the reverse, the sun behind a cloud, darting his beams on the city of London. It was upon this occasion that Dryden wrote his poem called The Medal.

† When the test was in debate, Argyle spoke zealously against the clause, whereby all the royal family were excepted out of it. He said, the only danger we could apprehend as to Popery was, if the royal family should happen to be perverted: therefore he thought it was better to have no act at all than such a clause in it. For this reason, when he came to explain himself concerning the taking the test in his own sense, his words were construed as a defaming and a spreading of lies of the proceedings of Parliament, which was capital. Accordingly he was tried and condemned. No sentence, says Burnet, in our age, was more universally cried out upon than this. All spoke of it, and the Duke who drove it on, with horror. All that was said to lessen the horror was, that Lauderdale had restored the family with such an extended jurisdiction, that he was really the master of all the Highlands, and it was necessary to lessen his influence. This, as the Duke wrote to the King, was all he intended by it.

‡ Burnet says, the Duke got into a boat, and took care of his dogs, and some unknown persons, who were taken, from that earnest care of his, to be his priests. The long boat went off with very few in her, though she might have carried off above eighty more than she did. The following persons perished with the rest, the Earl of Roxborough, the Lord O'bryan, the Laird of Hopton, Sir Joseph Douglass, and Lieutenant Hyde, the Duke's brother-in-law.

and was in the interests of the court, objected against the election of the sheriffs, and afterwards of the Lord Mayor, who was to succeed him; and being supported by the privy council, prevailed partly by force, and partly by consent, to have new sheriffs, and a new mayor elected of the King's party. This was a triumph for the court, and the Earl of Shaftsbury was so sensible of it, that seeing himself likely to be deprived of the protection of the city of London, he avoided the impending storm, by a retreat into Holland. It was remarked, that he was forced to shelter himself under the protection of a republic, to which, when he was chancellor, and one of the Cabal, he had applied that saying of Cato, Delenda est Carthago.——He died six weeks after his arrival in Holland.

The court having got a Lord Mayor and Sheriffs at their devotion, improved the advantage, and relying on the compliance of the magistrates, resolved to annul the charter of London, and afterwards those of all the other corporations in the kingdom.

In the meantime, the Lord Mayor and the Sheriffs of London, were very active against the Presbyterians, and executed the laws with great severity. Moreover, to recommend themselves the more to the court, they prevented the burning of the Pope, as had been customary on the 17th of November.

The Duke of York, embracing so favourable a juncture, brought his action against the late sheriff Pilkington, for these words, spoken by the defendant, "The Duke of York has fired the city, and is now come to cut our throats." The jury found for the Duke, and gave him one hundred thousand pounds damages.*

A. D. 1683.] The King, intending to be revenged on the old magistracy of London, which had opposed him for some years, issued out a commission for trial of the authors of the disorder at the election of sheriffs the last year. This disorder, in the commission, was called a "Riotous and unlawful assembly," and aggravated as much as a thing of such little moment could admit of. Fourteen aldermen and substantial citizens, the leaders of the Whigs, were all tried and condemned in great fines.

But the King stopped not here, though the new magistrates and common council took care to give him marks of their respect and zeal, by repealing several acts of the court of common council, made during the late troubles. They likewise replaced, in its niche, in the Royal Exchange, the statue of Charles I. which had been taken down after his death. Nevertheless, this did not prevent a Quo Warranto from being brought by the King against the city, that is, an order to show by what warrant they pretended to be a corporation, and enjoy the privileges mentioned in the writ.

The King alledged two violations of the charter by the corporation of London. The first was the illegal exaction of tolls in the market, and particularly the raising money to rebuild Cheapside conduit. The second was the framing and printing a scandalous petition, wherein they charged the King with obstructing the justice of the nation, by proroguing the last Westminster Parliament. This affair was argued solemnly on both sides, and at last the judges of the King's Bench declared, that the liberties and privileges of the city of London were forfeited, and might be seized into the King's hands.

After sentence was pronounced, the city applied in an humble manner to the King; and he agreed to restore their charter, but in return they were obliged to submit to the following regulations—That no mayor, sheriff, recorder, common-serjeant, town clerk, or coroner, should be admitted to the exercise of his office without his Majesty's approbation: that if the King disapprove twice of the mayor or sheriffs elected, he may by commission appoint these magistrates: that the mayor and court of aldermen may, with his Majesty's leave, displace any magistrate: and that no alderman, in case of a vacancy, shall be elected without consent of the court of aldermen, who if they disapprove twice of the choice may fill the vacancy. All the corporations in England, having the example of London before their eyes, saw how vain it would prove to contend with the court, and were, most of them, successively induced to surrender their charters into the King's hands. Considerable sums were exacted for restoring the charters, and all offices of power and profit were left at the disposal of the crown.

We are at last come to the pretended Protestant plot, that is to say, formed by the Protestants against the King and the Duke. This is generally known by the name of the Rye House Plot, from a house so called, in the road to Newmarket,† where, it is pretended, the conspirators had projected to kill the King and Duke. As the former conspiracy, called the Popish plot, passed for an invention, with the adherents of the court, so this had the same fate among those who were of the contrary party.

This year, on the 12th of June, Josiah Keeling discovered the conspiracy, real or pretended, to the Lord Dartmouth, and Secretary Jenkins, before whom he made open confession of the whole matter, and subscribed his depositions. But afterwards, considering that his single intelligence was not sufficient, he prevailed upon Goodenough, that his brother John Keeling might be admitted into the next meeting of the conspirators. This was done, and thereupon both the brothers gave in their joint testimony upon oath on the 14th of June.

According to the two Keelings' deposition, the plot consisted of three articles.

I. The conspirators designed to secure the King's guards (but how this was to be executed does not appear;) then to block up or besiege Whitehall, and seize the persons of the King and Duke of York.

II. To assassinate the King and the Duke in a hollow way near the Rye House, in their return from Newmarket.

III. To cause insurrections in London, and other parts of the kingdom. But Keeling deposed only against persons of no note.

Upon this deposition, the King published a proclamation for apprehending Colonel John Rumsey, Richard Rumbold, maltster,‡ Richard Nelthorpe, Esq. Edward Wade, Gent. Richard Goodenough, Gent. Captain Walcot, William Thompson, James Burton, and William Hone; for any of which a hundred pounds was offered to the discoverer. Upon this proclamation, Colonel Rumsey surrendered himself the next day; and being examined by Secretary Jenkins, he confessed all he knew; which confession was next day confirmed by two others, Mr. West, and Mr. Sheppard: so that on the 28th of June, there came out a second proclamation, for apprehending James Duke of Monmouth, Ford, Lord Grey, Sir Thomas Armstrong, knight, and Robert Ferguson. It is pretended, that when the warrants were delivered to Legat the messenger, to seize Ferguson with the rest of the offenders, Secretary Jenkins gave Legat a strict command, not to take him, but to shun him wherever he met him. Shortly after, the Lord Howard of Escrick also surrendered himself, and upon his information, warrants for high treason were issued out against the Earl of Essex, the Lord Russel, and others, who were taken up accordingly.

This discovery brought addresses from all parts to congratulate the King. The ambassadors of foreign Princes paid the same compliment; and the King of France offered five hundred pistoles for the apprehension of Monmouth, Grey, Armstrong, or Ferguson.

The prisoners were not suffered long to languish.

* This year died, Prince Rupert, Count Palatine of the Rhine, so often mentioned in the foregoing reign, sixty-three years of age; John Maitland, Duke of Lauderdale; Heneage Finch, Earl of Nottingham and Lord High Chancellor; and Anthony Ashley Cooper, Earl of Shaftsbury.

† Rye House lies within two miles of Hoddesdon in Hertfordshire, and was then inhabited by Richard Rumbold.

‡ Rumsey and Rumbold had served in Cromwell's army. Rumsey going afterwards into Portugal, with the forces that served there under the brave Schomberg, behaved courageously; and, by Schomberg's recommendation, got a place here in England.

Walcot was first brought to his trial the 12th of July. This man, who was once noted for bravery, had been so far overcome by the love of life, that he had written to Secretary Jenkins, and had offered, upon promise of pardon, to turn evidence: but, no sooner had he taken this mean step, than he felt more generous sentiments arise in him; and he endeavoured though in vain, to conceal himself. The witnesses against him were Rumsey, West, Sheppard, together with Bourne, a brewer. His own letter to the secretary was produced, and rendered the testimony of the witnesses unquestionable. Home and Rouse were also condemned. These two men, as well as Walcot, acknowledged, at their execution, the justness of the sentence; and from their trial and confession it is sufficiently apparent, that the plan of an insurrection had been regularly formed; and that even the assassination had been often talked of, and not without the approbation of many of the conspirators.

We shall not relate the trials of the other prisoners of little note, but confine ourselves to the Lord Russel's, son to the Earl of Bedford. This Lord, being one of those against whom the court was most incensed, because he had proposed the Exclusion bill in the House of Commons, and carried it up to the Lords, was tried at the Old Bailey, before eight judges. He was very urgent for one day longer for his trial, because, as he said, he had witnesses that might come before night, but he was over-ruled. He then urged to have his trial deferred to the afternoon, but with no better success. The witnesses produced against the noble prisoner, were Rumsey, Sheppard, and Lord Howard. Rumsey swore, that he had himself been introduced to the Cabal at Sheppard's, where Russel was present; and had delivered them a message from Shaftsbury, urging them to hasten the intended insurrection: but had received for answer, that it was found necessary to delay the design, and that Shaftsbury must therefore for some time rest contented. This answer, he said, was delivered by Ferguson; but was assented to by the prisoner. He added, that some discourse had been entered into about taking a survey of the guards; and he thought that Monmouth, Grey, and Armstrong, undertook to view them. Sheppard deposed, that his house had before been bespoken by Ferguson for the secret meeting of the conspirators, and that he had been careful to keep all his servants from approaching them, and had served them himself. Their discourse, he said, ran chiefly upon the means of surprising the guards, and it was agreed, that Monmouth and his two friends should take a survey of them. The report, which they brought next meeting, was, that the guards were remiss, and that the design was practicable: but he did not affirm that any resolution was taken of executing it. The prisoner, he thought, was present at both those meetings; but he was sure that at least he was present at one of them. A declaration, he added, had been read by Ferguson in Russel's presence: the reasons of the intended insurrection were there fully set forth, and all the public grievances loudly displayed. Lord Howard had been one of the Cabal of six, established after Shaftsbury's flight; and two meetings had been held by the conspirators, one at Hampden's, another at Russel's. Howard deposed, that at the first meeting it was agreed to begin the insurrection in the country before the city: the places were fixed, the proper quantity and kind of arms agreed on, and the whole plan of operations concerted: that at the second meeting, the question chiefly turned upon their correspondence with Argyle and the discontented Scots, and that the principal management of that affair was entrusted to Sidney, who had sent one Aaron Smith into Scotland with proper instructions: he added, that in these deliberations no question was put, or votes collected; but there was no contradiction; and, as he took it, all of them, and the prisoner among the rest, gave their consent.

Lord Russel made answer, "That he could not but think himself extremely unfortunate, to stand charged with so high a crime, and that intermixed with the treasons, horrid practices, and speeches of other people, while the King's council took all advantages, and heightened things against him. That he was no lawyer, a very unready speaker, and altogether a stranger to things of this nature; that he was sensible he was not so provided to make his defence, as otherwise he should do; but he thought the gentlemen of the jury were men of conscience, that valued innocent blood, and hoped they would consider the witnesses, that they swore to save their own lives. That the two times they met, was upon no formed design, only to talk of news and things in general: that the Lord Howard having a voluble tongue, they delighted to hear him discourse: that as to Colonel Rumsey, he was notoriously known to have been highly obliged to the King and the Duke; and it was strange he should be capable of such a design as to murder the King. That the time was elapsed by the 13th of the King, which limits prosecution to six months. Neither was the design of levying war, treason, unless it appeared by some overt act." And asking upon what statute he was indicted, he was told, "The statute of the 25th of Edward III." Upon which he insisted upon a matter of law, and particularly, "That the business at Mr. Sheppard's house was sworn to only by one witness." To which he was answered, "That if there were one witness of one act of treason, another of a second, and another of a third, that manifested the same treason, it was sufficient."

For a further defence of his Lordship, there appeared for him the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Anglesey, Mr. Edward Howard, the Lord Cavendish, the Lord Clifford, Doctor Tillotson, Doctor Burnet, Doctor Cox, Doctor Fitz-Williams, Mr. Luton Gore, and Mr. Spencer. Some of these testified, that the Lord Howard, before he was taken, declared, "He believed the Lord Russel innocent, and knew nothing against him." Others spoke to his Lordship's private character, and declared his great worth and probity, his virtuous and sober life, and consequently the improbability of his being thus engaged. But this was turned against him by the King's counsel, who said, there could not be any more dangerous enemies to a state, than such as come sober to endeavour its destruction.

In conclusion, the jury brought him in guilty of high treason. This sentence was considered by all, who had any sense of shame left, as the most crying injustice, ever known in England. The Lord Howard so lost his reputation, for being accessary to this injustice, that he was looked on with horror by honest men, who avoided his company, as ashamed or afraid to be seen with him. Some say, he had made his peace with the King a little before, by the mediation of the Duchess of Portsmouth, and by an engagement to serve as a witness against the pretended conspirators.

But that which was believed to have very much influenced the jury against the Lord Russel, was, that in the very time of his trial, the Earl of Essex, prisoner in the Tower, was found dead in his chamber, with his throat cut from ear to ear with a razor. The news was immediately brought to the Old Bailey, and communicated to the judges and the King's counsel, who from thence took occasion to insinuate to the jury the reality of the plot, since the Earl of Essex rather chose to lay violent hands on himself, than stand a trial.*

Besides the Lord Russel condemned for this plot, two others

* Though the coroner's inquest, (says Rapin) after an examination of the dead body, found the Earl Felo de se, this was not capable to remove the suspicion entertained by most people, that this fact was committed by the order of the King and Duke, who were in the Tower that very morning, where they had not been for twelve years before. It was besides urged, that it was not possible for a man to cut his own throat from ear to ear. Several other circumstances were added, of which it is not easy to discover the truth. It is pretended, that in the blood sprinkled on the floor of the room, were discovered the marks of a strange foot; and that after the deed was done, the razor was thrown out of the window, and picked up by a little girl. That, before the coroner came to inspect the body, care was taken to strip and leave it naked, and to wash the room. That the coroner demanding to see the clothes, was answered, it was his business to examine the body, and not the clothes. What has been most plausibly urged, in vindication of the King and Duke from this horrid others also met with the same fate, namely, Hone a joiner, and John Rouse. This last had been indicted for treasonable words, and escaped by an Ignoramus jury: but he was re-taken, and tried for the same crime, which did not properly belong to this plot, but to his having talked of the King in treasonable terms. Hone and Ronse were both condemned as traitors, and executed with Walcot, the 20th of July. They confessed, they had heard of a plot in general, but descended not to particulars. At least, it did not appear, that the Lord Russel had any correspondence with them.

The next day, the Lord Russel was also executed.* He was so universally esteemed, that it could not be thought, the King would refuse his pardon, which was begged by so many powerful relations. It is even said, the Earl of Bedford, his father, offered a hundred thousand pounds for his life, but his offer was rejected. The King would not so much as grant a reprieve of six weeks to his lady, though daughter of the Earl of Southampton, but made her this answer, "Shall I grant that man six weeks, who, if it had been in his power, would not have granted me six hours?" Every one however was persuaded, that if there was a design to kill the King, the Lord Russel was not concerned in it. Besides that he denied it with his last breath, he was not condemned for that crime, and the witnesses which deposed against him said nothing like it. And yet, the King, to have an excuse for refusing a short delay, supposed that this crime was fully proved. The Lord Russel had been one of the warmest opposers of the Duke of York, had joined the Earls of Shaftsbury and Essex, and carried up the Exclusion bill to the House of Lords. These were crimes not to be forgiven by the King and his brother. He died with great resolution, protesting his innocence, and ignorance of any design against the King's person, or of any contrivance to alter the government. As it was expected that he would be interrupted, he spoke but little on the scaffold, leaving in the hands of the sheriff a paper, in which he protested his innocence, and said, "That he died a true and sincere Protestant, and in the communion of the church of England, though he could never yet comply with, or rise up to all the heights of some people.†"

For a conclusion to this tragedy, it remains only to speak of the condemnation and execution of Colonel Algernon Sidney, who was accused of the plot, and of the design to kill the King. He was brother to the Earl of Leicester, and, in the late troubles, had been deeply engaged in the republican party. At the restoration he thought not fit to accept personally of the indemnity, whether in distrust of the King, or for some other reason. At last, in 1677, he obtained a particular pardon of the King, and returned to England, where he joined the country party, at which the King was extremely offended.

Four witnesses were produced against him, Rumsey, West, Keeling, and the Lord Howard of Escrick. The three first contented themselves with giving a particular account of the plot, but said nothing directly against the prisoner. He complained of it as a great hardship, as prepossessing the jury. The Lord Howard deposed, as before at the trial of the Lord Russel, that Colonel Sidney was of the council of six, and had sent Aaron Smith into Scotland, to engage the Scots in a rebellion.

His defence was, first, the great improbability of erecting a council of six; and that persons so little knowing one another, should presently fall into so great and intimate a friendship. As to the Duke of Monmouth, he said, he never spoke with him above three times in his life; and one time was, when Lord Howard brought him to his house and cozened them both; for he told the Duke, that Colonel Sidney had invited him, and he told the Colonel, that the Duke invited himself, and neither of them was true. He enlarged upon the ill reputation of the Lord Howard, and his varying his evidence with respect to the Lord Russel's, and the present trial. He alledged the Lord Howard's indigence, and his owing him money, which debt might probably be cancelled by his conviction. He proved, by the testimonies of the Earls of Clare and Anglesey, of Mr. Philip, and Mr. Edward Howard, Dr. Burnet, Mr. Ducas, and Mr. Blake, that the Lord Howard had confessed, "That he could not get his pardon until he had done some other jobs, till he was past the drudgery of swearing."

During this whole trial, the judges themselves undertook to answer the reasons of the accused, without leaving any thing for the King's counsel to do. But they answered not the objection drawn from the confession of Lord Howard, nor did he himself make any reply. So that the design of the court to furnish the jury with reasons to condemn the prisoner, manifestly appeared.

But what was most urged against him, was a manuscript found amongst his papers. It was an answer to a book, composed by Sir Robert Filmer, to prove, that, by the laws of God and nature, Kings, and particularly those of England, were invested with absolute and unlimited power. Sidney, in his answer to this book, had asserted a quite contrary doctrine, and carried his republican principles to a very great height.

He said, first, that the manuscript was not written by him, and he saw no reason for ascribing it to him. That, though he was the author, it might be wrote many years ago, in answer to Filmer's book, with no intention of publishing it, but disputandi gratia, only for private diversion, and the exercise of his pen. In fine, he insisted very much upon the necessity of two witnesses to the same fact. To the manuscript it was answered, that scribere est agere, and that there was sufficient in it to prove the malice of his heart, and his treasonable designs. However, he was brought in guilty by the jury. It is pretended, this was the first time a man was accused of treason, and condemned to die, for writing any thing without publishing it.

He was beheaded the 7th of December, without discovering horrid action, is, that persons of credit have testified their frequent hearing the Earl of Essex declare, that self murder was no sin. It is further added, that his Countess, and Sir Henry Capel his brother, owned the justice of the coroner's verdict. But had they believed the contrary, this was no proper time to discover their suspicions. I am very certain, the last Earl of Essex, his son, was of another opinion, and have heard him say, he believed his father was murdered, and that a French footman, who then served his father, was strongly suspected, and disappeared immediately after the fact. Be this as it will, the general opinion then was, that this unfortunate nobleman fell a sacrifice to the revenge of the King and the Duke. This seems the less strange, as among those who declared most openly for their country, against the King and Duke, the Earl of Essex was not the only person who felt the effects of their resentment. The King however publicly declared in print, that he was deeply afflicted for the Earl of Essex's death, because he was thereby deprived of an opportunity to exercise his clemency, and testify, how highly he valued the memory of the Lord Capel. But, instead of convincing the public by this external demonstration, it was by many imagined, that the King mentioned the Lord Capel, only to insinuate, how much the Earl his son had deviated from his steps.

* He was beheaded on a scaffold erected in Lincolns-Inn-Fields. There were ten companies of the King's guards, and a troop of horse, drawn up, to prevent any disturbances that might arise at the sight of so moving and melancholy a spectacle.—In the Duke of Monmouth's [illegible] journal, it is said, that the King told him, "He inclined to have saved the Lord Russel, but was forced to consent to his death, otherwise he must have broke with his brother, the Duke of York."

† Russel's consort, finding all her applications for mercy fruitless, collected courage, and not only fortified herself against the fatal blow, but endeavoured by her example to strengthen the resolution of her unfortunate Lord. With a tender and decent composure they took leave of each other on the day of execution. "The bitterness of death is now past," said he, when he turned from her. Lord Cavendish had lived in the closest intimacy with Russel, and deserted not his friend in the present calamity. He offered to manage his escape, by changing clothes with him, and remaining at all hazards in his place. Russel refused to save his own life, by an expedient which might expose his life to so many hardships. When the Duke of Monmouth by message offered to surrender himself, if Russel thought that this measure would anywise contribute to his safety—"It will be no advantage to me," he said, "to have my friends die with me." Some of his expressions discover, not only composure, but good humour in this melancholy extremity. The day before his execution he was seized with a bleeding at the nose. "I shall not now let blood to divert this distemper," said he to Doctor Burnet who attended him, "that will be done to-morrow." A little before the sheriffs conducted him to the scaffold, he wound up his watch,—"Now I have done," said he, "with time, and henceforth must think solely of eternity."

covering the least weakness. Instead of a speech on the scaffold, he delivered a writing to the sheriff, in which he complained bitterly of the injustice done him.

While these conspirators were vigorously prosecuted, the university of Oxford distinguished themselves in a particular manner, amongst the advocates for the court, by a condemnation in form of twenty-seven propositions, collected out of several modern authors, concerning the regal power. This decree was presented to the King with great solemnity, and very graciously received.

The marriage of the Princess Anne, second daughter of the Duke of York, with Prince George, brother to the King of Denmark, celebrated the 28th of July, gave some, but no long interruption to the prosecutions of the conspirators.

The King had published a proclamation for apprehending all the conspirators against his life, among whom was his natural son, the Duke of Monmouth. The Duke had hitherto kept himself concealed. But at last, weary of his uneasy situation, he wrote a submissive letter to the King his father, wherein, after positively denying his ever having any design against his life, he owned, that many people had made him believe his own was in danger, and thereby caused him to commit things contrary to his duty to the King and the Duke of York, and asked both their pardons with great earnestness and submission. He added, that if his Majesty would give him his pardon, he would deliver himself into the hands of the Duke, that he might bring him to him.

The King could not dissemble his satisfaction at the receipt of this letter, for he tenderly loved the Duke of Monmouth. Nevertheless, with his own hand he wrote the following answer: "If the Duke of Monmouth desires to make himself capable of my mercy, he must render himself to the secretary, and resolve to tell me all he knows, resigning himself entirely to my pleasure."

This drew a second letter from the Duke, more submissive than the former, in which he confessed his offence against the King and the Duke, but in general terms, and without mention of particulars. But in assuring the King of an unreserved submission to his pleasure, he entreated him, that he would not expose him to the ignominy of a trial, nor send him to the Tower, nor force him to be a witness against any person.

The King, satisfied with this letter, readily admitted his beloved son to ask forgiveness. He even endeavoured to mediate between his son and brother; and having promised Monmouth, that his testimony should never be employed against any of his friends, he engaged him to give a full account of the plot. But, in order to put the country party to silence, he called next day an extraordinary council, and informed them, that Monmouth had shewn great penitence for the share which he had had in the late conspiracy, and had expressed his resolutions never more to engage in such criminal enterprises. He went so far as to give orders, that a paragraph to the like purpose should be inserted in the Gazette. Monmouth kept silence till he had obtained his pardon in form: but finding that, by taking this step, he was entirely disgraced with his party, and that even, though he should not be produced in court as an evidence, his testimony, being so publicly known, might have weight with juries on any future trial, he resolved at all hazards to retrieve his honour. His emissaries, therefore, received orders to deny that he had ever made any such confession as that which was imputed to him; and the party exclaimed, that the whole was an imposture of the court. The King, provoked at this conduct, banished Monmouth his presence, and afterwards ordered him to depart the kingdom.

The winter this year was very remarkable for a violent frost, which began about the beginning of December, and lasted till the 5th of February. The Thames was so frozen, that there was another city, as it were, on the ice, by the great number of booths erected between the Temple and Southwark, in which place was held a fair, for above a fortnight, of all sorts of trades. An ox was likewise roasted whole, bulls baited, &c.

In September or October this year, the King commissioned the Lord Dartmouth to go, with about twenty sail of ships, and utterly demolish the town, castle, and mole of Tangier. The mole had cost the King vast sums, but for want of money or for some other cause was left unfinished. Lord Dartmouth had also orders to choak up the haven. Six months were spent in executing this commission.* The King was thereby freed from a considerable annual expence for the preservation of this place, and moreover, the garrison, mostly consisting of Popish soldiers and officers, served to augment the King's forces at home.

The year 1684 was almost wholly spent in establishing the King's acquired absolute power. This was done chiefly by three expedients: the augmentation of the forces by the garrison of Tangier; the rigorous punishment of those who were not only accused of the Protestant plot, but had during the quarrels between the King and the late Parliaments, taken the liberty to speak of the King and Duke of York, with too much passion and heat; and the persuading indirectly all the corporations in the kingdom to surrender their charters to the King.

To facilitate the condemnation of those whose prosecutions were resolved, the King, in December last, had made Sir George Jefferies Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench. He was a man fit for the purposes of the court, without honour or conscience, impudent to the last degree, and ever ready to betray his duty and the interests of justice and the kingdom, to recommend himself to those who were in power. These qualities advanced him at last to the Chancellorship of England. The King had also made other alterations among the judges, so that he was in a manner assured of the compliance of all the courts of justice.

The Earl of Danby had been sent to the Tower by the House of Lords, upon an impeachment from the Commons. He had often demanded to be discharged

* The constant state of the warfare which existed between the garrison and the Moors, and the great force of the latter, rendered this service highly disagreeable and difficult. The known prudence as well as bravery of this noble Lord, pointed him out as the properest person to be employed in so dangerous and, indeed, delicate a command. He was accordingly, on the 2d of August, 1683, appointed admiral and commander-in-chief of the fleet sent on this expedition; and, having hoisted his flag on board the Grafton, sailed soon afterwards. It required every varied talent a commander could possibly possess to enable him to execute, with credit and propriety, this arduous task; a task rendered highly irksome, because the complete execution of it would confer only a negative kind of honour, which the failure of it in the most trivial point was sure to rouse reproach and entail disgrace. The warlike temper of the Moors; the natural hatred they bore the English, as strangers, whom they considered as detaining from them a part of their possessions; the ease with which an immense army could be brought under the very walls of the city; and, above all, the cruel and vindictive spirit which the Moorish nation invariably shows towards those whom it esteems and treats as enemies, all contributed to render Lord Dartmouth's situation truly irksome. His care, his prudence, his rigid attention to the duties of his high and complicated office, were such as overcame every obstacle. When we reflect, even at this distant period, on the difficulty that must attend in executing, with security and success, the destruction of those military defences which enabled a handful of troops to resist the reiterated attacks of such an host of Moors, which the removal, not only of the inhabitants but all their effects, was to be attended to and conducted at the same instant; when we recollect that the commander of those brave and chosen few, after they had demolished their principal protection, was to provide for their security and retreat in the face of a numerous, exasperated, and merciless army; we may fairly class this transaction, which has hitherto passed almost unnoticed, as a common occurrence of civil command, as equal, in point of intrinsic merit, with the most brilliant of those warlike atchievments which all ages and ranks of people have been accustomed to gaze on with wonder and delight. King Charles, whose gratitude, more particularly when pecuniary rewards were in question, was not of the most munificent nature, relaxed on this occasion from his parsimony, and was, for once, content his pleasures should yield to the merit of this noble Lord. He bestowed on him a grant of 10,000*l.* in money, and several privileges and charters as honourable, perhaps, if not as valuable. The death of Charles took place soon afterwards: and James, who is admitted, even by his bitterst enemies, to have been the constant friend and patron of merit, granted him, soon after his accession, the additional office of Constable of the Tower, besides continuing him in those employments he had held under his predecessor.

upon bail; but the judges had always refused his request, declaring that it was not in their power to admit to bail a Peer of the realm imprisoned by Parliament. But the judges now believed it lawful to release the Earl upon bail, which was accordingly taken, the Earl being bound in a recognizance of ten thousand pounds.

The release of the Earl of Danby was a precedent for the liberty of the other Popish Lords, prisoners in the Tower.

But the persons accused of the last conspiracy, and those who had spoken disrespectfully of the King and the Duke, met not with so much humanity. Among the great number prosecuted for these two offences, we shall only relate the trials of three or four.

Mr. Hampden was indicted as a conspirator, the 6th of February; but, as Howard was the sole evidence against him, and as his evidence against him was not supported by any material circumstance, he was only convicted of a misdemeanor, and the court was satisfied with fining him forty thousand pounds, and obliging him to find sureties for his good behaviour during life. This was thought to be a very strange and severe sentence. But the King assured the public, in a declaration, "That if he had not granted the Duke of Monmouth's request, 'That he would not make him a witness,' neither Mr. Hampden, nor scarce any one man of those that were freed upon bail, had escaped death."

A. D. 1684.] John Dutton Colt Esq. a member of the three last Parliaments, being accused of speaking these words, "The Duke of York is a Papist, and before any such Papist dog shall be successor to the crown of England, I will be hanged at my own door." These and other injurious words being proved against him, the jury brought in their verdict for the Duke of York, and gave him for damages a hundred thousand pounds.

The Duke of York also brought his action of Scandalum Magnatum against Titus Oates, for directly calling him traitor. For this offence the court gave the Duke of York a hundred thousand pounds damages. Shortly after, he was indicted for perjury, in relation to Father Ireland's being in London at the time Oates swore to, at his trial. Not long after another indictment of perjury was preferred against him, in relation to his being present at the supposed consult of the jesuits at the White Horse tavern in 1678. But these indictments not being tried this reign, Oates continued in prison.

These three and some others,* escaped with life, but they were condemned to perpetual imprisonment as unable to pay their exorbitant fines. Two others, who were out of the kingdom, did not come off so easy. James Holloway having seen his name in the Gazette amongst the conspirators, who were to be apprehended by the King's proclamation, fled to the West Indies. Upon his flight, he had suffered an outlawry for high-treason, and this year the court hearing he was in the West Indies, caused him to be apprehended and brought to London, where he was executed upon the attainder of outlawry for treason.

The same thing happened to Sir Thomas Armstrong, who had been considered as one of the principal authors of the last plot, and named in the King's proclamation with a reward of five hundred pounds. He had made his escape into Holland, and was outlawed as well as Holloway. The court hearing he was at Leyden, obtained an order from the States to apprehend him, and accordingly before he had notice, he was apprehended and brought to Rotterdam, and from thence to London. When he appeared at the King's Bench bar, he alledged that he was beyond sea at the time of the outlawry, and begged that he might be tried. But his request was absolutely rejected, and the rather, as the attorney-general told the court, from the King, that Armstrong was one of the persons who were to assassinate his Majesty on his return from Newmarket, which the prisoner positively denied. He was executed the 20th of June, and his head and quarters set up in several parts of the city. Only one was reserved to be sent down to Stafford, for which town he had been a burgess in Parliament.

The King this year dissolved the commission, granted in 1681, for the disposal of all ecclesiastical preferments. As the establishing this commission was in order to persuade his subjects, that he had the interest of the Protestant religion at heart, he could not avoid appointing such commissioners as were thought to have the same sentiments. But finding himself at length in the situation he had wished for, this commission was too great a restraint, and therefore he revoked it to fill the vacant benefices agreeably to his own inclinations.

Most historians ascribe all the rigours exercised this year, and all the measures taken by the King for the advancement of his absolute power, to the counsels of the Duke his brother. That Prince had gained so great an ascendant over the King, that he held him in a kind of subjection, and led him into measures productive of others, and so carried him farther than the King desired. Besides that the King was naturally indolent, and loved his ease too much to engage in any affairs capable of disturbing his repose, he knew the genius and temper of the English, much better than the Duke of York, and was sensible of the great difficulty to preserve long a power acquired in so extraordinary a manner. On the other hand, after so many proceedings to secure this power, he knew not how to retreat, and could not alter his conduct, without breaking entirely with the Duke, which must have extremely embarrassed him.

Almost the whole month of January, of the new year, 1685, was spent either in prosecuting delinquents against the King and the Duke, or in receiving the charters of the corporations, not yet surrendered, or in granting new ones on such conditions as the court thought proper. It may well be imagined, that these conditions were not prejudicial to the power acquired by the King. All complaints were suppressed, and the whole kingdom entirely subdued, the city of London not excepted, which had always opposed absolute power.

The King, it is pretended, had formed a project for an extraordinary change in the government: that he designed to recal the Duke of Monmouth, to send the Duke of York beyond sea, and call a free Parliament. This seems to have been founded on some passages in the Duke of Monmouth's pocket book, seized with his person in the following reign. We are further told, that the King had intimated, that if he lived but a month longer, he would find a way to make himself easy for the rest of his life.† But he lived not to execute this design. He died the 6th of February, at fifty-four years of age, and twenty-five since his restoration.‡

* Laurence Braddon and Huge Speke were tried for a misdemeanour in suborning witnesses to prove the Earl of Essex was murdered by his keepers, for which the first was fined two thousand pounds and the latter one thousand pounds. Sir Samuel Barnardiston was fined ten thousand pounds for writing some letters about the plot. And Samuel Johnson five hundred marks, for writing Julian the Apostate.

† Of this new scheme Burnet gives this account. There was at this time a new scheme formed, that would probably have for ever broken the King and the Duke.——It was laid at the Lady Portsmouth's. Barillon, Lord Sunderland, and Lord Godolphin were in it. The Duke of Monmouth came over secretly. And though he did not see the King, he went back very well pleased with his journey. ——The design was to begin with the sending the Duke of York to Scotland.——The King spoke to the Duke concerning his going to Scotland: and he answered there was no occasion for it. Upon which the King replied, that either the Duke must go, or that he himself would go thither.——The King was observed to be colder and more reserved to the Duke than ordinary. But what was under all this, was still a deep secret. Lord Hallifax was let into no part of it. He complained in council against Lord Rochester, that there were many razures in the books of the Treasury, and moved the King to go to the Treasury Chamber. So the King named the next Monday. And Mr. May was sent for from Windsor, to come to court that day, which it was expected would prove a critical day. And it proved so indeed, though in a different way; the King being taken ill in the meanwhile.

‡ He was seized with a sudden fit, which resembled an apoplexy; and though he was recovered from it by bleeding, he only languished silver moneys were coined into the same pieces, and at the same rates, as in the second of Charles I. By another indenture in the twenty-second of King Charles II. crown gold, twenty-two carats fine, and two carats allay, was coined into 44l. 10s. by tale; namely, into pieces to go for ten shillings, twenty shillings, forty shillings, or five pounds a-piece; and a pound of silver of the old standard into three pounds two shillings by tale; namely into Crowns, Half-Crowns, Shillings, Half-Shillings, Groats, Half-Groats, Half-Sixpences, Half-Groats, and Pence.

The money of King Charles II. was of three sorts: the hammered, which was the only current coin, till 1663; the milled upon the side: and that with the graining or letters upon the edge——The first money that bore the name of this King, was coined at Pontefract Castle; round which is inscribed CAROLVS. On the money called Cutters, the legend goes quite round the head; which, it does not in a very neat cutter, called by some the unmilled guinea, the King's head extending to the rim, without the initial figures behind the head, and the titles abbreviated to CAR. ed a few days, and then expired. He was so happy in a good constitution of body, and had ever been so remarkably careful of his health, that his death struck as great a surprise into his subjects, as if he had been in the flower of his youth. And their great concern for him, owing to their affection for his person, as well as dread of his successor, very naturally when joined to the critical time of his death, begat the suspicion of poison. All circumstances however considered, this suspicion may be allowed to vanish; like many others, of which all histories are full.—During the few days of the King's illness, clergymen of the church of England attended him; but he discovered a total indifference towards their devotion and exhortations. Catholic priests were brought, and he received the sacrament from them, accompanied with the other rites of the Romish church. Two papers were found in his cabinet, written with his own hand, and containing arguments in favour of that communion. The Duke had the imprudence immediately to publish these papers, and thereby both confirmed the reproaches of those who had been the greatest enemies to his brother's measures, and afforded to the world a specimen of his own bigotry.—If we survey the character of Charles II. in the different lights which it will admit of, it will appear various, and give rise to different and even opposite sentiments. When considered as a companion, he appears the most amiable and engaging of men; and indeed, in this view, his deportment must be allowed altogether unexceptionable. His love of raillery was so tempered with good breeding, that it was never offensive: his propensity to satire was so checked with discretion, that his friends never dreaded their becoming the object of it: his wit, to use the expression of one who knew him well, and who was himself a good judge, could not be said so much to be very refined and elevated; qualities apt to beget jealousy and apprehension in company, as to be a plain, gaining, well bred, recommending kind of wit. And though perhaps he talked more than strict rules of behaviour might permit, men were so pleased with the affable, communicative deportment of the monarch, that they always went away contented both with him and themselves. This indeed is the most shining part of the King's character; and he seems to have been sensible of it: for he was fond of dropping the formality of state, and of relapsing every moment into the companion.—In the duties of private life, his conduct, though not free from exceptions, was, in the main, laudable. He was an easy, generous lover; a civil, obliging husband; a friendly brother, and a good-natured master. The voluntary friendships, however, which this prince contracted, nay, even his sense of gratitude, were feeble; and he never attached himself to any of his ministers with a sincere affection. He believed them to have no motive in serving him, but self-interest; and he was still ready, in his turn, to sacrifice them to present ease or convenience.—With a detail of his private character we must set bounds to our panegyric on Charles. The other parts of his conduct may admit of some apology, but can deserve no applause. He was indeed so much fitted for private life, preferably to public, that he even possessed order, frugality, and economy in the former: was profuse, thoughtless, and negligent in the latter. When we consider him as a sovereign, his character, though not altogether destitute of virtue, was in the main dangerous to his people, and dishonourable to himself. Negligent of the interests of the nation, careless of its glory, averse to its religion, jealous of its liberty, lavish of its treasure, sparing only of its blood, he exposed it by his measures, though he ever appeared but in sport, to the danger of a civil war, and even to the ruin and ignominy of a foreign conquest. Yet may all these enormities, if fairly and candidly examined, be imputed, in a great measure, to the indolence of his temper: a fault, which, however unfortunate in a monarch, it is impossible for us to regard with severity.—It has been remarked of Charles, that he never said a foolish thing, nor ever did a wise one; a censure, which, though too far carried, seems to have some foundation in his character and deportment. When the King was informed of this saying, he observed, that the matter was easily accounted for: for that the discourse was his own, his actions were the ministry's.—If we reflect upon the appetite for power inherent in human nature, and add to it the King's education in foreign countries, and among the cavaliers, a party which would naturally exaggerate the late usurpations of popular assemblies upon the rights of monarchy; it is not surprising, that civil liberty should not find in him a very zealous patron. Harassed with domestic faction, weary of calumnies and complaints, oppressed with debts, straitened in his revenue, he sought, though with feeble efforts, for a form of government, more simple in its structure, and more easy in its management. The hopes of rendering himself absolute by Louis's assistance seem so chimerical, that they could scarcely be retained with such obstinacy by a prince of Charles's penetration: and as to pecuniary subsidies, he surely spent much greater sums in one season, during the second Dutch war, than were remitted him from France during the whole course of his reign. We are apt therefore to imagine, that Charles was in this particular guided chiefly by inclination, and by a prepossession in favour of the French nation. He considered that people as gay, sprightly, polite, elegant, courteous, devoted to their prince, and attached to the Catholic Faith; and for these reasons he cordially loved them. The opposite character of the Dutch had rendered them the objects of his aversion; and even the uncourtly humours of the English made him very indifferent towards them. Our notions of interest are much warped by our affections; and it is not altogether without example, that a man may be guided by national prejudices, who has ever been little biassed by private and personal friendship. The character of this prince has been elaborately drawn by two great masters, the Duke of Buckingham and the Marquis of Halifax; not to mention several elegant strokes given by Sir William Temple. Dr. Welwood likewise and Bishop Burnet have employed their pencil on the same subject: but the former is somewhat partial in his favour; as the latter is by far too harsh and malignant. Instead of finding an exact parallel between Charles II. and the emperor Tiberius, as asserted by that prelate, it would be more just to remark a full contrast and opposition. The emperor seems as much to have surpassed the King in abilities, as he falls short of him in virtue. Provident, wise, active, jealous, malignant, dark, sullen, unsociable, reserved, cruel, unrelenting, unforgiving; these are the lights under which the Roman tyrant has been transmitted to us; and the only circumstance, in which it can justly be pretended he was similar to Charles, is his love of women, a passion which is too general to form any striking resemblance, and which that detested and detestable monster shared also with unnatural appetites.

"With respect to the character of this Prince," observes the celebrated Mr. Fox, in his History of the Early Part of the Reign of James the Second, "upon the delineation of which so much pains have been employed by the various writers who treat of the history of his time, it must be confessed that the facts which have been noticed in the foregoing pages, furnish but too many illustrations of the more unfavourable parts of it. From these we may collect, that his ambition was directed solely against his subjects, while he was completely indifferent concerning the figure which he or they might make in the general affairs of Europe; and that his desire of power was more unmixed with the love of glory than that of any other man whom history has recorded; that he was unprincipled, ungrateful, mean, and treacherous, to which may be added vindictive, and remorseless. For Burnet, in refusing to him the praise of clemency and forgiveness, seems to be perfectly justifiable, nor is it conceivable upon what pretence his partizans have taken this ground of panegyric. I doubt whether a single instance can be produced, of his having spared the life of any one whose motives, either of policy, or of revenge, prompted him to destroy. To alledge that of Monmouth, as it would be an affront to human nature, so would it likewise imply the most severe of all satire, against the monarch himself, and we may add too an undeserved one. For in order to consider it as an act of meritorious forbearance on his part that he did not follow the example of Constantine, and Philip the Second, by imbruing his hands in the blood of his son, we must first suppose him to have been wholly void of every natural affection, which does not appear to have been the case. His declaration, that he would have pardoned Essex, being made when that nobleman was dead, and not followed by an act evincing its sincerity, can surely obtain no credit from men of sense. If he had really had the intention, he ought not to have made the declaration, unless he accompanied it with some marks of kindness to the relations, or with some act of mercy to the friends, of the deceased. Considering it as a mere piece of hypocrisy, we cannot help looking upon it as one of the most odious passages of his life. This ill-

DECUS. ET. TVTAMEN. ANNO. REGNI. VICESIMO. QUINTO. This King was the first that coined guineas and half guineas, which he did in his 22d year. The guineas were ordered to go at twenty shillings, the half guineas at ten shillings. Of the hammered silver-money, the shilling is very fair, and has a crown for the Mint mark. Of these there are two sorts, one with XII. behind the head, which the other wants; as also the inner circle. (Fig. 1.) The Sixpences are like the shillings, but have VI. instead of XII. The lesser pieces from the groat to the penny, are marked with initial figures, IIII. III. II. I. behind the head; except upon some of the two-pences, which want the figures. This hammered money continued current till 1663. when the milled money came to be in use. Of this there is a very fair crown, having a rose under the King's head laureat, from thence called the rose crown, CAROLVS II. DEI GRA. Reverse, MAG. BR. FRA. ET. HIB. REX. 1662. The milled Shilling is neatly struck, having the CS. between the four shields crowned, with the arms single, and inscribed as the crown. Upon some is an elephant; upon others the Prince's feathers; and a third has the sceptres. The Six-pence is like the Shilling. The Groat has four CS. interlinked, with a rose, thistle, fleur-de-lis, and harp in the vacancies. fined boast of his intended mercy, and the brutal taunt with which he accompanied his mitigation, (if so it may be called,) of Russel's sentence, show his insensibility and hardness to have been such, that in questions where right and feelings were concerned, his good sense, and even his good taste, for which he has been so much extolled, seemed wholly to desert him.

"On the other hand, it would be want of candour to maintain, that Charles was entirely destitute of good qualities: nor was the propriety of Burnet's comparison between him and Tiberius ever felt, I imagine, by any one but its author. He was gay and affable, and, if incapable of the sentiments belonging to pride of a laudable sort, he was at least free from haughtiness and insolence. The praise of politeness which the stoicks are not perhaps wrong in classing among the several virtues, provided they admit it to be one of the lowest order, has never been denied him, and he had in an eminent degree that felicity of temper, which though considered by some moralists as nearly allied to vice, yet, inasmuch as it contributed greatly to the happiness of those around us, is, in itself, not only an engaging, but an estimable quality. His support of the Queen during the heats raised by the Popish plot, ought to be taken rather as a proof that he was not a monster, than to be ascribed to him as a merit; but his steadiness to his brother, though it may and ought, in a great measure, to be accounted for upon selfish principles, had at least a strong resemblance to virtue.

"The best part of this Prince's character seems to have been his kindness, towards his mistresses, and his affection for his children, and others nearly connected to him by the ties of blood. His recommendation of the Duchess of Portsmouth and Mrs. Gwynn, upon his death-bed, to his successor, is much to his honour; and they who censure it, seem, in their zeal to show themselves strict moralists, to have suffered their notions of vice and virtue to have fallen into strange confusion. Charles's connection with those ladies might be vicious, but at a moment when that connection was upon the point of being finally and irrevocably dissolved, to concern himself about their future welfare, and to recommend them to his brother with earnest tenderness, was virtue. It is not for the interest of morality that the good and evil actions, even of bad men, should be confounded. His affection for the Duke of Gloucester, and for the Duchess of Orleans, seems to have been sincere and cordial. To attribute, as some have done, his grief for the loss of the first to political considerations, founded upon an equal balance of power between his two brothers, would be an absurd refinement, whatever were his general disposition; but when we reflect upon that carelessness which, especially in his youth, was a conspicuous feature of his character, the absurdity becomes still more striking. And though Burnet more covertly, and Ludlow more openly, assert that his fondness for his sister was of a criminal nature, I never could find that there was any ground whatever for such a suspicion; nor does the little that remains of their epistolary correspondence give it the smallest countenance. Upon the whole, Charles the Second was a bad man, and a bad King; let us not palliate his crimes; but neither let us adopt false or doubtful imputations, for the purpose of making him a monster."

King Charles II. left no issue by his Queen, Donna Catharina, daughter of John IV. King of Portugal. But by his several mistresses, he had the following children.

I. By Mrs. Lucy Walters, daughter of Richard Walters, Esq. James, Duke of Monmouth, born at Rotterdam, April 9, 1649. beheaded on Tower-hill, July 15, 1685. He married in 1665, Anne Scot, daughter of Francis, Earl of Buccleugh in Scotland.

II. By Mrs. Elizabeth Killigrew, Viscountess Shannon, daughter of Sir William Killigrew, Charlot-Jamia-Henrietta-Maria-Fitz-roy, who died in 1684. Her husbands were, James Howard, and Sir William Paston, Earl of Yarmouth.

III. By Mrs. Catharine Peg, daughter of Thomas Peg, Esq. Charles Fitz-Charles, Earl of Plymouth, commonly called Don Carlos, born 1658, killed October, 17, 1680, at Tangier. He married Bridget, daughter of Sir Thomas Osborne, Duke of Leeds, who married afterwards Dr. Biss, the late Bishop of Hereford.

IV. By Mrs. Barbara Villiers, heiress of William Viscount Grandson in Ireland, and wife of Roger Palmer Earl of Castlemain, created Lady Nonsuch, Countess of Southampton, and Duchess of Cleveland, who died in 1709, he had three sons and three daughters.

1. Charles Fitz-roy, born 1662, created 1675, Duke of Southampton, and after his mother's death, Duke of Cleveland. His wives were Mary, daughter of Sir Henry Wood, and Alice, daughter of Sir William Poultney.

2. Henry Fitz-roy, Duke of Grafton; born September 20, 1663; and killed October 9, 1690, at the siege of Cork in Ireland. His wife was Isabella, daughter of Henry Burnet, Earl of Arlington, married after his death to Sir Thomas Harmer, Bart.

3. George Fitz-roy, Duke of Northumberland; born December 28, 1665, who died July 8, 1617, without children.

4. Ann Fitz-roy, born Feb. 29, 1661, married in 1674, to Thomas Lennard, Earl of Sussex.

5. Charlotte Fitz-roy, born September 5, 1664, married February 20, 1676-7, to Sir Edward Henry Lee, Earl of Litchfield.

6. Barbara, born July 16, 1672, who became a Nun at Pontoise in France.

V. By Mrs. Eleanor Gwynn,

1. Charles Beauclerk, Duke of St. Albans, born May 8, 1670, who married Diana Vere, eldest daughter and coheiress of Ambrey de Vere, the 20th and last Earl of Oxford.

2. James Beauclerk, born December 25, 1671. He died in 1680 in France.

VI. By Louise de Queroualle, Duchess of Portsmouth; Charles Lenox, Duke of Richmond and Lenox, born July 29, 1672, who died May 27, 1723. His wife was Ann, eldest daughter of Francis Lord Brudenel.

VII. By Mrs. Mary Davis, Mary Tuder, born October 16, 1673, married in August 1687, to Francis Lord Ratcliff, Earl of Derwentwater.

BOOK XXIV.

THE REIGN OF KING JAMES II. FROM HIS ACCESSION TO THE THRONE, TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF KING WILLIAM AND QUEEN MARY; COMPRISING A PERIOD OF FOUR YEARS AND SEVEN DAYS.

27. JAMES II.

A. D. 1684-5.] WITHIN a few hours after Charles II. had resigned his last breath, his brother, the Duke of York, was proclaimed King in London, by the name of James II. Having seen how the government was settled for some years past, we must not think it strange, there were no endeavours, either in London or any other part of the kingdom, to oppose the new King. Of the two parties in England, that against the Bill of Exclusion was triumphant, and the other entirely broken and oppressed. The accession of James II. to the crown, was a fresh occasion of triumph to the former, and notwithstanding the fears expressed by the other party, about a Catholic successor, they who had supported his interest, endeavoured to represent the late change, as the greatest of blessings to the English nation. The King, on his part, omitted nothing that lay in his power to confirm the good opinion his friends had of his virtue and sincerity. As soon as the Lords were returned to Whitehall, from proclaiming the King, he assembled the Privy-Council, and made the following speech:

"My Lords,

"Before I enter upon any other business, I think fit to say something to you. Since it hath pleased Almighty God to place me in this station, and I am now to succeed so good and gracious a King, as well as so very kind a brother, I think it fit to declare to you, that I will endeavour to follow his example, and most especially in that of his great clemency and tenderness to his people. I have been reported to be a man for arbitrary power; but that is not the only story has been made of me; and I shall make it my endeavour to preserve this government both in church and state, as it is now by law established. I know the principles of the church of England are for monarchy, and the members of it have shewed themselves good and loyal subjects, therefore I shall always take care to defend and support it. I know too, that the laws of England are sufficient to make the King as great a monarch as I can wish; and as I shall never depart from the just rights and prerogative of the crown, so I shall never invade any man's property. I have often heretofore ventured my life in defence of this nation, and I shall still go as far as any man in preserving it in all its just rights and liberties."

This speech being addressed to a council wholly composed of persons devoted to the King, was received with great applause. His Majesty was desired that it might be printed, and dispersed among the people, which was immediately done. Moreover, great care was taken to extol the King's extreme affection for his subjects; and, above all, his strict observance of his word and faith was so industriously propagated, that some counting it impossible for the King to promise what he did not intend to perform, began to give him the name of James the Just, as if to say and to do, were in him one and the same thing.

The next day, the King published a proclamation, declaring, that all persons who at the late King's decease were possessed of any office, should be continued in the same, till the King's pleasure was further known. He declared, moreover, that all orders and directions given by the late King's Privy-Council, should be obeyed and performed, as if he were still alive.

Most historians represent as surprizing, the King's going publicly to mass two days after his accession to the crown. But we cannot see any reason for this surprize. Since the year 1670, no man had been ignorant, that the Duke of York was a Catholic. On this account he resigned the office of Lord High-Admiral, and in the following year, the Bill of Exclusion, which caused three Parliaments to be dissolved, had sufficiently taught the English this truth.

But what gave more just cause of surprize, was, his requiring by proclamation the same week, that the customs, and other duties which had been granted to the King his brother, only for life, should be continued to be collected.* This was a manifest invasion of the nation's rights and liberties.

Another step the King made at the same time, and, as it seems, without any necessity, was to cause it to be published, and attested by father Huddleston, a priest, that Charles II. died a Catholic, and that the same priest gave him the eucharist and extreme unction. Huddleston published withal a little treatise, called, "A short and plain way to the Faith and Church;" which treatise, the author affirms, made great impressions upon the mind of King Charles, in the year 1651, immediately after the battle of Worcester, so that he declared, "he had not seen any thing more plain and clear upon the subject; and the arguments drawn from succession were so conclusive, he did not conceive how they could be denied." Moreover, at the same time, James ordered two papers to be published, found in the King his brother's strong box, written with his own hand, both tending to prove the necessity of a visible church and guide, in matters of faith. To confirm that Charles II. was really a Catholic, Mr. William Chaffinch, keeper of the King's closet, made no scruple to show a little chapel annexed to the closet, where the King went secretly to mass.

The funeral of Charles II. was solemnised on the 14th of February at night. It may easily be judged, it was not very expensive, since eight days were sufficient for the preparations. James caused his brother to be buried with little pomp, though Charles left him ninety thousand guineas in a box.

* Another proclamation was put out for levying the additional excise, which had been given to the late King only for life. There was a clause in this act, which empowered the treasury to make a farm of it for three years, without adding a limited clause, in case it should be so long due. And it was thought a great stretch of the clause, to make a fraudulent farm, by which it should continue to be levied three years after it was determined, according to the letter and intent of the act. A farm was now brought out, as made during the King's life, though it was well known, that no such farm had been made, for it was made after his death, but a false date put to it.

Two days after, the King ordered the Privy-Counsellors and great officers of the crown and household to be sworn, and at the same time filled the vacant places. The office of Lord Treasurer, vacant since the year 1679, by the resignation of the Earl of Danby, was conferred on Laurence Hyde, Earl of Rochester, the King's brother-in-law; Henry, Earl of Clarendon, elder brother to the Earl of Rochester, was made Lord Privy-Seal; and George Savil, Marquis of Hallifax, President of the council.

In the mean time, the counties, cities, boroughs, and universities were employed in preparing congratulatory addresses to the King, upon his accession to the crown. These addresses, for the most part, took notice of the King's positive declaration to the Privy-Council, to maintain the church of England and the liberties of the nation.*

A. D. 1685.] The King and Queen's coronation was celebrated the 23d of April, St. George's day. Though such a ceremony cannot be solemnized without pomp, it was observed, the King retrenched several things which caused a needless expence, as for instance the cavalcade from the Tower to Westminster, which was wont to be performed the day before the coronation, saving thereby a charge of sixty thousand pounds. But if some authors are to be credited, the most considerable retrenching was in the words of the coronation oath, out of which, they pretend, several material things were struck, without specifying the particulars. Others maintain, it is an aspersion on Archbishop Sancroft, who is supposed, without foundation, to have consented to the abridging of the oath. Thus much is certain, the crown not being fit for the King's head, was often in a tottering condition and likely to fall off. Mr. Henry Sidney supporting it once with his hand, pleasantly told the King, "This is not the first time our family hath supported the crown.†" The people reckoned this an ill omen to the King, as was another thing which happened the same day. In one of the churches in London, the King's arms, painted in a glass-window, suddenly fell down and broke in pieces, while the rest of the window was standing, without a possibility of discovering why that part should fall sooner than the rest.

The same day that the King was crowned at London, the Parliament of Scotland met at Edinburgh, William Douglas, Duke of Queensbury, being Lord High-Commissioner. This Lord was entirely in the King's party, but not in such a manner as to pretend to sacrifice to him the Protestant religion and his country's liberties. Before he left London in order for Scotland, he told the King plainly, he could not engage to serve him in any thing but what should be agreeable to the laws; whereupon the King protested to him, he had no intention to make any breach either in the established religion or the laws.

Before the meeting of the Parliament of England, which was called for the 19th of May, three persons, odious to the King, the papists, and the prevailing party, were brought to their trials. The first was Titus Oates. He was accused of perjury on two points of his evidence; namely, for deposing that he was present at a consult of jesuits in London the 24th of April, 1679: another for deposing that Father Ireland was in London, between the 8th and 12th of August, and in the beginning of September in the same year. Never criminal was convicted on fuller and more undoubted evidence. Two and twenty persons, who had been students at St. Omer's, most of them men of credit and family, gave evidence, that Oates had entered into that seminary about Christmas in the year 1678, and had never been absent one night, till the month of July following. Forty-seven witnesses, persons also of untainted character, deposed that Father Ireland, on the third of of August 1679, had gone to Staffordshire, where he resided till the middle of September; and, what some years before would have been regarded as a very material circumstance, nine of these witnesses were Protestants, of the church of England. Oates's sentence was, to be fined a thousand marks on each indictment, to be whipped on two different days from Aldgate to Newgate, and from Newgate to Tyburn, to be imprisoned during life, and to be pilloried five times every year.

Some charitable persons used their endeavours to beg off part of this wretched man's punishment, and made application to the Queen, intreating her to intercede for him, at least with regard to the second scourging. But all intercession was in vain. The sentence was executed with all imaginable rigour. The first day he was tied to a cart, and the hangman executed the order, with great cruelty. Oates swooned several times the first day with the extremity of the anguish. We may judge what he indured the second day, when his wounds were yet fresh. His sustaining such great torments, and escaping with life, was looked upon as something miraculous.

The next victim to the Catholics, not long after Oates, was Thomas Dangerfield, who discovered the pretended Meal-Tub Plot, which he had laid to the charge of the Protestants. But afterwards, not being able to maintain before the council what he had deposed, he confessed, he was persuaded to invent it by the Countess of Powis, and the Popish Lords in the Tower. Moreover, he had published a narrative of all the secret practices used as well to corrupt him, as to render the plot probable. As he owned, he had received money from the late King and the Duke of York, the last would never suffer such an offence to go unpunished, when he came to be King. Dangerfield therefore was committed to prison, and indicted for publishing a scandalous libel. He was tried and brought in guilty by the Jury, after which he received judgment at the King's-Bench bar, "That he should stand twice in the pillory; that he should be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate on one day, and from Newgate to Tyburn on another, and should pay a fine of five hundred pounds." The scourging was executed with rigour, though with less cruelty than on Oates. The second day, Dangerfield, after the whipping was over, being in a coach against Hatton-Garden, Robert Frances, a barrister of Gray's-Inn, came to the coach side, and using some insulting expressions, Dangerfield returned a reproaching answer. Frances having a small cane in his hand, thrust it into his eye with all his force, which in two hours put an end to his life. Frances was condemned to be hanged, and was executed accordingly, the King, though strongly solicited for a pardon, not thinking proper to leave such a crime unpunished.

Richard Baxter, a Presbyterian minister, famous for his voluminous writings during the troubles, in favour of his religion against the church of England, was the third instance of the mildness of the new government. As he could not be proceeded against for his books published during the troubles, by reason of the Act of Indemnity, occasion was taken to prosecute him for a late book, intituled, A Paraphrase on the New Testament, wherein it was pretended, there were several seditious passages, and highly reflecting on the Bishops. Baxter being brought before Jefferies at the King's Bench bar, and moving, that farther time might be allowed him for his trial, Jefferies cried out, "I will not give him a minute's time more to save his life: we have had to do with other sort of persons, but now we have a saint to deal with; and I know how to deal with saints as well as sinners. Yonder," says he, "stands Oates in the pillory, and says, he suffers for the truth, and so

* This is the address from the Quakers: "We are come to testify our sorrow for the death of our good friend Charles, and our joy for thy being made our governor. We are told thou art not of the persuasion of the church of England no more than we; therefore we hope that thou wilt grant us the same liberty which thou allowest thyself."

† Mr. Sidney, who was afterwards, Earl of Rumney, in King William's reign, was one of the principal instruments in the downfal of King James, and one of the first that went and joined the Prince of Orange.

says Baxter; but if Baxter did but stand on the other side of the pillory with him, I would say, there stood two of the greatest rogues and rascals in the kingdom." The point was only to know, whether certain passages of Baxter's book could be applied to the prelates of the church of England, or solely to those of the church of Rome. Baxter alledged in his defence, "that he had been so moderate with respect to the church of England, and had spoken so honourably of the Bishops, that he had incurred the censure of many of the dissenters upon that account." Jefferies, laying aside on this occasion the office of a Judge to turn evidence, affirmed, "That Baxter was an enemy to the name and thing, the office and persons of Bishops;" and severely reprimanded the counsel, probably for defending their cause too well. Then, speaking to Baxter, he said, "Richard, thou art an old fellow, an old knave, thou hast written books enough to load a cart, every one as full of sedition, I might say treason, as an egg is full of meat. Hadst thou been whipped out of thy writing trade forty years ago, it had been happy. Thou pretendest to be a preacher of the Gospel of peace, and thou hast one foot in the grave; it is time for thee to begin to think what account thou intendest to give. But leave thee to thyself, and I see thou wilt go on as thou hast begun; but by the grace of God I will look after thee. I know thou hast a mighty party, and I see a great many of the brotherhood in corners, waiting to see what will become of their mighty Don; and a Doctor of the party [Dr. Bates] at your elbow; but by the grace of Almighty God I will crush you all."

The Chief Justice in summoning up the evidence said; "It is notoriously known, that there has been a design to ruin the King and the nation; and this has been the main incendiary: He is as modest now as can be; but time was, when no man was so ready at 'bind your Kings in chains, and your nobles in fetters of iron;' and 'to your tents, O Israel!' Gentlemen, for God's sake do not let us be gulled twice in an age."

Baxter being found guilty, judgment was given against him, to be fined five hundred marks; to lie in prison till he paid it; and to be bound to his good behaviour for seven years.

The Parliament met the 19th of May; and the Commons having chosen their Speaker, (Sir John Trevor,) the King came to the Parliament the 22d of May. His speech was more fitted to work on their fears than their affections. He repeated indeed, and with great solemnity, the promise which he had made before the privy-council, of governing according to the laws, and of preserving the established religion. But at the same time he told them, that he positively expected that they would settle his revenue, and during life too, as in the time of his brother. "I might use many arguments," said he, "to inforce this demand; the benefit of trade, the support of the navy, the necessities of the crown, and the well-being of the government itself, which I must not suffer to be precarious: but I am confident, that your own consideration, and your sense of what is just and reasonable, will suggest to you whatever on this occasion might be enlarged upon. There is indeed one popular argument," added he, "which may be urged against compliance with my demand: men may think, that by feeding me from time to time with such supplies as they think convenient, they will better secure frequent meetings of Parliament: but as this is the first time I speak to you from the throne, I must plainly tell you, that such an expedient would be very improper to employ with me, and that the best way to engage me to meet you often, is always to use me well."

This Parliament consisted of persons prepossessed in favour of the King, who imagining that, according to his promises, he would never meddle with the laws or religion, believed it a signal service to the kingdom, to enable the King to oppose effectually the attempts of the Whigs. They were mistaken in their supposition.

However, both Houses, pleased with the King's speech, waited on him the same day with an address of thanks. When the Commons returned to their House, they voted immediately, nemine contradicente, "that all the revenue enjoyed by the King at his death, should be granted to his present Majesty, and settled upon him during life." Thus the constant and ordinary revenue of the late King, which, according to the intent of the first Parliament, held in his reign, was to be twelve hundred thousand pounds sterling, but which amounted to above double that sum; this revenue, which two Parliaments had spent about two years in settling, was granted to James II. in the space of two hours. They who speak most moderately of this revenue, compute it at more than two millions. But Coke pretends, that including the one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, enjoyed by the King while Duke of York, and annexed to the crown, the whole amounted to above two millions five hundred and fifty thousand pounds.*

The Commons having given the King so real a demonstration of their zeal and affection, the Lords were willing likewise to show him how much they were devoted to him in whatever lay in their power. To that end, the King having sent a warrant to the Attorney-General to enter a Noli Prosequi upon the indictments against the popish Lords, who had been prisoners in the Tower for the plot, and against the Earl of Danby, the House of Peers annulled their order of the 19th of March 1678-9, and entirely discharged those Lords who had been released only upon bail.

These proceedings in favour of the popish Lords, made way for a bill to reverse the attainder of the Lord Viscount Stafford in 1680. The sole reason alledged in the bill for this reversal was in these words: "Whereas it is now manifest, that the said William, late Viscount Stafford, was innocent of the treason laid to his charge, and the testimony whereupon he was found guilty was false. Be it enacted, &c."

The Lords, in passing this bill, designed rather to oblige the King than do justice to the memory of the Lord Stafford. But the Commons had not the same complaisance, since it was dropt after the second reading, and never heard of more, they having no intention to strengthen or encourage the popish party.

The Parliament of Scotland was still extremely zealous for the King's interest. Besides the acts before mentioned, they passed one for granting the King during life the yearly sum of two hundred and sixty thousand pounds; and another declaring, that the giving or taking the national covenant, or the solemn league and covenant, or owning them as lawful or obligatory, should incur the crime of high-treason.

Since the Earl of Argyle's escape after his condemnation in 1681, he had kept himself concealed at Amsterdam, very few persons in Scotland knowing where he was. He waited there for a favourable opportunity either to make his peace with the King, or to raise in Scotland, where he thought he had many friends, an insurrection, which should put him again in possession of his estate. He believed a fair occasion offered for an insurrection after the death of Charles II. knowing that the Duke of York, who was to succeed, was beloved neither in Scotland nor England. For though, in both kingdoms, the government, and all the public offices were in the hands of the Tories, the Earl of Argyle imagined, that if by his credit he could raise an army in Scotland, all the Presbyterians would list under his banner, and then his party would be much superior to the King's.

Whilst he was full of these thoughts, the Prince of

* The Commons also voted unanimously, that they relied on his Majesty's royal word and declarations to support the religion of the church of England; but they added that their religion was dearer to them than their lives. The Speaker, in presenting the revenue bill, took care to inform the King of their vote with regard to religion; but could not by so signal a proof of confidence, extort from him one word in favour of that religion on which he told his Majesty, they set so high a value. Notwithstanding the grounds of suspicion which this silence afforded, the house continued in the same liberal disposition. The King having demanded a further supply for the navy and other purposes, they revived those duties on wines and vinegar, which had once been enjoyed by the late King; and they added some impositions on tobacco and sugar. This grant amounted on the whole to about six hundred thousand pounds a year.

Orange, foreseeing the King his father-in-law would soon desire the States to deliver up the Duke of Monmouth, advised him to retire elsewhere. The Duke followed his advice, and withdrew to Brussels. But fearing he was not safe there, and that the court of Spain would think proper to sacrifice him to King James I. he repaired privately to Amsterdam, where he had frequent conferences with Argyle. They had nothing ready to make an attempt, which might have the least appearance of success. They were both without money, and not sure of friends in England or Scotland to second their projects. Meanwhile, the Earl of Argyle meeting at Amsterdam with a rich widow, who lent him ten thousand pounds, this unexpected supply so encouraged him, that he resolved to make a descent in Scotland, where he hoped, that his name, his credit, and the cause he intended to support, would procure him friends enough. But the Duke of Monmouth was not in so favourable a situation. He flattered himself, that the enmity of the Whigs against the Duke of York would revive, when they should see one at the head of their party: but he had yet no private correspondence with such of the nobility and gentry, whose credit would be able to support him, and moreover he wanted money. However, the Earl of Argyle perceiving how advantageous it would be to him, that the Duke of Monmouth should make an invasion in England, whilst he should himself do the like in Scotland, so managed that at length he persuaded him to try the same fortune, though not till after the Duke had long resisted his solicitations. Indeed, as the Duke's affairs then stood, it was a rash undertaking, especially as it was to be executed as the Parliament was sitting. But some of his friends, very unfit to manage such a design, and who were tired with living in exile, did all they could to encourage him. He therefore promised Argyle, that as soon as he should hear of his landing in Scotland, he would not fail to make a descent in England.

Upon this positive promise, the Earl of Argyle sailed with three small ships laden with arms for five thousand men, having with him some German officers and some soldiers listed in Holland. He arrived the 5th of May, before Orkney, in the north of Scotland, and sent his Secretary on shore for intelligence how the country stood affected. But the Secretary being seized and brought to Edinburgh, the Earl found nothing was to be done in those parts. Wherefore he put to sea again, and landed in the West-Highlands, at a place called Dunstafnage, a ruinous castle formerly his own. Here he left his arms and ammunition, and then published two declarations. Whereupon the Parliament of Scotland now sitting, passed an act, that all the subjects of Scotland should take the oath of allegiance anew, and assert the royal prerogatives whenever they should be required, upon pain of banishment or imprisonment.

The King, communicated to the Parliament of England Argyle's declarations: whereupon both Houses came to this resolution, that they would assist his Majesty with their lives and fortunes, against the Earl of Argyle and his adherents, and all other traitors whatsoever. The King very graciously thanked them, and in his answer to the Lords, renewed his former promises.

The Earl of Argyle, though in his own county, the inhabitants of which had been formerly his vassals, could only assemble two or three thousand men. With this little army he crossed over, and landed in the Isle of Bute. But within a few days, having notice that a great number of forces, under the command of the Earl of Dumbarton, the Duke of Gordon, the Marquis of Athol, the Earl of Arran, and others, were advancing towards him from several parts, in order to surround him, he was forced to shift from island to island, to avoid them. When he heard that three men of war, and some frigates, would soon come and attack him, he marched into Argyleshire, towards Inverary, ordering his vessels and boats to come and join him. But they were hindered by contrary winds from doing it soon enough. So, finding himself surrounded on all sides, and considering that few came to join him, and that his troops began to desert, he gave out, that he intended to attack the Marquis of Athol, who was at Inverary. But at the same time, he ordered the old castle of Ellengreg to be fortified in the best manner possible, and leaving his cannon there, with a garrison of one hundred and eighty men, marched into Dumbartonshire. The same day, the King's ships came up to the castle, with intent to batter it, but the castle surrendered upon the firing of the first gun. By this the Earl lost five thousand arms, five hundred barrels of powder, and all his cannon, besides his three ships, which were taken at the same time. This loss so discouraged Argyle, as well as his officers, that from that moment they thought only of means to escape. But as, after the loss of their ships, there was no way to fly out of Scotland, they retired from place to place with all possible speed, even to the swimming of rivers. But they were so hotly pursued, that they were forced at length to disperse into small parties, in order to save some, in case the rest should be overtaken. At last, the Earl, having received a wound in the head, was obliged to quit his horse, and run into the water up to his neck to save himself. In this posture he was taken by a countryman. This happened on the 17th of June, twenty-eight days after his first landing in Scotland. He was not suffered to languish long. For, being brought to Edinburgh with great ignominy, his head was cut off in a few days, and placed on the Toll-Booth of the city.* Rumbold, one of his friends and confidants, was likewise taken and executed, with several others. Thus the King speedily saw himself delivered from the danger which threatened him from Scotland.

The Duke of Monmouth, pursuant to his promise to Argyle, sailed out of the Texel the 24th of May, with a small man of war of thirty-two guns, and two other vessels. He met with such contrary winds, that he was nineteen days at sea, though without being discovered by the King's ships which waited in the Channel to intercept him; the King having had so early notice of his design, that Skelton, his Majesty's Envoy at the Hague, had obtained an order from the States to arrest him. For which reason, the Duke departed sooner than he intended. At last, he landed the 11th of June, with about eighty followers, in the west of England, near Lyme, and the same day repaired to the town, where he was received without opposition. Here he published a declaration against the King; in which he did not fail to affirm, "that his mother was lawful wife of Charles II."†

The King having communicated to both Houses the Duke of Monmouth's landing at Lyme, they presented an address to him, assuring him of their zeal and assistance, and immediately after the Commons proceeded to a bill of attainder against the Duke of Monmouth. At the same time they desired his Majesty to issue a proclamation, promising a reward of five thousand pounds to any that should bring in the Duke dead or alive. The bill of attainder was dispatched by the Commons in two days, and in one by the Lords.

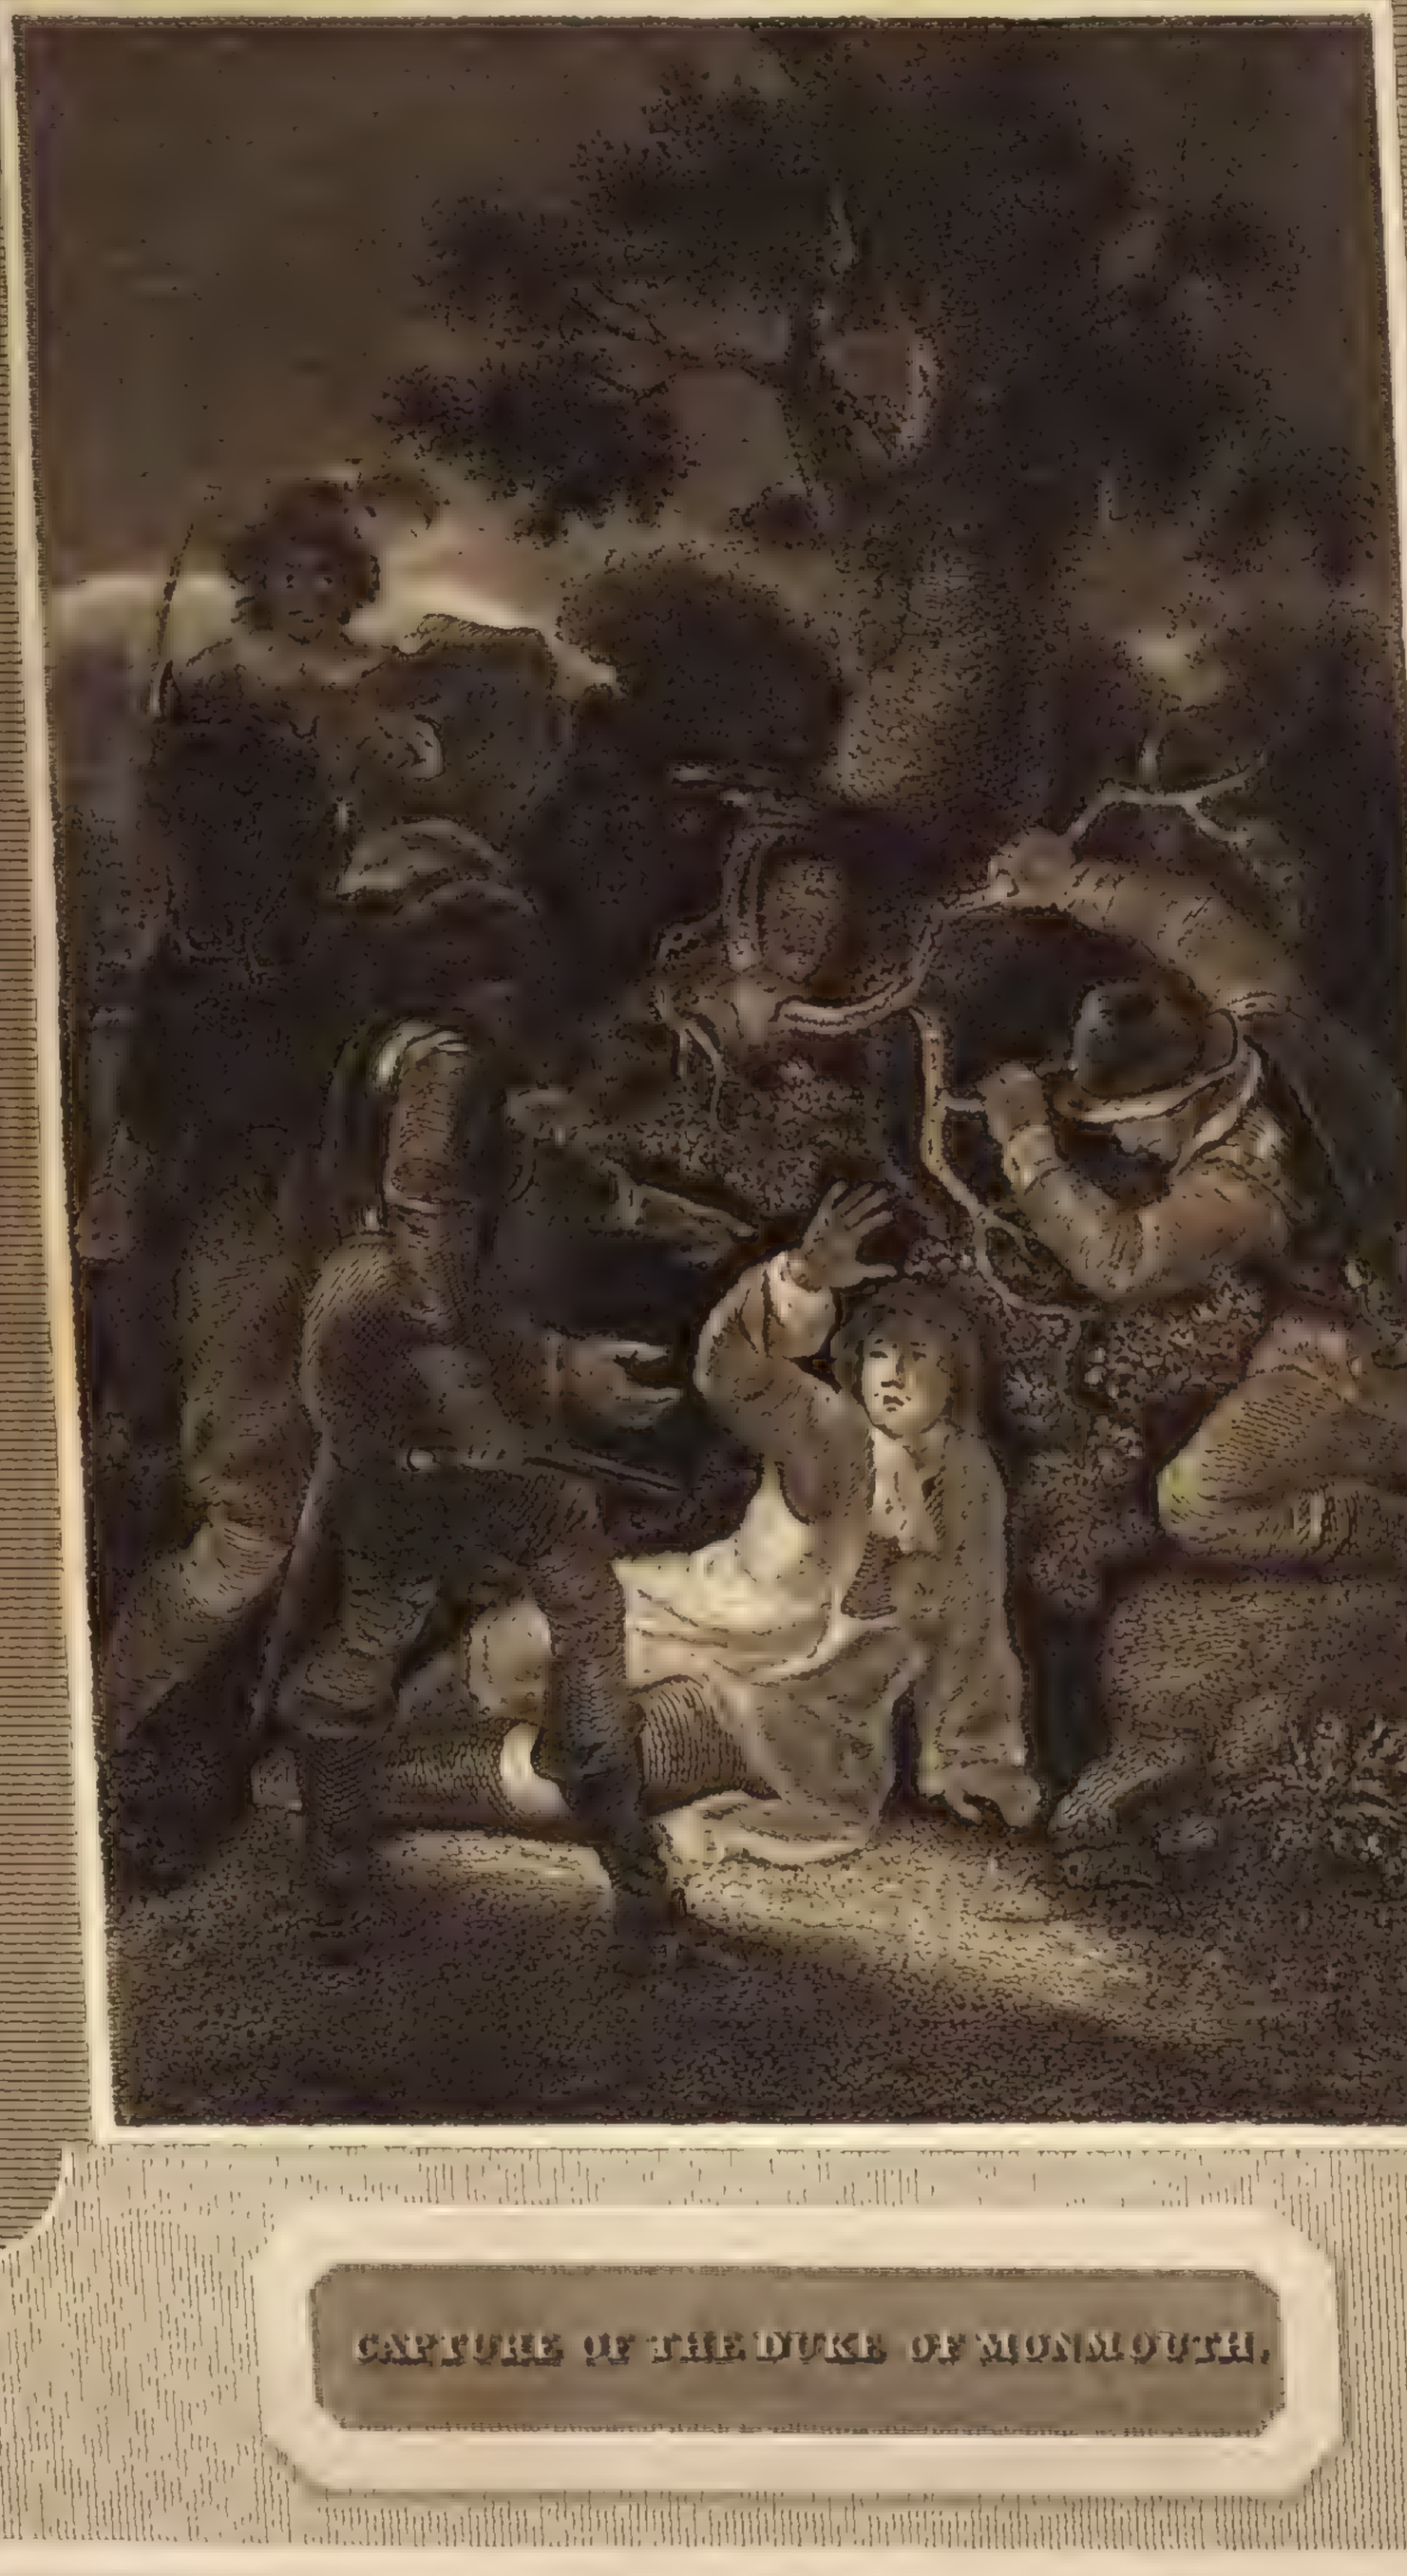
On the 2d of July, the Parliament was adjourned to the 4th of August.

The Duke of Monmouth's followers, who were not above eighty-two men when he landed at Lyme, increased to two thousand in three or four days. This made him hope they would continually increase as he

* Pursuant to the sentence passed three years before, which made his death to be looked on as no better than murder. He justified all he had done; for he said, he was unjustly attainted; and that had dissolved his allegiance. He complained of the Duke of Monmouth much, for delaying his coming so long after him, and for assuming the name of King, both which he said was contrary to their agreement at parting.

† This declaration was calculated chiefly to suit the prejudices of the vulgar, or the most bigoted of the Whig party. He called the King Duke of York; and denominated him a traitor, a tyrant, an assassin, and a Popish usurper. He imputed to him the fire of London, the murder of Godfrey and of Essex, nay the poisoning of the late King. And he invited all the people to join in opposition to his tyranny.

RAPIN'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.



CAPTURE OF THE DUKE OF MONMOUTH.

advanced into the country. Wherefore he departed from Lyme the 15th of June, and came the same day to Axminster. He thereby prevented Christopher Monk, Duke of Albemarle, who, with four thousand of the militia, intended to go thither in order to besiege him in Lyme. The Duke of Monmouth being come to Axminster, disposed his troops in such a manner, that Albemarle, instead of attacking him, thought proper to retreat, perceiving his militia-men had no inclination to do their duty. Albemarle's retreat enabled the Duke of Monmouth to march to Taunton, where he arrived the 18th, and was received with loud acclamations. His army being considerably increased during a five or six days' stay at Taunton, he imagined his affairs were in a prosperous way, and that all the country would join him. In this expectation he called a council, where it was resolved he should assume the title of King; and, pursuant to the advice of those he consulted, he was proclaimed King, at Taunton, the 20th of June, by the name of James II.

He began his pretended reign with three proclamations. By the first, he promised the sum of five thousand pounds to any that should bring the Duke of York dead or alive. By the second, he declared the Parliament now sitting a seditious assembly, and gave power to any that would lay hold of the members as rebels and traitors, if they did not separate before the end of June. The third was to declare the Duke of Albemarle a traitor, who lay within six miles of Taunton with his militia-men to attack him, if he found opportunity.

The 21st of June the Duke marched to Bridgewater. He was received there as at Taunton, especially as his army was increased to five thousand men, and might have been more numerous, had he been able to arm those that offered to serve him. Besides arms, he wanted good officers. After causing himself to be proclaimed in Bridgewater, he marched for Bristol, where the inhabitants were inclined to receive him, had they not been awed by the Duke of Beaufort their Governor. He advanced however within three miles of the city, at the instance of some Bristol men, who assured him, he would be received in spite of the Governor and the garrison. But in the mean time, he had notice that the King's forces were advancing, which made him alter his resolution, of attempting Bristol, to that of retreating to Bridgewater. He marched therefore towards Bath, and after vainly summoning that city to surrender, he beat up one of the King's quarters, at Philip's-Norton, where lay a troop of horse, which was entirely defeated. From thence he advanced to Frome, where he met with a cheerful reception. But unhappily for him, the King's party had found means a few days before to disarm all the inhabitants, so that he was disappointed, his chief aim being to seize those arms for such of his men as wanted them. At Frome he heard of the Earl of Argyle's defeat, which threw him into great consternation. However, he resolved to pursue his march, and return to Bridgewater.

Whilst these things passed in the west, the King was preparing at London, with all possible diligence, for his defence against an enemy who could not but make him extremely uneasy. But he had not many regular troops, and those dispersed in several parts of the kingdom. This obliged him to raise the militia, particularly in the western counties, till the arrival of the English and Scotch regiments which were to come from Holland. On this occasion, the Prince of Orange, his son-in-law, sent Monsieur Bentinck, with an offer of his person to head his army: but the King did not think proper to accept it. Meanwhile, as he had no great confidence in the militia, he sent down his guards, and all the regular troops he could assemble, and formed a little army of two thousand foot, and seven hundred horse and dragoons. He gave the command to Lewis Duras, Earl of Feversham, brother of the Marshals Duras and de Lorge, and nephew to the late Mr. de Turenne. With these few troops, the Earl of Feversham encamped at a place called Sedgemore near Bridgewater, whilst several parties of the militia of the neighbouring counties lay about him, under the command of the Dukes of Beaufort, Somerset, Albemarle, and the Earl of Pembroke.

The Duke of Monmouth, who was come to Bridgewater, looking upon himself as besieged, and considering that the King's forces daily increased, whilst his own began to desert, held a council of war, wherein it was resolved to march in the night, and surprize the Earl of Feversham, who was encamped that day at Sedgemore, and according to the report of the spies, little expected to be attacked. Pursuant to this resolution, the Duke began his march about eleven at night, with profound silence, and within two hours fell in with Dunbarton's regiment, which, being an advanced post, gave the alarm to the royal army, and by that they had time to draw up and receive their enemies. The particulars of the battle, which was fought about an hour after, are not well known. Thus much is certain, the Duke of Monmouth's horse, commanded by the Lord Grey, behaved very ill, though superior to the King's in number, and were routed at the first charge. The Duke of Monmouth, at the head of the foot, long fought with great bravery. But being deserted by his own, and attacked by the King's horse, his army was at last forced to take to flight. The loss of this battle was ascribed to the little experience or cowardice of the Lord Grey, who commanded the horse, and was even suspected of treachery. What confirmed this suspicion was, that being made prisoner he readily obtained the King's pardon. It is said moreover, that when he had so ill performed his duty, instead of endeavouring to rally the horse, he rode up to the Duke of Monmouth and told him, "all was lost, and it was more than time to shift for himself."

This battle was fought the 6th of July, at break of day. There were slain on the Duke of Monmouth's side three hundred men on the spot, a thousand in the pursuit, and as many taken prisoners. The Duke retiring out of the fight, could hardly rally fifty horse to secure his retreat. But these being quickly dispersed, he was obliged to fly on foot, accompanied only with a German Count, whom he had brought with him from Holland. The Lord Grey was taken on the morrow, and, the day after, the Duke of Monmouth was found in a ditch covered with fern, with some green peas in his pocket. Probably he had eaten nothing else for two days. He was brought to the Lord Lumley, who immediately conveyed him to London.

No sooner was the Duke taken, but he believed himself lost, and yet he retained some hopes that the King would be moved by his submission and repentance, and that the Queen Dowager would intercede for him. In this belief, he wrote to the King for pardon in the most submissive term he could devise, and which he thought most apt to move his compassion. He wrote also to the Queen Dowager, who really interceded for him, and prevailed with the King to see the unfortunate Duke. She made no doubt, that since the King had consented to see him, he intended to pardon him; but she was mistaken. The Duke being brought to the King's presence, threw himself at his feet, and begged his life in a very submissive or rather abject manner. The King, after asking him some questions, made him sign a declaration, whereby he owned, that the King his father assured him, he was never married to his mother. This done, the King told him, his crime was of too great a consequence to be forgiven, and therefore he must prepare to die. The Queen, who was present, is said to have insulted his misfortune in an unmerciful manner. The Duke seeing no hopes left, rose from the King's feet, with an air of bravery, which would have better become him when he first came into his presence, and was carried to the Tower to prepare for death.

Till his execution the King ordered Turner Bishop of Ely to attend him, and prepare him to die. The Duke wrote once more to the King for pardon, or at least for a longer time, and desired him to send him Dr. Tennison or any other Divine. The King denied the two first articles of his request, and appointed Ken, Bishop of Bath and Wells, to go and acquaint him, that he must die the next morning.

In the morning, July the 15th, Dr. Tennison and Dr. Hooper were brought to him, and attended him to the last hour of his life. By their exhortations they persuaded him to give it in writing, that the King his father told him, he was never married to his mother. He confessed also, that his invasion was a sin, but would never own it a rebellion. There was another point about which the two Divines could never receive from him any satisfaction, namely, his living with the Lady Harriet Wentworth, though he had a Duchess of his own, and his pretending to be lawfully married to her before God, alledging, that his first marriage was null, as being too young when he gave his consent. All the pains taken by the two Doctors to convince him of the falsehood of this opinion were fruitless; he chose rather to deprive himself of the communion, than own his engagements with that lady to be unlawful.

When he was on the scaffold, he declared, he died a Protestant of the church of England. But Turner and Ken stopped him, and said, that to be a member of the church of England he must believe the doctrine of non-resistance. He answered, he could not help it, but he did not believe it, yet he approved the doctrine of the church in all other things. At last, he laid his head on the block, which was not severed from his body until the fifth stroke.* Thus died the Duke of Monmouth, who had long been the people's idol, and whom James always considered as a very formidable rival. Charles II. died very seasonably to free the Duke his brother from the uneasiness created him by this competitor. But though James had mounted the throne, the Duke of Monmouth endangered his crown. Neither the victory at Sedgemore, nor Argyle's defeat in Scotland, could be ascribed to the valour or conduct of the King, but to mere chance, or rather to the direction of Providence, which, for the welfare of England, was pleased to use properer means to be more plainly distinguished.

The King being thus freed from his greatest fears, gave himself over entirely to the passion of revenge on those who directly or indirectly had assisted the Duke of Monmouth. To that end, the Lord Chief Justice Jefferies was sent with four Judges assistants, into the west, with a special commission of Oyer and Terminer, to try the late rebels; and Major-General Kirk was ordered to attend him with a body of troops to keep the people in awe. It was not possible for the King to find in the whole kingdom, two men more destitute of religion, honour, and humanity. They were two cruel and merciless tygers, that delighted in blood.

At Winchester, the widow of the Lord Lisle, one of King Charles I.'s Judges, was brought before him to be tried. Her crime was the harbouring and concealing Mr. Hicks, a Presbyterian minister of the Duke of Monmouth's party, though his name was in no proclamation, and one Nelthorp, who was a stranger to her. The jury, not satisfied with the evidence, brought her in not guilty. But Jefferies, in great fury, sent them out again. They found her not guilty three times: but Jefferies threatening them with an attaint of jury, she was brought in guilty, and executed accordingly, being above seventy years old.

At Dorchester, Jefferies, to shorten his work, told thirty prisoners, that if they expected any favour, they should plead guilty. But as they did not care to take that course, he condemned twenty-nine, who were immediately executed.

In another place, two hundred persons being indicted, Jefferies positively promised a pardon to such as should plead guilty, and of the two hundred, he ordered four-score to be hanged.

Not to enlarge on such a scene of horror, it suffices to say, that Jefferies condemned five hundred persons, whereof two hundred and thirty were executed, according to the lowest computation, and their quarters set up in the highways. Jefferies himself gloried in this barbarity, and boasted, that he had hanged more men than all the Judges of England since William the Conqueror. And yet he would have carried his cruelty farther, had not many purchased his favour with their estates. One Mr. Prideaux alone, gave him fourteen thousand pounds to save his life. As for those that had not money enough to buy pardons at his price, they were either hanged, or cruelly whipped, or sold for slaves into the American Plantations.

Kirk was not behind Jefferies either in cruelty or insolence. Immediately after the Duke of Monmouth's defeat, being sent to Taunton, he caused nineteen persons, by his own authority, without any trial or process, and without suffering their wives or children to speak with them, to be hanged, with pipes playing, drums beating, and trumpets sounding.

In the same town of Taunton, Kirk, having invited his officers to dinner, ordered thirty condemned persons to be hanged whilst they were at table, namely, ten in a health to the King, ten in a health to the Queen, and ten in a health to Jefferies. But one action he committed in another town is beyond all imagination. A young girl throwing herself at his feet to beg her brother's life, he drew her in to prostitute herself to him, with the promise of granting her request. But having satisfied his brutal lust, he was so inhuman, as out of the window, to present the credulous girl with the sight of her brother hanging on the sign-post. This sad spectacle so affected the poor girl, that she fell distracted.†

The King was so little displeased with Jefferies's conduct, that at his desire he made him Lord Chancellor, the Lord Keeper North dying while the Chief Justice was exercising his cruelties in the west. As for the general pardon, it was not published till several months after all these executions, when there were no more guilty to be found. The court must have believed, that very few could have the benefit of the pardon, since a company of young girls, from ten to twelve years old, were inserted by name, who, with chaplets of flowers on their heads, had presented a bible to the Duke of Monmouth, at his entry into Taunton.

It was not only in the western counties that the King gave sensible proofs of his revengeful temper. The city of London was witness also of several executions, in October, and among others, of Elizabeth Gaunt, who was publicly burnt for harbouring one of the Duke of Monmouth's adherents.‡ Six men were hanged at Tyburn as traitors, for crimes of the like nature, and what is more strange, without any previous trial.

But the execution that made most noise, was that of Alderman Cornish. This man, who was sheriff of London, at the time of the discovery of the Popish plot, had been very active on that occasion, which was grown an unpardonable crime in the present reign. Cornish, whose name had hardly been mentioned in the Rye-plot, not suspecting any thing, and following his profession, was seized on Tuesday the 13th of October, and hurried to Newgate without being allowed the use of pen, ink, and paper. The next Saturday evening, he had notice, that he was indicted of high-treason, and that his trial was to be on Monday morning. On the morrow, he sent a petition to the King for a longer time,

* The Duke had warned the executioner not to fall into the error which he had committed in beheading Russel, where it had been necessary to repeat the blow. This precaution served only to dismay the executioner. He struck a feeble blow on Monmouth, who raised his head from the block, and looked him in the face, as if reproaching him for his failure. He gently laid down his head a second time; and the executioner struck him again and again to no purpose. He then threw aside the axe, and cried out that he was incapable of finishing the bloody office. The sheriff obliged him to renew the attempt; and at two blows more the head was severed from the body.

† Burnet assures us, that the King had a particular account of all Jefferies's proceedings written to him every day. And he took pleasure to relate them in the drawing room to foreigners, and at his table, calling it Jefferies's Campaign. Dykvelt, the States' ambassador, told Burnet, that the King talked so often of these things in his hearing, that he wondered to see him break out into those indecencies.

‡ The villain, upon hearing that the King would sooner pardon the rebels than those that harboured them, by an unheard of baseness, went and delivered himself and accused her that harboured him, while she was looking for an opportunity of sending him out of the kingdom. Upon the evidence of this infamous witness, the judge charged the jury to find her guilty.

alledging, that he did not even know wherein consisted the treason he was accused of. The King referred his petition to the Judges, who absolutely denied his request. He was charged with conspiring against King Charles II. with the Lord Russel, and the rest who had been executed for that affair, and condemned upon the evidence of the same witnesses, though he showed, in their depositions, manifest contradictions, and palpable improbabilities. But it was resolved to revenge the death of those who suffered for the popish plot, upon such as had been most active against the papists. Cornish was executed as a traitor, the 23d of October. But the Parliament, in the year 1688, reversed the sentence, as well as those of some others, who had unjustly suffered in the beginning of this reign.

The last that died for the Protestant plot, was Charles Bateman, a noted Surgeon, who was accused of holding several seditious discourses at that time against the government. But many people believed, his chief crime consisted in his compassion to Titus Oates, having constantly attended him after his cruel scourgings, and used all his skill to cure his wounds. This man, who did not expect to be accused, grew distracted during his imprisonment, and the court was so well satisfied of it, that his son was permitted to make his defence for him. But his condition did not prevent his being condemned and executed.

The King was then in a flourishing state. His two greatest enemies were destroyed, and by his revenge upon those that had offended him, as well in his own, as in his brother's reign, he had struck such a terror into the whole kingdom, that no man dared so much as to think of resisting him. The Whigs were entirely humbled, the Tories were triumphant, and the doctrine of Passive Obedience and Non-Resistance was openly preached, as an essential article of the faith of the church of England. The King had a Parliament, which sought only to give him marks of their zeal, and ever ready to supply him with money for all extraordinary occasions, without his being obliged to meddle with his revenue. His army greatly contributed to make him feared, and keep the people in awe. Scotland was entirely subdued, and the managers of the affairs of that kingdom seemed only to mind the enlarging of the royal prerogative. As for Ireland, he had not staid till now to put that kingdom in the state he desired. In fine, the Princes of Europe considering him as a monarch able to incline the balance to which side he pleased, made, as we may say, their court to him, either to gain him, or at least to hinder him from turning against them.

About two months after the King's accession to the crown, he recalled the Duke of Ormond from Ireland, and appointed two Lords Justices to govern that kingdom. At the same time, the Privy-Council of Ireland was dissolved, and a new one appointed, into which were admitted several known Papists. Soon after, their number was so increased, that they made the major part of the council, so that the Protestants no longer assisted, that they might not authorize by their presence, such resolutions as it was in vain to oppose. When the council was thus modelled, nothing was heard in Ireland, but impeachments against the Protestants, for being concerned in the Rye-house plot, and afterwards for holding correspondence with the Duke of Monmouth, or his adherents. The moment any person was accused, he was sent to prison by the council, without being admitted to bail, or brought to a trial. The Earl of Granard, weary of being an instrument to those acts of injustice, desired to be dismissed. But the King denied him, and sent him a letter under his own hand, assuring him, "that nothing should be acted prejudicial to the Protestant interest." But it soon appeared, that the King never meant to perform this promise. For, very shortly after, he resolved to have a standing army of Papists in Ireland, and to disarm the Protestants. This last article was first put in practice. The King wrote to the Lords Justices, "That there was reason to believe that the rebellion of Monmouth had been of that spreading contagion, as to reach Ireland, and therefore it was not safe to have the arms of the militia dispersed abroad; but they would be in greater readiness for the use of the militia, and the defence of the country, to have them deposited in the several stores of each county." Upon this order, the Lords Justices published a proclamation, agreeably to the King's desire, and the city of Dublin having brought in their arms, their example was followed by all the country.

The Protestants being thus disarmed, means were devised to turn the Protestant, into a Catholic army. For that purpose, Colonel Richard Talbot, a violent Papist, was impowered to cashier such officers and soldiers as he thought fit. He was the man of all others most odious to the English Protestants in Ireland.

Talbot having received this commission, broke many officers, on pretence that they had borne arms against the King during the troubles, or were sons and relations of those who had served the Parliament of Cromwell. All this passed in Ireland, before or immediately after the Duke of Monmouth's defeat, at a time when the King had not yet manifested his designs in England. About the end of the year, Talbot came into England, and was made Earl of Tyrconnel, and Lieutenant-General of the Irish army, and shortly after, Henry Earl of Clarendon was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

The Parliament of England, after several adjournments, met at last on the 9th of November. The King, elated with prosperity, now seems to have thought himself exempted from all rules of prudence, or necessity of dissimulation. He plainly told the two Houses, that the militia, which had formerly been so much magnified, was now found, by experience in the last rebellion, to be altogether useless; and he required a new supply, in order to maintain those additional forces which he had levied. He also took notice, that he had employed a great many Catholic officers, and that he had, in their favour, dispensed with the law requiring the test to be taken by every one that possessed any public office. And to cut short all opposition, he declared, that, having reaped the benefit of their service during such times of danger, he was determined, neither to expose them afterwards to disgrace, nor himself, in case of another rebellion, to the want of their assistance.

This speech equally surprized both Houses of Parliament, and the whole kingdom, when it came to be published. The English had often ventured their lives in the defence of their laws and liberties, of which they then believed themselves secure, as well by the constitution of the government, as by the King's solemn promise, but they beheld their laws openly attacked in the most sensible part. Many of those who had most warmly opposed the Exclusion-bill, began to open their eyes, and perceive, that the jealousies and fears of the Whig Parliaments were too well-grounded, and that it was difficult to reconcile the interests of a Roman Catholic King, with those of a Protestant kingdom. This was what the Whigs had in vain declared in the late reign. Instead of duly weighing their reasons, the Tories had run into the other extreme; had even expected to be gainers by setting the Duke of York on the throne. But this first public step of the King, made them proceed for the future with more caution, though by their principles they were not yet obliged to take such measures as would have been necessary.

It was warmly debated in the House of Lords, whether they should give the King thanks for the speech. Some were utterly against it; whereupon the Marquis of Halifax said, "They had now more reason than ever to give thanks to his Majesty, since he had dealt so plainly with them, and discovered what he would be at." Nevertheless, it was resolved by the majority, that the King should be thanked. But, however, the Bishop of London moved, that his Majesty's speech might be debated, and though it was unusual in the House, the 23d of the month was appointed to take the speech into consideration, with which the King was highly displeased.

When the King's speech was taken into consideration

tion by the Commons, many severe reflections were thrown out against the present measures; and the House was with seeming difficulty engaged to promise, in a general vote, that they would grant some supply. But instead of finishing that business, which could alone render them acceptable to the King, they proceeded to examine the dispensing power; and they voted an address to the King against it. Before this address was presented, they resumed the consideration of the supply; and as one million two hundred thousand pounds were demanded by the court, and two hundred thousand proposed by the country party, a middle course was chosen; and seven hundred thousand, after some dispute, were at last voted. The address against the dispensing power was expressed in most respectful and submissive terms; yet it was very ill received by the King, and his answer contained a flat denial, uttered with great warmth and vehemence. The Commons were so daunted with this reply, that they kept a profound silence for a considerable time. At last it was moved by one of the members, that a particular day might be appointed to consider of the King's answer. This motion was seconded by Mr. Coke, member for Derby, who added, "He hoped they were all true Englishmen, and not to be frighted out of their duty by a few hard words." Though this speech was very consistent with the freedom of a House of Commons, the majority however were pleased to look upon Mr. Coke as an incendiary, who intended to sow discord between the King and the Commons, and voted him to be sent to the Tower. Moreover, the House, to make amends in some measure for the offence they had given the King, proceeded to ways and means towards raising the seven hundred thousand pounds before voted. But they stopped not there. To show the King that they sought all possible ways to content him, besides a bill to indemnify the Popish officers from the penalties they had already incurred, they resolved to offer another to the King, to qualify such a number of those officers to serve in the army as he should think fit. All this demonstrates, it was with regret that the House swerved from the principal of Passive-Obedience and Non-Resistance.

On the 20th of November, the King finding it would be very difficult to obtain his desires of the Commons concerning the Popish officers, prorogued the Parliament on the 10th of February, after a session of but eleven days. The King lost, by the prorogation, the seven hundred thousand pounds voted by the Commons. This prorogation, which was followed by several others, and at length by the dissolution of the Parliament, the last in this reign, is a clear demonstration of two things: First, that the King considered the affair of the popish officers in the army, as of great moment, since he chose rather to lose seven hundred thousand pounds, than see his pretended right to employ them contested by the Parliament: The second is, the excessive compliance shown to the King by the Commons, in enabling him to maintain an army, employ popish officers, and, in a word, to have no occasion for a Parliament.*

The year 1686, was wholly spent, as well as the next, in the execution of the King's two grand projects, namely of making himself absolute, and establishing Popery.

Before things were carried any farther in England, he believed it proper to be assured first of Scotland and Ireland. As for Scotland, the managers there were entirely disposed to comply with the King's will. The late Parliament, besides the acts before-mentioned, passed one, wherein it was declared, "That they owe all their blessings to the sacred race of their glorious Kings, and to the solid, absolute authority wherewith they were invested by the first and fundamental laws of their monarchy:——And therefore they again declare to the world, that they abhor and detest not only the authors and actors of all preceding rebellions against their sovereign, but also all principles and positions which are contrary or derogatory to the King's sacred, supreme, sovereign, absolute power and authority, which none, whether particular persons or collective bodies, can participate of any manner of way, or upon any pretext, but in dependence on him, and by commission from him, &c." They passed another act, "to confirm and approve whatever had been done by his Majesty's Privy-Council, Justice-courts, and those commissioned by them, in banishing, imprisoning, or fining such as refused to take and swear the oath of allegiance; and to assert the royal prerogative in the utmost extent of them."

Encouraged by these great advantages, the King summoned the Parliament of Scotland, to assemble the 29th of April this year, and wrote a letter to them, wherein, "He recommends to their special care, his innocent Roman Catholic subjects, who had always been assistant to the crown in the worst of rebellions and usurpations, though they lay under discouragements hardly to be named: these he most heartily recommended to them; to the end, that as they had given good experience of their true loyalty and peaceable behaviour, so, by their assistance, they might have the protection of his laws, not suffering them to lie under obligations, which their religion could not admit of; by doing of which, they would give a demonstration of their duty and affection towards him, and do him most acceptable service. And this love he expected they would show to their brethren, as they saw him an indulgent Father to his people."

The Earl of Murray, Lord High-Commissioner, seconded this letter, with a particular account of the many advantages the King intended to procure his realm of Scotland, chiefly with respect to trade. He also endeavoured to persuade them, that what the King desired, tended as much to the honor and welfare of his subjects of Scotland, as to his own satisfaction. He concluded with saying, "By this you will show yourselves the best and most affectionate subjects, to the best, the most incomparable, and most heroic Prince in the world."

When the King's letter, and the Lord Commissioner's speech came to be considered in the Parliament, some members, without looking farther, were for complying with the King's desires. But others, in greater numbers, moved and prevailed to have a committee appointed, to examine the Statutes against the Papists. The committee finding the Statutes prohibited only the public exercise of the popish religion, drew up a bill to allow them the exercise of their religion in private. But when this bill was presented to the Parliament, it met with so much opposition, that the Lord-Commissioner thought fit to adjourn the debate, till he had received instructions from the court. The King sent him orders to dissolve, or at least prorogue the Parliament, and some months after, by his sole authority, he established liberty of conscience in Scotland.

Affairs in Ireland were upon another footing. The King's will met with no opposition there, and though the Lord Lieutenant was a Protestant, his credit and authority were insufficient to put a stop to the acts of injustice committed against those of his religion. The new Earl of Tyrconnel was no sooner returned to Dublin with the title of Lieutenant-General of the army, but he began again to break the Protestant officers and soldiers, and put Roman Catholics in their places; without vouchsafing to ask for the Lord-Lieutenant's order. When he had modelled the army according to the King's mind, he went over into England, where, by means of the Queen and Father Petre the Jesuit, he supplanted the Earl of Clarendon, and was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Upon his arrival at Dublin, he endeavoured by a proclamation to dispel the fears of the Protestants, who saw themselves, to their great trouble,

* James, in this first year of his reign, bestowed honours and dignities upon several of his favourites and adherents, and advanced others to high offices. Henry Bennet, Earl of Arlington, dying July 28, his place of Lord Chamberlain was given to John Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave, who became one of the chief favourites in this reign. Laurence Hyde, Earl of Rochester, was made Lord Treasurer, and Henry Earl of Clarendon his elder brother, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Robert Spencer, Earl of Sunderland, principal Secretary of State, was declared Lord President of the council, and from that time became Prime Minister of State.

ble, in subjection to a Catholic. But his actions corresponded not with his promises. Wherefore, a great number of Protestants, chose rather to quit their estates in Ireland, and withdraw into England, than remain under the government of one so justly odious to them. On the other hand, the English merchants who traded in Ireland, withdrew their effects, and by that the kingdom was reduced to great extremities.

But it was chiefly in England that the King desired to establish popery and arbitrary power. If he had only aimed at absolute power, without meddling with religion, in all appearance, he would have easily succeeded, since passive obedience was in a manner established, and now reckoned an essential doctrine of the church of England, the members whereof made the body of the nation, and were possessed of all the offices and places of trust. But as they had already discovered, that if he wished to be freed from the yoke of the laws, it was chiefly to establish his religion, the Parliament, however devoted to him in all other respects, had not been so compliant as to abandon the interest of religion. Notwithstanding this refusal, he hoped to attain his ends, first, by causing the Judges to give it as their opinion, that he had a power to dispense with the laws. Secondly, by gaining the members of Parliament by degrees, being resolved to have no session till he had accomplished that design. There are men always ready to sacrifice the public, to their private interest, and there were but too many, on the present occasion, even among the clergy themselves. Dr. Cartwright, Dean of Rippon, speaking, in a sermon of the King's promises made to the Parliament, which were then the common topic of discourse and complaint, said, "That the King's promises were free donatives, and ought not to be strictly examined or urged; and that they must leave his Majesty to explain his own meaning in them." The King was so delighted with this gloss, that he rewarded the author with the Bishopric of Chester, as an encouragement to other clergymen to follow so good an example.

As for the Judges, the King took care to send for them one by one, and talk with them privately in his closet, in order to persuade them to declare for his dispensing power, telling them, he would have twelve Judges of his opinion. Four absolutely refused to comply, and were immediately displaced. The King appointed four others of more pliable and submissive understandings, among whom there was one papist. At the same time, the King made a call of serjeants at law, among whom were several Catholics, one of whom was knighted, and a little after, another lawyer of the same religion was made a Judge. The Privy-Council also underwent a similar alteration. All these changes clearly discovered the King's intentions.

But it was not long before he gave more signal marks of them. He had assumed a power to dispense with the observation of the test-act in his Catholic officers. The Parliament's refusal of their consent to this innovation, only exasperated the King, and made him resolve to exempt from the penal laws all his subjects in general, and consequently the Papists. But as this was directly against law, he undertook to show, by the means of his corrupt Judges, "That a power in the King to dispense with law, was law." For this purpose, he took care first to have papers dispersed through the kingdom, to prove this pretended right, and to prepare the people for his designs. At last, in a particular case, all the Judges, except one, gave the opinions for the King, and made it a general rule in law:

I. That the laws of England are the King's laws.

II. That therefore it is an incident, inseparable prerogative of the Kings of England, as of all other sovereign Princes, to dispense with all penal laws, in particular cases, and upon particular necessary reasons.

III. That of these reasons and necessities the King is the sole judge; consequently,

IV. That this is not a trust invested in and granted to the King, but the ancient remains of the sovereign power of the Kings of England, which never was yet taken from them, nor can be.

In consequence of this decision, the papists, with the King's permission, set up every where in the kingdom, the free and open exercise of their religion. The jesuits erected colleges and seminaries in all the considerable towns; and at the same time, four popish Bishops were publicly consecrated in the King's chapel, and sent down to exercise their functions in their respective dioceses, under the title of Vicars Apostolical. Their pastoral letters addressed to the Lay-Catholics, were printed at the King's printing-house, and dispersed through the kingdom. Monks appeared in the habits of their order at Whitehall and St. James's, and scrupled not to tell the Protestants, "That they hoped in a little time, to walk in procession through Cheapside." And as many converts were expected, that so plentiful a harvest might not want labourers, a great number of Priests and Monks were sent from foreign parts. From this time, the only way to preferment was to be a Papist, or a promoter of popery. All affairs of the council were managed by Catholics, or some others who had but little regard to religion. Thus, by the decision of ten or twelve Judges, nominated and corrupted by the King before their admission, the laws of England were given up, and the constitution entirely altered.

The King used another expedient for the advancement of his religion. He sent a circular letter to the Bishops, with an order, prohibiting all the inferior clergy from preaching upon controverted points of Divinity, for fear, as was pretended, of raising animosities among the people. It was thus that the persecution began in Queen Mary's reign. But on this occasion, the clergy of the church of England clearly discovered their aversion to popery, of which they had hitherto stood accused by their enemies, on pretence of a scrupulous attachment to some modes and ceremonies, which the first Reformers had not thought fit to retrench. For many of the dignified clergy, and the most distinguished for their piety and learning, far from prevaricating in the discharge of their office, preached openly on controverted points, or rather made them the chief subject of their discourses. They saw the tendency of this extraordinary inhibition, at a time when the Protestant religion was openly attacked, as well in sermons, as writings printed with licence, and industriously dispersed through the nation. It is justice to do honour to these faithful ministers of the Gospel, by transmitting to posterity the names of the most distinguished amongst them. These were Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Tennison, Wake, Patrick, Sharp, Sherlock; all famous for their writings, and all afterwards promoted to the first dignities of the church.

The King and his popish council were extremely offended with this boldness, and therefore, to force the Protestant clergy to submission, the King erected a new court for ecclesiastical affairs, composed of various members, among whom were several Catholics. A nomination of Papists to be Judges of a Protestant clergy in matters of doctrine and discipline, showed that the King would no longer keep any measures. Among these commissioners were three Bishops, namely, William Sancroft, of Canterbury; Crew, of Durham; and Sprat of Rochester. The first were all laymen, of which the principal were Jefferies, Lord Chancellor; the Earl of Rochester, Lord-Treasurer; the Earl of Sunderland, Secretary of State, and President of the Council; and the Lord Chief-Justice Herbert. The commission was directed to any three of them, whereof the Lord Chancellor was always to be one.*

Shortly

* By this commission they had a power to exercise and execute all manner of jurisdictions and pre-eminences, concerning any spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdictions; to visit, reform, redress, and amend all abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities whatsoever, which by the spiritual or ecclesiastical laws of the realm might be lawfully corrected. They were also to inquire into all offences, contempts, and misdemeanors committed, or hereafter to be committed; that they might be corrected and punished by the censure of the church; they were to search for, and call before them all ecclesiastical persons of what degree or dignity soever, and to punish the offenders, by excommunications,

Shortly after, Dr. Sharp, in a sermon, vindicated the church of England in opposition to the errors of popery. The King being informed of it, pretended that the preacher's intention was to beget an evil opinion of himself and his government in the minds of the hearers, and to lead them into disobedience and rebellion. On this supposition he sent a letter to the Bishop of London, commanding him forthwith to suspend Dr. Sharp from farther preaching in any parish-church or chapel in his diocese, till he had given him satisfaction, and his farther pleasure was known therein. On the receipt of this order, the Bishop wrote to the Earl of Sunderland, and prayed him to communicate his letter to the King. He represented, that he was to proceed according to law, and as a Judge; and by the law no Judge condemns a man before he has knowledge of the cause, and has cited the party. Dr. Sharp himself carried the letter, but could obtain no answer. Two days after, he waited on the King at Windsor, with a very humble petition, but without any effect. The King and his council had already resolved to embrace this occasion to punish the Bishop of London, who was odious to the court, because he had moved in the House of Lords to examine the King's speech. Besides, by so great an example, they were resolved to establish the authority of their new ecclesiastical court. The Bishop was therefore cited to appear before the commissioners the 4th of August, where he was treated in a manner unbecoming his birth and dignity, by Jefferies the Chancellor, who used him with his wonted insolence. The Bishop demanded a copy of the commission, or at least to hear it read. But this was refused, and he was answered by Jefferies, that the commission might be had in every coffee-house for a penny. At last, with great difficulty, he obtained a delay of five days. The 9th of August, he appeared a second time before the court, and again on the 23d, when he disowned its jurisdiction, alledging, that as a Bishop he had no other judge but his metropolitan: but his plea was rejected. At last, after two or three adjournments of the court, he was suspended from the function and execution of his episcopal office, for his disobedience and contempt: and the Bishops of Durham, Rochester, and Peterborough, were appointed commissioners within the diocese of London, during the Bishop's suspension. Dr. Sharp was also suspended, but it was only for a few days.

This affair convinced all the world, that the court was resolved to silence all the Protestant ministers, to prevent their maintaining the Protestant religion in their sermons. It was also perceived, that the King was resolved to keep no more measures, since in a time of profound peace, he had formed a camp of fifteen thousand men upon Hounslow-Heath, under the command of the Earl of Feversham. In this camp was a public chapel, where mass was said every day.

Though the army had but very few popish officers and soldiers, it was feared, that the whole would be subservent to the King in the execution of his designs, in consequence of that blind obedience usually professed by an army. To obviate this danger, Samuel Johnson, a clergyman,* addressed a writing to the Protestant officers and soldiers of the army, wherein he laid before them the reasons which ought to prevent their being the instruments of the court, for the destruction of their religion, and the subversion of their government. This writing was too opposite to the King's design to escape unpunished. Wherefore the author being tried at the King's-Bench, was sentenced to stand three times in the pillory, to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn, and to pay a fine of five hundred marks. The sentence, after Johnson's solemn degradation, was executed with great rigour. But this writing made a strong impression upon the minds of both officers and soldiers, and very much promoted the great defection which happened two years after in the army.†

The King was not contented with acting openly in favour of his religion, but even privately used all possible endeavours to make proselytes. He succeeded with the Earl of Sunderland, who was willing to give him this proof of his devotion for him, though for some private reasons he refused to make a public abjuration. But he was not successful in his attempt upon his brother-in-law the Earl of Rochester. For though the Earl consented to be present at a conference held by the Divines of both religions, the dispute, it seems, only attached him more firmly to the Protestant religion. The King, mortified by his firmness, removed him from the Treasury, which was put in commission, but withal assigned him a yearly pension of five thousand pounds upon the Post-Office. The Earl of Clarendon his elder brother felt likewise the effects of the King's displeasure upon the same account. Being recalled from his government of Ireland before the time, he was deprived, about the end of the year, of the Privy-Seal, which was given to the Lord Arundel, a Papist.‡

At last, the King, in his zeal for the Popish religion, sent the Earl of Castlemain in embassy to the Pope, "To reconcile the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the Holy See, from which for more than an age they had fallen off by heresy." The ambassador was received at Rome with a coldness which gave the King a sensible mortification. Innocent XI. considered that embassy as too much precipitated, since the conversion of the three kingdoms was yet far from being finished, and therefore he resolved to be no actor in a farce which would only render him ridiculous. Besides, being then engaged in a quarrel with France, and not ignorant of the close union between Lewis IV. and James II. he was pleased with giving some mortification to Lewis, in the person of his friend and brother of England. Whenever he granted him an audience, his Holiness had a fit of coughing at command, which spoiled the ambassador's harangue, and obliged him to withdraw. This happened so often, that at last the Earl of Castlemain threatened to be gone. The Pope with his usual coldness sent him word, "That since he would be gone, he advised him to rise early in the morning, that he might rest himself at noon; for in those countries it was dangerous to travel in the heat of the day." At last, the King recalled him.

However, the ill success of this embassy discouraged not the King from pursuing his design. Not only all places vacant from preferments were conferred upon Papists, but, without any reason given, Protestants were deprived of their places to make room for Papists.

The Parliament, which, according to the last prorogation, was to meet the 15th of February, was farther prorogued to the 28th of April. Probably, the King found not things ripe enough, as he desired, to be assured of the concurrence of the Parliament in the execution of his designs. He chose rather to take another course, which to him seemed more short and easy, in communications, suspensions, deprivations, or other ecclesiastical censures; they were impowered to send for all statutes, rules, letters patent of universities, colleges, grammar schools, and all other ecclesiastical corporations, and the said statutes to correct, amend, and alter as they saw convenient, &c.

Many of the best lawyers thought this commission illegal, and contrary to the act passed in the 17th year of Charles I. for abolishing the high commission court. Others pretended, there was nothing in it contrary to that act. It seems, however, that the court was conscious of its illegality, since, though it was granted in April, it was not opened till August. Besides, the Archbishop would never act in it.

* The same who wrote the book called Julian the Apostate, which had given such offence to the Duke of York in the last reign, and drawn upon the author a severe prosecution.

† About the same time, the goldsmith, Miles Prance, who had been a witness against the persons tried for the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and had taken away three lives by his evidence, was tried upon an information exhibited against him for perjury, and sentenced to pay a fine of a hundred pounds, to stand three times in the pillory, and to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. But because he at first pleaded guilty, the whipping part of the sentence was remitted.

‡ John Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave, and Lord Chamberlain, being solicited by the priests to change his religion, he heard them gravely arguing for transubstantiation; and then told them, "He had taken much pains to bring himself to believe in God, who made the world and all men in it: but it must not be an ordinary force of argument, that could make him believe, that man was quits with God, and made God again."——Colonel Kirk was also spoken to, to change his religion, but he briskly replied, "He was pre-engaged, for he had promised the King of Morocco, that, if ever he changed his religion, he would turn Mahometan."

establishing liberty of conscience by his own authority. He was, doubtless, persuaded, that it would be more easy to obtain the consent of the Parliament to a thing already done, than the power to do it. But he thought proper to begin with Scotland, that the example of that kingdom might influence the English. For this purpose, he sent a proclamation into Scotland for an entire liberty of conscience, with orders to the privy-council to publish it. He excluded, however, out of his favour, the field conventiclers, whom he recommended to his council to prosecute with all the severity of the laws.

A. D. 1687.] The council of Scotland blindly obeyed the King, not only by publishing his proclamation, but even by thanking him for it, as for a signal favour.

The King, charmed with the ready compliance of the Scots, and considering it as a favourable precedent for England, summoned his council, and told them, "It was his intention to publish the like declaration in England. He grounded his resolution on his observing, that the endeavours to establish an uniformity in the four preceding reigns, had proved ineffectual, and been very prejudicial to the nation. That besides, it was his opinion, as most suitable to the principles of Christianity, 'That no man should be persecuted for conscience sake;' for he thought conscience could not be forced." The council, composed like that of Scotland, approved of this resolution, and magnified extremely the King's indulgence to his subjects. The declaration for liberty of conscience was therefore published the 4th of April.

Every one clearly saw, that his aim in this declaration was to establish the Popish religion, upon the ruins of the Protestant. However, addresses of thanks from the several sects, were presented to the King for his declaration. Some of these addresses, speaking of the royal power, carried it to the highest degree, because it was then advantageous to the non-conformists to maintain the authority by which they were freed from their constraint.

If there were non-conformists who thought themselves obliged to express their gratitude for the King's declaration, by flattering addresses, there were likewise Bishops who, with much less foundation, prevailed with their clergy to send addresses of thanks to the King, as for a signal favour to the church of England. Of this number were Crew, Bishop of Durham; Barlow, of Lincoln; Cartwright, of Chester; Wood, of Lichfield; and Watson, of St. David's. As for Parker, Bishop of Oxford, he was not so successful, since he could find but one clergyman in his whole diocese, who would sign such an address.*

The Parliament should have met the 28th of April; but the King, not finding things so ripe as he desired, had prorogued it to the 22d of November. In the mean time, he continued to take infinite pains to gain the members of Parliament. He closetted, one by one, all that were in London, and represented to them what he thought capable to convince them of the necessity to abolish the penal laws, for the good of the kingdom, and inforced his arguments with menaces and promises. It is not improbable, that some might be gained, but he could never be assured of a majority of voices. This determined him at last to dissolve the Parliament, by proclamation, the 2d of July.†

After the Parliament was dissolved, the King's grand affair was to have a new one entirely at his devotion. But he would not call one, till he was assured of having such members returned, as he should think proper. For this purpose, Quo Warrantos were issued against several corporations, to the end, that when they were deprived of their charters, the King might grant such new ones, as should render him master of the elections. It would be too tedious and difficult to relate all the King's secret methods, the emissaries he sent into the counties and corporations, the instructions he gave them to gain the people, the arguments, promises, and menaces they used. Nothing was forgotten which he thought would contribute to the procuring a favourable Parliament. Magistrates and Lord Lieutenants were displaced, but chiefly, particular men were closetted to engage them in the King's measures. It was also with this view that he made a progress through several counties, and stopped at the cities and great towns, to caress or intimidate the people. But he every where met with such coldness, or rather aversion to his designs, that he durst not venture to call a Parliament.

After sending, as we have seen, a solemn embassy to Rome, the King would have a nuntio in ordinary residing at his own court. The Pope had, the last year, nominated for this employment, Ferdinando Dadda, domestic prelate to his holiness, who had been about the King ever since his accession to the crown, and was the Queen's great favourite. He had been received as nuntio, but privately, and without the people's knowledge. But now the King having entirely pulled off the mask, was for honouring him with a public reception, though to assume the character of the Pope's nuntio was high treason. To give more lustre to the nuntio, he was first consecrated Archbishop of Amasia, in the royal chapel, after which, on the 3d of July, he made his public entry at Windsor, with great pomp and magnificence. It was a very surprising

* Scarcely any thing now remained, but to open the door in the church and universities to the intrusion of the Catholics; and it was not long before the King made this rash effort. Father Francis, a Benedictine, was recommended by the King's mandate to the university of Cambridge for the degree of master of arts; and as it was usual for the university to confer that degree on persons eminent for learning, without regard to their religion; and as they had even admitted lately the secretary to the ambassador of Morocco; the King on that account thought himself the better entitled to compliance. But the university considered, that there was a great difference between a compliment bestowed on foreigners, and degrees which give a title to vote in all the elections and statutes of the university, and which, if conferred on the Catholics, would infallibly in time render that sect entirely superior. They therefore refused to obey the King's mandate, and were cited to appear before the court of ecclesiastical commission. The vice-chancellor was suspended by that court; but as the university chose a man of spirit to succeed him, the King thought proper for the present to withdraw his pretensions. The attempt upon the university of Oxford was prosecuted with more inflexible obstinacy, and was attended with more important consequences. This university had lately, in their famous decree, made a solemn profession of passive obedience; and the court probably expected, that they would show their sincerity, when their turn came to practise that doctrine; which, though, if carried to the utmost extent, it be contrary both to reason and to nature, is apt to meet with more effectual opposition from the latter principle. The president of Magdalen college, one of the richest foundations in Europe, dying about this time, a mandate was sent in favour of Farmer, a new convert, but one who, besides his being a Catholic, had not, in other respects, the qualifications required by the statutes for enjoying that office. The fellows of the college made submissive applications to the King for recalling his mandate; but before they received an answer, the day came, on which, by their statutes, they were obliged to proceed to an election. They chose Dr. Hough, a man of virtue, as well as of the firmness and vigour requisite for maintaining his own rights and those of the university. In order to punish the college for this contumacy, as it was called, an inferior ecclesiastical commission was sent down, and the new president and the fellows were cited before it. So little regard had been paid to any consideration besides religion, that Farmer, on enquiry, was found guilty of the lowest and most scandalous vices; insomuch that even the ecclesiastical commissioners were ashamed to insist on his election. A new mandate, therefore, was issued in favour of Parker, lately created Bishop of Oxford, a man of a prostitute character, but who, like Farmer, atoned for all his vices by his avowed willingness to embrace the Catholic religion. The college represented, that all presidents had ever been appointed by election, and there were few instances of the King's interposing by his recommendation in favour of any candidate; that having already made a regular election of a president, they could not deprive him of his office, and, during his lifetime, substitute any other in his place; that, even if there were a vacancy, Parker, by the statutes of their founder, could not be chosen; that they had all of them bound themselves by oath to observe these statutes, and never on any account to accept of a dispensation; and that the college had at all times so much distinguished itself by its loyalty, that nothing but the most invincible necessity could now oblige them to oppose his Majesty's inclinations. All these reasons availed them nothing. The president and all the fellows, except two who complied, were expelled the college; and Parker was put in possession of the office.

† When the firmness of the members of this Parliament, as soon as they believed the interests of religion were at stake, is compared with their extreme zeal for the King in the beginning of their session, it must be inferred, that their compliance was owing purely to their mistake in their good opinion of the King, and that their firmness proceeded from their being at last undeceived. They are therefore unjustly accused, of intending to sacrifice to the King, the interest of religion and their country. They demonstrated the contrary, in resisting the temptations, the King laid before them, even in his presence, and face to face.

spectacle to Protestants, to see a nuntio from the Pope in his Pontificalibus, preceded by a cross bearer, and a train of priests and monks, in the habits of their respective orders. Meanwhile, on this very occasion the King received an unexpected mortification; for having ordered the Duke of Somerset to attend the nuntio to his audience, he desired his Majesty to excuse him from an office which the laws of the land made criminal. This so incensed the King, that he removed him from his places of gentleman of the bed chamber, and colonel of the dragoons. The Duke of Grafton, less scrupulous, accepted the office refused by the Duke of Somerset.

Though the King had given convincing proofs of his aversion to the Protestant religion, he favourably received the French Protestants, who took sanctuary in England on account of the rigours exercised against them in France. He not only granted them his protection, but also large sums, besides his licence to encourage a public collection.

We are now come to the year 1688, a critical year to England, the first half of which portended to the English the loss of their religion and liberties. James II. had promoted his great work in the three years he had been on the throne, with surprising rapidity and success. He had invested himself with an absolute power, that hardly suffered any contradiction. The laws of the land were openly violated. The privy council was almost wholly popish, and under the direction of a jesuit. The most considerable places in the court and kingdom were possessed by men of the same religion. The test and penal laws were insufficient fences to secure religion, for which they were intended. In a word, the King was resolved to complete his work at all events, and an army of fifteen thousand men, encamped within a few miles of London, besides the assistance of France, seemed to promise him success. But what was more extraordinary, was, that Protestant corporations, when their religion was so violently attacked, sent their addresses of thanks to the King, as for a great favour, publicly promising to chuse such members for the ensuing Parliament, as should concur with his measures. All this gave just occasion to fear, that no remedy could possibly be found for the miseries of the nation, which daily increased. The only refuge which seemed to be left, was the Princess of Orange, presumptive heir of the crown, who, like another Elizabeth, would restore things to their former state, when she should ascend the throne. But, besides that the King, who was but in his fifty-fifth year, might yet live a great while, an astonishing proclamation, published the 2d of January, to notify the Queen's being pregnant, and to order public thanksgiving to God, entirely destroyed the hopes which had been entertained.

The Papists were transported with this agreeable news. Some even began to debate the question, whether a daughter born since the King's advancement to the throne, ought not to take place of the Princess of Orange, born while he was Duke of York? But this question was very needless. Every one was persuaded, the Papists through hope, and the Protestants through fear, that the Queen would be delivered of a Prince. It is very certain, the Protestants from this time began to form suspicions about the Queen's pregnancy. This appeared in several pamphlets, dispersed through London, some of which were even dropped in Whitehall. Hitherto, the sole foundation of the suspicion, that the Queen's pregnancy was a cheat, consisted in her having been so many years childless. But this foundation was too weak to prove the certainty of an imposture. It was not impossible for the Queen to be pregnant; but on the other hand, neither was it impossible that the Queen should be willing to suppose an heir. The extreme zeal of the King and Queen, and of most of their counsellors and confidents, for their religion, rendered such a suspicion plausible to the Protestants. Histories have recorded instances of the like impostures, as in Spain, and in England itself, where it is pretended, that Queen Mary, to deprive her sister Elizabeth of the succession, would have supposed an heir, had not her husband King Philip prevented it. For this reason, the story of Queen Mary's sham conception, as delivered by Fox, was reprinted and dispersed through the kingdom, with this title, Idem Iterum, or Queen Mary's Big Belly. Another cause which contributed greatly to corroborate this suspicion, was the indiscretion of some jesuits, who published, that she would certainly be delivered of a Prince. They pretended, that this conception was miraculous, and the effect of a solemn petition, which the lately deceased Duchess of Modena had put up to heaven to the blessed Virgin Mary, or of a vow the Queen had made to our Lady of Loretto, with the present of a golden image, inriched with precious stones.

The Queen's pregnancy produced many congratulatory addresses. Some of these carried their compliments and flattery to the last excess.

Some time since, the Romish priests and jesuits had printed and dispersed a great number of controversial writings, which had been answered by Tillotson, Tennison, Stillingfleet, Sherlock, and others, in a manner which, in all appearance, was not agreeable to the Papists. The King fearing, without doubt, that his doctors would not be a match for the champions of the church of England, published a proclamation, grounded upon a statute made the 14th of Charles II. "Prohibiting the printing and selling all unlicensed and treasonable books and pamphlets, under the pains and penalties provided by the said act." Under this name were comprehended the controversial books published by the Protestants, on a pretence, that they encouraged and fomented animosities amongst his subjects.*

The King's grand design, was to repeal the test and penal laws, and for that purpose he wished to have a Parliament at his devotion. He had already abrogated these laws by his own authority, but he daily found, that this did not suffice to lead his subjects to the degree of compliance he desired. He thought therefore, if the consent of the Prince and Princess of Orange could be obtained, it would be a great step towards obtaining the same thing of the Parliament. To that end, he resolved to sound the inclinations of the Prince of Orange, without his appearing in it. He employed Mr. James Stewart,† Pensionary Fagel's acquaintance, who wrote to that minister, endeavouring to persuade him, that it was the interest of England, and of the Prince and Princess of Orange, that the test should be abrogated, and the laws against the Catholics repealed. This letter coming only from a private man, the Prince would not allow Mr. Fagel to return an answer. Mr. Stewart in vain renewed his instances for an answer, till at last, he was obliged to acquaint Mr. Fagel, that his first letter was written by the King's direction, who desired to have the opinion of the Prince and Princess upon the affair. This, joined to the false report propagated in London, that the Prince and Princess of Orange had given their consent to the abrogation of the test and penal laws, forced Mr. Fagel at last to answer Mr. Stewart, and let him know the sentiments of the Prince and Princess of Orange.

Mr. Fagel told Mr. Stewart, "That it was the opinion of the Prince and Princess, that no Christian ought to be punished for his conscience, or ill used because he differed from the established religion, and therefore could consent, that the Roman Catholics should enjoy a full liberty of conscience. That as to the non-conformists, their highnesses did not only consent, but heartily approved of their having an entire liberty of conscience, for the exercise of their religion, without any trouble, hindrance, or molestation on that score. ——But their high mightinesses could not by any means means agree to the repeal of the test, and those other penal laws, that tended to the security of the Protestant religion, since the Roman Catholics received no other prejudice from these, than their being excluded from Parliament and public employments; and that by them the Protestant religion is sheltered from all the designs of the Roman Catholics against it, or against the public safety."

* About this time it was, that in order to retain the poorer sort of people from letting their children be enticed into the Popish schools and seminaries erected in and about London, Charity Schools began to be set up in that great and noble city. The first schools of this kind were opened at Norton Falgate, and St. Margaret's, Westminster, on Lady Day, 1688.

This answer was supported with reasons so clear and solid, that Mr. Stewart, finding himself too weak for such an adversary, thought it more adviseable to deny all correspondence with Mr. Fagel on this subject, in order to destroy all the authority of Mr. Fagel's answer, which had been printed and dispersed through England and all Europe. The pensionary, provoked at this proceeding, sent a letter to the Marquis of Albyville, the English ambassador at the Hague, wherein he called him to witness, that the Prince and Princess of Orange had declared their thoughts to him concerning the penal laws, in the same manner as he had represented them; and that Albyville had acquainted the King with it long before he wrote his letter. He complained of the Earl of Sunderland, for having signed an allowance to print a pamphlet, which asserted, that the answer of Mr. Fagel to Mr. Stewart was suppositious, though he himself had seen the original, and knew that the King had also seen it. This last letter was also printed in French and English, and dispersed.

The refusal of the Prince and Princess of Orange to consent to the abrogation of the test and penal laws, served only to inflame the King's zeal, and oblige him to use fresh endeavours to have a Parliament at his devotion. He sent therefore, emissaries into the several counties, to try to secure the elections, before he ventured to call a Parliament. But the more solicitous he was to gain this point, the less inclination he found in the people, who, on so important an occasion, were unwilling to trust their interests with men devoted to the court, as the King desired. Wherefore the King, foreseeing all his artifices would prove unsuccessful, and that he should at last be obliged to use force, gave out commissions for raising new troops, for the increasing of his standing army; and likewise caused a larger fleet to be equipped. The new commissions were almost all given to Irish and Popish officers. Moreover, he wrote, the 17th of January, to the States General, to demand the six English and Scotch regiments that were in their service. The 2d of March he issued out a proclamaton, "Forbidding his natural born subjects to enter or list themselves in the service of any foreign Prince or state, either by sea or land."

The States did not think proper to send these regiments to the King in the present juncture. They returned a civil answer, and declared, that having examined their engagements, they could find no agreement or capitulation that could oblige them to grant his Majesty's demands, except when he was in war with some of his neighbours, or there was an insurrection at home. That they had accordingly sent the six regiments into England in the year 1685, at the time of the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion. But that now the King being in peace with his neighbours, and free from disturbances at home, they saw no reason that could oblige them to send back those troops. The King not satisfied with this answer, renewed his instances. But the States, in showing how these regiments were formed, and the treaties which had been made about them, insisted, that they were obliged to send them back only in the two cases above mentioned, and that the King was not at present in either. At last, after a third fruitless attempt, the King, by a proclamation, called home all his subjects which were in the service of the States General. Whereupon, the Prince of Orange offered passes to all the officers of the six regiments that were willing to return home, which about forty of them accepted.

Though the King had published last year a declaration, for an entire liberty of conscience to all his subjects, and, by virtue thereof, had filled almost all the offices with Catholics, he thought fit to publish a second upon the same subject, the 27th of April this year. Not satisfied with publishing it in the usual method, but thinking, without doubt, that, in so important an affair, extraordinary formalities were to be observed, he issued out an order of council, enjoining the Bishops to cause it to be sent and distributed throughout their several dioceses, to be read at the usual time of divine service, in all churches and chapels, on certain days named in the order.

Upon the receipt of this order, several Bishops, who were in London, assembled at the Archbishop's palace at Lambeth, to consult how they were to behave upon so nice an occasion. For they were necessarily, either in obeying the King, to approve, by their conduct, this violation of the laws, and betray the interests of the Protestant religion, or in refusing to obey, to draw upon themselves the penalties which, in all appearance, would be inflicted for their disobedience. The result of their conference was, that it was better to obey God than man, and their case being such, that they could not obey the King without betraying their own consciences, they ought without farther consideration to expose themselves to the approaching storm, rather than sacrifice the interests of God and the church. This resolution was grounded upon four considerations.

I. That many would justly judge the clergy either cowards or hypocritical time servers, in publishing what they thought illegal, and illegally sent to them.

II. That many who had votes for Parliament men would take this for the consent of the publishers, and be strengthened in the chusing such men as should be friends, not only to the indulgence, but to the foundation of it, the dispensing power.

III. That the world would have reason to take their publication for an approbation, because there could be no other intention in ordering it to be published, but to make the clergy parties to it.

IV. That after this they must expect farther things to be published by them, at which they must make a stand; and their making a stand when they had lost their reputation would be of no force.

Pursuant to this resolution, the consulting Bishops being seven, before they parted drew up a petition, and subscribing it, the same day, the 18th of May, six of them crossed the water to Whitehall to present it to the King, without acquainting any person with their design.*

The King, surprised and incensed at this petition, answered in a very angry tone: "I have heard of this

* Their names were, Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury; Lloyd, Bishop of St. Asaph; Kenn, of Bath and Wells; Turner, of Ely; Lake, of Chichester; White, of Peterborough; Trelawny, of Bristol. Their petition ran thus:

To the King's most excellent Majesty.

The humble petition of William, Archbishop of Canterbury, and divers of the suffragan Bishops of that province, now present with him, in behalf of themselves and other of their absent brethren, and of the inferior clergy of their respective dioceses.

Humbly sheweth,

"That the great averseness they find in themselves, to the distributing and publishing in all their churches, your Majesty's late declaration for liberty of conscience, proceeds neither from any want of duty and obedience to your Majesty, (our holy mother the church of England being, both in her principles and in her constant practice, unquestionably loyal, and having, to her great honour, been more than once, publicly acknowledged to be so by your gracious Majesty;) nor yet from any want of tenderness to dissenters, in relation to whom we are willing to come to such a temper, as shall be thought fit, when the matter shall be considered and settled in Parliament and convocation: but among many other considerations, from this especially, because that declaration is founded upon such a dispensing power, as hath been often declared illegal in Parliament, and particularly in the years 1662, and 1672, and in the beginning of your Majesty's reign; and is a matter of so great moment and consequence to the whole nation, both in church and state, that your petitioners cannot in prudence honour, or conscience, so far make themselves parties to it, as the distribution of it all over the nation, and the solemn publication of it once and again, even in God's house, and in the time of his divine service, must amount to, in common and reasonable construction. Your petitioners, therefore, most humbly and earnestly beseech your Majesty, that you will be pleased not to insist upon their distributing and reading your Majesty's said declaration; 'and your petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray, &c.'" before, but did not believe it: I did not expect this from the church of England, especially from some of you. If I change my mind, you shall hear from me; if not, I expect my command shall be obeyed." The Bishops replied, "We resign ourselves to the will of God;" and then immediately retired.

The Bishops of Durham and Rochester, both ecclesiastical commissioners, and two others, caused the declaration to be read in their dioceses. But it generally happened, wherever it was read, that the congregation immediately left the church. One minister, before he began to read it, told his flock, "That he could not refuse the order sent him to read the declaration, but that he knew no order which obliged them to hear it." In London it was read but in four or five churches.

The court was unresolved what course to take with the Bishops. Though the King's council persuaded him to do all things with a high hand, they trembled when they met with any opposition, seeing the great disproportion between the number of Protestants and Papists. They considered, that prudence required the King carefully to avoid what might produce a sudden revolution, and not to enter upon violent measures, till he had taken greater precautions. He was however, resolved to proceed with the utmost rigour against the Bishops, and for that purpose they were summoned to appear before the council the 8th of June.

On their appearance, they were asked, Whether they owned the Petition? The Bishops, surprized at this question, feared some snare was laid for them, and therefore at first forbore to give a direct answer. At last, the Archbishop confessed, that it was written with his own hand, and that the rest had signed it; adding withal, they had done nothing but what they were ready to justify. The chancellor endeavoured to make them sensible of the ill consequences of their disobedience, which tended to diminish the King's authority, and to disturb the peace of the kingdom. At last, he asked them, whether they would give their recognizances to appear before the court of King's Bench to answer this high misdemeanour? This they all refused, insisting on the privilege of their Peerage, which they were resolved to maintain, as well as the rights of the church, being equally bound by their callings to oppose all innovations both in government and religion. The Chancellor, surprised at their constancy, threatened to send them to the Tower, and to prosecute them to the utmost rigour of the law, unless they immediately recanted, and withdrew their petition. They unanimously answered, that they were ready to go wherever his Majesty was pleased to send them; that they hoped the King of Kings would be their protector and their judge; that they feared nothing from men; and that having acted according to law and their own consciences, no punishments should ever be able to shake their resolutions.

Upon this answer, eighteen privy-counsellors, several of them Papists, were for sending the Bishops to the Tower. A warrant was immediately drawn and signed for their commitment, the reason being given, "For contriving, making, and publishing a seditious libel against his Majesty and his government." It was not thought proper to send them to the Tower through London, for fear it might occasion a tumult. They were therefore in the most private manner conveyed by water. But people hearing of it, flocked in multitudes to the river side, and upon their knees desired their blessing, with loud acclamations extolling their constancy. The same spectacle was seen at the Tower, where the soldiers of the garrison fell on their knees to beg their blessing. This was a great mortification to the King, and might have convinced him, that he was yet very far from his aim.

Two days after the Bishops had been sent to the Tower, the 10th of June, the Queen was delivered of a Prince, who, during the life of his father was known by the name of the Prince of Wales, and afterwards, by some was called the Pretender. His birth was an occasion of triumph to the Papists, but of astonishment and terror to the Protestants, who saw their hopes defeated, that their misfortunes would end with the death of the King. The birth of this Prince was very much suspected, and many did then, and still do, believe it supposititious. Multitudes of papers were published for and against, some containing the grounds of the suspicions, and others, arguments to remove them. It is very certain, the Queen, during the whole time of her pregnancy, was suspected of a design to impose an heir upon the kingdom, and this suspicion was very public. It is also certain, that though the King and Queen knew of this suspicion, they took no care to remove it. On the contrary, their whole conduct, as well during the Queen's pregnancy, as her labour, gave still greater strength to the suspicion. For, a negligence which signifies nothing when there is no suspicion, must be remarked when an imposture is suspected.*

Thus much is certain, that most Protestants believed the Prince of Wales supposititious, chiefly because it would have been very disadvantageous to them, that James II. should have had a Popish successor. The Papists, on the contrary, questioned not this Prince's birth, because nothing could be more serviceable to their religion. There were few, probably, either Papists or Protestants, but what were determined on this point, by their prejudices. But things taking an unexpected turn, the truth or falsity of this Prince's birth produced none of the effects which were hoped or feared.

The assurance of a Popish successor, made the King hope, he should more easily accomplish his designs. But he wished, above all things, for the concurrence of a Parliament. It was with this view, that closetings were once more put in practice. He closetted such as he intended to gain. Promises and menaces were employed, and those who refused to serve the King in his own way, as the word was, might assure themselves of his heaviest displeasure.

However, he neglected not more effectual means to force his subjects to compliance. He ordered some entire regiments out of Ireland, and filled many vacancies in his English regiments, with Irish and Popish officers. This gave so great a disgust to the whole army, that lampoons and ballads were vented upon the Irish, who were mortally hated by the English, especially since the massacre in 1641.

During the public rejoicings for the birth of the Prince of Wales, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the other six Bishops, prisoners in the Tower, were brought to their trials at the King's Bench bar the 15th of June. But upon their motion for a delay, the trial was put off to the 29th of the same month, and in the

* There were three opinions concerning the real or pretended birth of the Prince of Wales: first, that the Queen was not pregnant when she pretended to be so, and that at the time of her pretended delivery, a son was supposed as being born of her. Second, that she was really pregnant, but that having the misfortune of a miscarriage, she continued still to feign herself big, and at last supposed, or caused to be supposed, a child as born of her body, and that this child dying shortly after, another was substituted in his room, and to this, dying seven weeks after, succeeded another child. Third, that the Queen was really pregnant and delivered the 10th of June of a son, the same who was afterward called the Pretender. In confirmation of the first of these opinions it was alledged: that the King, for certain reasons, was become incapable of children; that the Queen had been seven years without being pregnant; that her delivery was sudden, and immediately after the removing of her lodgings; that it was on a Sunday morning, when all the Protestant court-ladies were at church; that neither the Princess Anne of Denmark, the Archbishop of Canterbury, nor the Dutch Ambassador, were present at her labour, though they were the three persons who ought principally to have been there; that during the labour, her bed was not left so open as it should have been; that while she was pregnant she never satisfied the Princess Anne, and many Protestant Ladies about her, of the fact; that during her labour, a warming-pan was brought into the room, though the weather was extremely hot, and the room heated by a vast crowd of people; lastly, it was alledged, that though the King, Queen and courtiers, sufficiently knew before the delivery, that the nation suspected an imposture, they did not use those precautions as they might and ought to have done in such case; and, instead of putting it beyond all possibility of doubt, they left so many marks of suspicion, as caused infinite doubts and suspicions: insomuch that some Roman Catholics themselves owned, "That so important an affair had been managed with great supineness and imprudence." Notwithstanding all this, time appears to have admitted, by common consent, as it were, the legitimacy of the birth.

meantime

mean time they were set at liberty upon their own recognizance. The 29th of June, Westminster Hall was crowded with great numbers of Lords, Gentlemen, and others, to be spectators of this famous trial. The King's counsel pleaded, that the petition presented by the Bishops was a real and seditious libel, tending to diminish the King's prerogative, and excite sedition amongst the people. The counsel for the Bishops, on the other side, retorted the arguments of their adversaries with great force and freedom, proving, that the King having no power to dispense with penal laws, a petition humbly presented to remonstrate to him that he had no such power, ought not to be esteemed a libel: that it was injurious to the Bishops, to accuse them of having published a petition, which they had respectfully presented to the King in private, and alone: that the occasion of presenting it was not sought by them, but pressed upon them: nor could it be called a libel, because the intent was innocent, and they kept within the bounds set by act of Parliament. After long pleadings on both sides, the judges, in giving directions to the jury, were not unanimous.

The jury withdrawing sat up all night. The next morning the court being assembled, and the Hall filled with infinite crowds of people, the jury pronounced the Bishops not guilty. Immediately shouts of joy were heard through the crowd, and the loudest acclamations resounded through the cities of Westminster and London. For several hours, nothing was heard but repeated shouts of both cities, transported with the news of the Bishops' acquittal. Nor was this all. For the King having gone that morning to the army on Hounslow-Heath, and dining in the Earl of Feversham's tent, the news flew to the camp, where the whole army shouted so loud, that it startled the King, and his whole company. The Earl of Feversham being sent out to know what was the matter, immediately returned, and told the King, "It was nothing but the shouts of the soldiers upon the news of the Bishops being acquitted." Do you call that nothing? said the King; "But so much the worse for them." Notwithstanding the resentment expresed by the King, and his severe prohibitions against all riotous assemblies, the whole city was that night illuminated, and numberless bonfires proclaimed the general joy. This was followed by almost all the great towns in the kingdom, and at Norwich particularly the joy was excessive. This was a sensible mortification to the King. He at first threatened to deliver the Bishops to the ecclesiastical commissioners, and to shew his indignation, he dismissed Sir Richard Holloway and Sir John Powell, two of the judges and filled their places with others.

The King, perceiving the people's disposition was not favourable to him, resolved at last to come to open force. But as he could only make use of his army, he was willing first to try how far he might depend on their obedience. For this purpose, he thought fit to communicate his design to every regiment singly, not doubting, that if two or three submitted, the rest would follow their example. Accordingly, the major of the Lord Litchfield's regiment was ordered to tell the officers and soldiers, that those who were unwilling to contribute to the repeal of the test and penal laws, should lay down their arms. But it was with the utmost astonishment that he saw the whole regiment, two captains and a few Popish soldiers excepted, instantly lay down their arms. He remained for sometime, speechless, but at last recovering his surprise, he commanded the soldiers "To take up their arms again," and sullenly told them, "That for the future he would not do them the honour to ask their advice."

It was now easy to foresee, that with a Protestant army he should never be able to introduce Popery. Wherefore he resolved to cashier many Protestant officers and soldiers, and to put Papists in their room. Accordingly he began with some regiments; but it gave a disgust to the whole army. Shortly after, resolving to put thirty Irish soldiers into the Duke of Berwick's regiment, Lieutenant Colonel Beaumont, and other officers, remonstrated to the Duke, "That neither those gentlemen nor himself thought it consistent with their honours, to have foreigners imposed upon them, ——and therefore humbly petitioned, that they might have leave to fill up their companies with such men of their own nation, as they should judge most suitable to the King's service; or otherwise, that they might be permitted, with all imaginable duty and respect, to lay down their commissions." An account of this being transmitted to the King, he immediately ordered the Lieutenant Colonel, and five Captains, to be taken into custody, and tried by a court-martial as mutineers. It was at first believed, that his intention was to cause them to be condemned to die, but some news from abroad altered the sentence, and they were only cashiered. The fleet was no better disposed than the army to assist the King in his designs. This appeared, in that Vice-Admiral Strickland ordering mass to be said on board his ship, there arose such a mutiny and disorder amongst the sailors, that the officers could hardly save the priest from being thrown over board.

The King's situation was such, that it seemed he could neither advance, nor recede. The resolution, however, taken by him and his council was not to be shaken by any obstacles. Though the seven Bishops had been acquitted of the pretended crime laid to their charge, the new ecclesiastical court did not think itself bound by that precedent. Wherefore, the commissioners, by an order made the 12th of July, "Commanded all chancellors, archdeacons, commissaries, and officials, to enquire in what churches and chapels his Majesty's declaration was read, and to transmit an account thereof upon the 16th day of August next." But the greatest part of those to whom the order was directed never took any notice of it. The commissioners being met on that day, were not a little puzzled how to proceed. At last, after a long consultation, they were contented to renew their first order, "Requiring all persons having ecclesiastical jurisdiction, to transmit to them upon the 6th day of December next, an account of the enquiry they are hereby commanded to make in their visitations, together with the names of the parsons, rectors, vicars, and curates, that had either obeyed, or disobeyed his Majesty's command."*

Such being the situation of affairs, several church of England men, both of the clergy and laity, thought it time to take measures for stopping the King's progress, and bounding his power. Though they had themselves carried it very high, they chose rather to retract, than, by their obstinacy, to throw the church and state into imminent danger, in continuing to maintain a doctrine which could justly be considered as the principal fountain of the kingdom's calamities.

The first and most necessary precaution taken by them, was to form a strict union between the church of England and the non-conformists, for their common security. This union was become more easy than ever. The two parties agreed, that their division had been the sole cause of their ruin. The churchmen acknowledged, they had carried passive obedience too far, and that it had produced ill effects. They showed a readiness to comply with the scruples of the Presbyterians, in relinquishing the ceremonies which might be considered as indifferent, or at least to leave every man at liberty to practise, or not practise them. This was all the Presbyterians could reasonably expect. In short, as the churchmen appeared touched with the calamities occasioned by their excessive rigour, so they seemed disposed to more condescension, if things were restored to their former state. The Presbyterians, who had hitherto groundlessly accused the church of England of leaning to Popery, could not forbear acknowledging their error, after the firmness of the seven Bishops had discovered the injustice of that accusation, These dispositions being well managed by prudent and well-meaning men of both parties, produced at last an uniformity of sentiments, with regard to the principal point in question, namely, that it was absolutely necessary to think of means for the preservation of religion and the state, from the impending danger. In a word, without the King's knowledge, the Whigs and Tories were reconciled, and resolved to labour jointly for the preservation of their country.

* Dr. Sprat, Bishop of Rochester, one of the Bishops of the new ecclesiastical court, now thought it time to withdraw. Wherefore he wrote to his colleagues a letter, wherein he told them: "That since their Lordships were resolved to proceed against those, who had not complied with the King's command in reading his declaration, it was absolutely impossible for him to serve his Majesty any longer in that commission." He proceeds farther and says, "that though I myself did submit in that particular, yet I will never be any ways instrumental in punishing those my brethren who did not: for, as I call God to witness, that what I did was merely upon a principle of conscience, so I am fully satisfied, that their forbearance was upon the same principle."

They saw no expedient more proper, than to put the Prince of Orange at the head of the party against the King. That Prince was so interested in the affair, that it was not doubted, he would contribute whatever lay in his power, both to save England, and secure the succession to the Princess his wife, lately defeated of her right by a Prince, who generally passed for supposititious. These were very powerful motives to actuate the Prince of Orange. But there was still another, which was naturally to have a great effect upon him; namely, the extreme danger to which Holland would be exposed, in case the King accomplished his design, by reason of the close union between the Kings of England and France. It was with this view that several great men timely repaired to the Hague, on divers pretences, to confer with the Prince of Orange. The first were, Mr. Sidney, brother to Algernon Sidney, (beheaded in the last reign) afterwards Earl of Rumney, Sir Robert Peyton, Sir Rowland Gwin, Dr. Burnet, and others. It is to be presumed, that assurances were transmitted from them to their friends in England, of the good inclination of the Prince to the common cause. In July, one Joseph Flight brought over into England about fourscore letters from persons of quality and credit, and carried back answers to the Hague. The affair being thus begun, the old Lord Wharton pretending a journey into Germany, passed through the Hague. Colonel Sidney, uncle to the Earl of Sunderland, went to the Spaw, on pretence of only drinking the waters. The Lord Dunblain, son to the Earl of Danby, and commander of an independent frigate, crossed and re-crossed the seas, to carry several dispatches and resolutions. The Earl of Shrewsbury mortgaged his estate for forty thousand pounds, and went over to the Prince to offer him both his purse and his sword. He was quickly followed by Admiral Herbert, his cousin Mr. Herbert, Mr. Russel, the Lord Mordaunt, and the Earl of Wiltshire. The principal persons with whom they held correspondence in England, were, the Earls of Danby, Devonshire, and Dorset, the Lords Lovelace and Delamere, the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquis of Hallifax, his son the Lord Eland, the Marquis of Winchester, his son the Lord Pawlet, the Lord Willoughby son to the Earl of Lindsey, Mr. Lester, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Powle, and many others, besides several eminent citizens of London.*

The Prince of Orange being fully determined to head the party, it was, after several consultations, resolved, that the English Lords at the Hague should demand assistance of the States, in the name of all England. There was no need of many arguments to prevail with the States. The difference at that time, about the election of an Archbishop of Cologne, between Prince Clement of Bavaria, and the Cardinal of Furstemburg, furnished the States with a pretence to assemble an army near Nimeguen. On the other hand, the Prince of Orange, by his intrigues, prevailed to have the direction of affairs then on the carpet, committed to the management of three or four members of the States, on pretence of the correspondents the Count d'Avaux, the French ambassador, had in Holland, who might inform him of their resolutions. These commissioners, all in the Prince of Orange's confidence, under colour of the Cologne affair, gave orders for encamping an army, and preparing a fleet. At last, the Prince of Orange, on pretence of providing for a war against France, which seemed to be near, had an interview at Minden in Westphalia, with the electors of Saxony, and Brandenburgh, the Princes of the house of Lunenburg, and the Land-Grave of Hesse Cassel, and secured their assistance, in case France should attack Holland or the Low-Countries, while he was engaged in the English expedition. All this was transacted with such secrecy, that the ambassadors of France and England, at the Hague, could get no certain intelligence. They were forced to recur to conjectures, though the first had usually been informed of the resolutions of the States, as soon as they were taken.

When the Prince of Orange had secured to the States, in case of need, the assistance of these Princes, he concerted his expedition with such prudence and secrecy, that his scheme was not known till after the execution; namely, that the States, under colour of being ready to support the election of the Prince of Bavaria, should form a camp on the heath near Nimeguen, a place too remote from the sea, to give any suspicion that these troops were designed for an imbarkment: that a fleet of fifty men of war should be prepared, with a sufficient number of transports, for the embarkation of twelve or thirteen thousand men: that, to prevent the alarm which these transports might give, the merchants of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and other maritime places, should freight as many as they could on divers pretences: that these ships should repair to several ports, at a time assigned, to take the forces aboard, and afterwards to Goree, where the men of war should expect them: that the Prince of Orange should put himself on board this fleet, and at his landing in England, the English persons of quality, by whom he was invited, should disperse themselves into divers parts of the kingdom, to excite insurrections, and levy troops, while the Prince, with his little army, should make head against the King. It was not doubted, but the Prince's army would considerably increase when he should be in England, and the people in general be ready to second the efforts of those, who were labouring for their deliverance. This whole scheme was executed in the manner it had been resolved, without the ambassadors of England and France being able to learn any thing certain. They conjectured, however, by the naval preparations, that something was secretly contriving against England. Indeed it was difficult to prepare four or five hundred transports, and fifty men of war so privately, that they should have no intelligence from their spies. The Count D'Avaux failed not to send his conjectures to the court of France, which were immediately transmitted to England. Moreover, Mr. Skelton, King James's envoy at the Hague, had before informed him of an intercepted letter, which intimated, that a great project was secretly carrying on against him. But the King was then so secure of success, that he neglected this intelligence, believing it only an artifice to divert him from his designs.

Meanwhile, as the armament in Holland could hardly be concealed any longer, and the King receiving repeated advices of it, he judged it convenient, to flatter the people with the expectation of a Parliament. So, on the 24th of August, he declared in council his intention to call a Parliament for the 27th of November, and the chancellor had orders to issue out the writs the 5th of September.

The next day, M. de Bonrepos arrived at London from Paris, and had several conferences with the King. It is pretended, that he offered him from the King of France a fleet, and an army of thirty thousand men, but that the Earl of Sunderland prevented the offer from being accepted. He is said to have represented to the King, "That it would be very dangerous to introduce a foreign army into England, at the very time he was preparing to hold a Parliament: that he would entirely lose the hearts of his subjects, and even of those who were most devoted to him: that if the French should have a mind to render themselves masters of the kingdom, he would find but very few who would join to deliver him from such troublesome guests, and that in accepting so powerful an aid, he would quickly become only a viceroy to Lewis XIV." However, the King refused the aid, because he thought it unnecessary, and yet, it is pretended, that he made at this very time a new alliance with Lewis, but which was never published.*

In the meantime, the King hearing from several parts, that an armament was making in Holland, ordered the Marquis of Albyville, his ambassador, to present a memorial to the States, to demand what they meant by their warlike preparations, especially by sea, at that time of the year. The States answered, that they armed in imitation of his Britannic Majesty, and might with more reason demand an explanation about the alliance into which he was lately entered. This answer increasing the King's suspicions, he now began to take the necessary measures for putting himself in a posture of defence. With this view, he gave the governments of Portsmouth and Hull, the two keys of the kingdom, to Papists, and took care to have the majority of the officers and soldiers of these garrisons of that religion.

After all, he could not yet believe, the Prince of Orange would venture to attack him. The court of France could not conceive the cause of so strange an indolence; nor was Skelton less puzzled to answer the question so often asked, why the King his master refused the assistance of France. At last, in a conference with Monsieur de Croissy upon this subject, he told him, it was his private opinion, that if France would threaten to attack the States General, in case any thing was attempted by them against the King of England, such a declaration would break all the Prince of Orange's measures. The court of France approving of this proposal, the Count D'Avaux presented a memorial to the States the 30th of August, declaring: "That all circumstances inclined the King, his master, to believe with reason, that the arming in Holland threatened England, therefore his Majesty had commanded him to declare to them, on his part,——'That the ties of friendship and alliance between him and the King of Great Britain, would oblige him not only to assist him, but also to look on the first act of hostility that should be committed by their troops or their fleet, against his Majesty of Great Britain, to be a manifest rupture of the peace, and a breach with his crown."——The States, after an ambiguous answer to this memorial, demanded of the Marquis of Albyville, the meaning of the new alliance between the two Kings. The same demand was made to the court of England by the States ambassador, Van Citters, to whom they sent a copy of the memorial. Whereupon the King summoned a council, and by the Earl of Sunderland's means it was resolved, to disown the proceedings of the Count D'Avaux. Moreover, Skelton was recalled, and immediately sent to the Tower.

Though the King had ordered writs to be issued out for a new Parliament, the order had not been executed. In the meantime, having received so many concurring advices of the Prince of Orange's designs, he gave out commissions for augmenting his forces, and sent for some regiments out of Ireland. He also ordered the fleet to be equipped with all expedition. Monsieur Barillon, the French ambassador, proposed, that the King his master should be desired to abandon the siege of Philipsburg, undertaken by the Dauphin, and carry the war into Holland. This proposal was approved by several of the council, but opposed by others, on pretence that such a proceeding would alienate the minds of all the English Protestants from the King. This reason prevailed the more easily, as the Prince of Orange's friends had spread a report, that the armament of Holland was only designed to prevent the French from landing in England.

At last, the King appointed the Earl of Feversham to command his army, after that post had been declined by the Count de Roye. The command of the fleet was given to the Lord Dartmouth. As the King was not ignorant how prejudicial to him was the report of his strict alliance with Lewis XIV. he used his utmost endeavours to stifle it. For this purpose, he ordered the Marquis of Albyville to present a memorial to the States, to assure them from him, that there was no other treaty between him and France than those that were public. He moreover ordered the States to take such measures with them, as might best serve to maintain the peace of Nimeguen, and the twenty years' truce concluded in 1684. But the States took no notice of this memorial. On the contrary, the pensionary of Holland frankly owned to the Marquis of Albyville, that the Prince of Orange being invited by the English nobility, was preparing to carry them assistance for restoring the government to its ancient state, the King having entirely changed it since his accession to the crown.

The King now began to see the great disproportion between the number of the Protestants, and that of the Papists, and consequently the small hopes of being supported by the latter. In these melancholy thoughts, he believed his best refuge was to recover the church of England to his interest. He still reckoned, she was unshaken in her principle of passive obedience, and that by giving her some satisfaction, he should secure her allegiance, after which he should have no farther cause to fear the efforts of the Prince of Orange. To this end he sent for the Bishops that were then in London, namely, Winchester, Chichester, Peterborough, Rochester, Ely, and Bath and Wells, and told them, that he desired their advice in the present conjuncture. He assured them of his readiness to do whatever should be thought necessary for the security of the Protestant religion and the liberties of his subjects, without derogating from his own prerogative. He concluded with saying, this affair required a mature examination, and therefore prayed them to consult together, in order to give him their advice. The Bishops withdrew, and immediately repaired to Lambeth, to form with the Archbishop (then indisposed) a plan of what they were to counsel the King.

The 28th of September, the King published a proclamation to inform his subjects, "That his Majesty had received undoubted advice, that a great and sudden invasion from Holland with an armed force of foreigners, would speedily be made in a hostile manner upon this kingdom: and although some false pretences, relating to liberty, property, and religion, contrived and worded with art and subtlety, might be given out, it was manifest, however, that no less matter by this invasion was proposed, 'than an absolute conquest of these his Majesty's kingdoms, and the utter subduing and subjecting them, and all his people, to a foreign power,' which was promoted by some of his subjects, being persons of wicked and restless spirits, implacable malice, and desperate designs; who, having no sense of the misery of former intestine divisions, nor being moved by his Majesty's reiterated acts of grace and mercy, did again endeavour to embroil this kingdom in blood and ruin, to gratify their own ambition and malice, proposing to themselves a prey and booty in such a public confusion. That though his Majesty had notice, that a foreign force was preparing against him, yet he had always declined any foreign succours, but rather had chosen to rely upon the true and ancient courage, faith and allegiance of his own people, with whom he had often ventured his life for the honour of this nation, and in whose defence against all enemies, he was firmly resolved to live and die; and therefore his Majesty solemnly conjured his subjects to lay aside all animosities, jealousies, and prejudices, and heartily and cheerfully to unite together, in the defence of him and their native country.——That albeit the design had been carried on with all imaginable secrecy, and endeavours to surprise and deceive his Majesty, yet he had not been wanting on his part, to make such provisions as did become him, and made no doubt of being found in so good a posture, that his enemies might have cause to repent their rash and unjust attempts." In the conclusion, his Majesty declared, "That he did intend to have met his Parliament in November next, and that the writs were issued forth accordingly, proposing to himself, amongst other things, that he might be able to quiet the minds of all his people in matters of religion, but that in regard of this strange attempt, designed to divert his said gracious purposes, he found it necessary to recall his foresaid writs, &c."

Though the King pretended an entire reliance on the allegiance of his subjects, he knew he had given them too much cause of discontent, to be assured of their affection. Wherefore, he thought it necessary to give them other proofs of his sincerity, than bare words. To this end, he took off the Bishop of London's suspension, and appointed Sir John Chapman, a churchman, to succeed Sir John Eyles, the present Lord Mayor of London, who was an anabaptist. Moreover, being informed that the Bishops would advise him to restore the city charter, he sent for the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, and told them, "That he resolved to restore to them their ancient charter and privileges, and put them into the same condition they were in at the time of the judgment pronounced against them, upon the Quo Warranto." The same day, the 2d of October, he published a general pardon by proclamation, out of which were excepted, Robert Parsons, Edward Matthews, Samuel Venner, Andrew Fletcher, Colonel John Rumsey, Major John Manley, Isaac Manley, Francis Charleton, John Wildman, Titus Oates, Robert Ferguson, Gilbert Burnet, Sir Robert Peyton, Laurence Braddon, Samuel Johnson, Thomas Tipping, and Sir Rowland Gwyn. But all this was not capable to satisfy the people, who aspired to a more ample, and more certain deliverance.

The day after, the 3d of October, the Archbishop of Canterbury, attended by eight Bishops, repaired to Whitehall, and was admitted to immediate audience. After a short speech, he presented to the King the result of their conferences drawn up in ten articles, which were so many advices, and withal, reproaches upon his past government.

The King perceiving that a refusal to comply with the advice of the Bishops, would only increase the people's jealousy, resolved, though probably with regret, to redress most of the grievances complained of. For this purpose, two days after, the commission for ecclesiastical causes was dissolved. The next day, the Lord Chancellor had orders to carry back in person the charter of London. The Lord Lieutenants of the several counties were required to inform themselves of the abuses and irregularities committed in the late regulations of corporations, in order to redress the same. The Bishop of Winchester, visitor of Magdalen college in Oxford, was ordered to settle that society regularly, and according to their statutes. A proclamation was issued, for restoring corporations to their ancient charters, liberties, rights, and franchises. The Lord Lieutenants were displaced in several counties. Popish justices of the peace, mayors, recorders, and other magistrates, were removed, and Protestants put in their places. Thus in the space of about twelve days, that formidable fabric was in effect, or in a great measure demolished, which the Romish Cabal had spent near four years in erecting.

But all these proceedings were not capable to restore the King to the confidence of his subjects, because they came too late, and seemed rather the effect of necessity than inclination.

As all his hope was placed in his army, he applied himself, as far as lay in his power, to augment and strengthen it with troops, which should wholly depend on him. In obedience to orders already given, two thousand five hundred men landed at Chester from Ireland, and three thousand Scots were advanced to Carlisle. Besides this, new commissions were granted for levying ten regiments of horse and foot, not to mention several independent companies. All the militia had orders to be in readiness to march. Lastly, a proclamation was published, commanding all horses, oxen, and cattle, to be driven and removed to the space at least of twenty miles, from the places where the enemy should attempt to land.

In the meantime, the populace of London growing insolent, by the hopes of the Prince's coming, began to insult the Popish chapels; wherefore the King ordered them to be shut up, for fear of an insurrection in so dangerous a juncture. On the other hand, many Romish priests and jesuits, perceiving the gathering storm, and presaging nothing good from the disposition of the people, and the court's consternation, began gradually to disappear, and to consult their own safety by a timely retreat into foreign parts.

In the midst of all these distractions, the King caused the Prince of Wales to be solemnly baptized; the Pope, represented by his nuntio, being godfather, and the Queen-Dowager godmother. Father Saben officiated, and named him James Francis Edward.

At the same time the court received a pamphlet, published in Holland, and intituled, "A memorial of the English Protestants, presented to their Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Orange." It was ascribed to Dr. Burnet or Major Wildman, wherein, after a long narrative of the grievances of the nation, the author complained of King James's obliging his subjects to own a suppositious child for the Prince of Wales, adding, "That his Majesty would never suffer the witnesses that were present at the Queen's delivery to be heard and examined." The King was no stranger to the suspicions entertained by the people on this account, but hitherto had pretended to be ignorant of, or at least to despise them. He perceived, however, that on this occasion, he could not, without great prejudice to himself, help answering so public a challenge. He therefore held an extraordinary council the 22d of October, to which were called the Queen-Dowager, all the Lords spiritual and temporal then in town; the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, the judges, and several of his Majesty's learned council. All these being assembled, the King told them, "He had called them together upon a very extraordinary occasion; but that extraordinary diseases must have extraordinary remedies: that the malicious endeavours of his enemies had so poisoned the minds of some of his subjects, that by the reports he had from all hands, he had reason to believe, that very many did not think this son, with which God had blessed him, to be his, but a supposed child. But, he might say, that by a particular providence, scarcely any Prince was ever born, where there were so many persons present. That he had taken this time to have the matter heard and examined there, expecting that the Prince of Orange, with the first easterly wind, would invade this kingdom: and as he had often ventured his life for the nation before he came to the crown, so he thought himself more obliged so to do now he was King, and did intend to go in person against him, whereby he might be exposed to accidents; and therefore he thought it necessary to have this now done, in order to satisfy the minds of his subjects, and to prevent the kingdom's being engaged in blood and confusion after his death: that he had desired the Queen-Dowager to give herself the trouble to come hither, to declare what she knew of the birth of his son; and that most of the Ladies, Lords, and other persons who were present, were ready to depose upon oath their knowledge of the matter."

After this speech, depositions were taken, first of the Queen-Dowager, who only said, "That she was in the room when the Queen was delivered," without any thing more positive or particular. After her followed forty witnesses, of which seventeen were Papists, and it was begun with proving, that the Queen was brought to bed while many persons were in the room. To this tended the testimonies of the eighteen Lords who accompanied the King thither. This proof signified nothing, or was very ambiguous. It was well known, there were a great many persons in the room at the time the Queen was said to be delivered; which doubtless, was all that was meant by this proof. But it was not sufficient to prove the reality of the delivery; and, as no man in the council durst put any questions to the witnesses, concerning several circumstances, these general depositions were incapable to remove all suspicions. Upon the whole, the suspicion of an imposture was so deeply rooted in the minds of most of the English, that it was rather confirmed than removed by this examination.

The 28th of October, the Earl of Sunderland was suddenly removed from his places of president of the council, and principal secretary of state. It is believed, that his neglect of Skelton's letters to him, was the principal cause of his disgrace.

As the Prince of Orange was expected with the first easterly wind, some of the most devoted to the King during his prosperity, thought proper to secure themselves by letters of pardon for their illegal actions. Amongst these were Chancellor Jefferies, Sir Nicholas Butler, the Bishop of Chester, the Bishop of Durham, and about twenty more, to whom the King readily granted the favour they desired.

While these things were transacting in England, the necessary dispositions were making in Holland for the assistance of the English. For it was upon this footing that the States lent their troops to the Prince of Orange; and what the King called in England an invasion, in Holland was termed, "A brotherly assistance lent by the States and the Prince to the distressed English." It can hardly be thought, that the Prince of Orange, with an army of thirteen or fourteen thousand men, would have undertaken a descent into England, had he not been assured of a favourable reception from the generality of the people. But as it was necessary to remove the suspicion fomented by the King, that the Prince was coming to conquer and subdue England, he thought proper, in a declaration, to show the true motives of his undertaking.*

Every thing being ready for the projected expedition, the Prince of Orange went into the assembly of the States-General the 16th of October, to take a solemn leave of them. This was done in so tender and moving a manner, that both himself and the States melted into tears. He embarked the 19th of October, in a frigate of about thirty guns. The fleet consisted of fifty men of war, twenty-five frigates, as many fire ships, with near four hundred victuallers, and other vessels, for the transportation of above four thousand horse, and ten thousand foot. The most considerable of the English, who accompanied the Prince, were, the Earls of Shrewsbury and Macclesfield, the Lords Mordaunt, Wiltshire, Pawlet, Elan, Dunblain, Admiral Herbert, Mr. Herbert, Colonel Sidney, Mr. Russel, Sir Rowland Gwin, Major Wildman, Dr. Burnet, Mr. Harbord, Mr. Ferguson, and many others less known. The Prince had with him, besides the general officers of the Dutch forces, Count Schomberg, Marshal of France, who had last served the elector of Brandenburg, Count Charles his son, Monsieur Caillemote, younger son to the Marquis of Rouvigny, and about three hundred French officers, who had left their country for their religion. Admiral Herbert led the van of the fleet, Vice Admiral Evertzen brought up the rear, and the Prince placed himself in the main body, carrying a flag with English colours, and their highnesses arms surrounded with this motto, THE PROTESTANT RELIGION AND LIBERTIES OF ENGLAND; and underneath the motto of the house of Nassau, JE MAINTIENDRAI, i. e. I will maintain.

This numerous fleet had been but few hours under sail, when suddenly the wind coming more westerly, there arose such a storm, that in less than two hours the whole fleet was so dispersed, that the next day scarcely two ships could be seen together. The storm continued two days, during which time, the ships endeavoured to gain, some one port, some another. Many were driven northward, and could not reach the appointed rendezvous till eight days after. Nevertheless, the damage was so inconsiderable, that there was properly only loss of time. But on this occasion, the States made use of an artifice, which did the King great prejudice; they ordered the Harlem and Amsterdam Gazettes to aggravate the damage sustained by the fleet, and to insinuate, that the Prince could not possibly be in a condition to pursue his design till the next spring. The King, hearing the news with great pleasure, flattered himself, that he had now nothing more to fear, and that before the spring, he should infallibly be able to break all the Prince of Orange's measures. In this belief, he revoked some of his acts of grace granted to his subjects, and thereby clearly showed that these acts were extorted by necessity, and that consequently, no change was to be expected in his conduct for the future.†

While

* In this declaration, dated October 10, were enumerated all the grievances of the nation: the dispensing and suspending power; the court of ecclesiastical commissioners; the filling of all offices with Catholics, and the raising of a Jesuit to be Privy Counsellor; the open encouragement given to popery, by building every where churches, colleges, and seminaries, for that sect; the displacing of judges, if they refused to give sentence according to orders received from court; the annulling of the charters of all the corporations, and the subjecting of elections to arbitrary will and pleasure; the treating of petitions, even the most modest, and from persons of the highest rank, as criminal and seditious; the committing of the whole authority of Ireland, civil and military, into the hands of Papists; the assuming of an absolute power over the religion and laws of Scotland, and openly exacting in that kingdom an obedience without reserve; and the violent presumptions against the legitimacy of the Prince of Wales. In order to redress all these grievances, the Prince said that he intended to come over to England with an armed force, which might protect him from the King's evil counsellors: and that his sole aim was to have a legal and free Parliament assembled, who might provide for the safety and liberty of the nation, as well as examine the proofs of the Prince of Wales's legitimacy. No one, he added, could entertain such hard thoughts of him as to imagine, that he had formed any other design than to procure the full and lasting settlement of religion, liberty, and property. The force which he meant to bring with him was totally disproportioned to any views of conquest; and it were absurd to suspect, that so many persons of high rank, both in church and state, would have given him so many solemn invitations for such a pernicious purpose. Though the English ministers, terrified with his enterprise, had pretended to redress some of the grievances complained of; there still remained the foundation of all grievances, that upon which they could in an instant be again erected, an arbitrary and despotic power in the crown. And for this usurpation there was no possible remedy, but by a full declaration of all the rights of the subjects in a free Parliament.

† It was in his critical juncture that Captain Langham, an Englishman in the service of the States was seized on his arrival in England. In this portmanteau were found many copies of the Prince's declaration, which were sent to court. The King having read the declaration, was surprised at that expression, "That the Prince was most earnestly invited over by divers of the Lords, both spiritual and temporal, and by many gentlemen, and others." Immediately he sent for the Archbishop, and four or five Bishops then in London, and demanded of them, "Whether the contents of the Prince's declaration, relating to their inviting him over, were true?" The Bishops contented themselves with promising in general, their faithful allegiance to his Majesty. But the King, little satisfied with this answer, required them to justify themselves to the world, as to their part in that invitation. At the same time he fixed a day, whereon he obliged them to present a paper under their own hand, signifying their abhorrence of the Prince of Orange's intended invasion. He farther let them know, "That a declaration was then in the press against the Prince of Orange, and was only deferred, to have their paper of abhorrence put into it."

On the day appointed, the Bishops repaired to Whitehall, and as soon as they were in the King's presence he called for their paper. But with all submission, "They begged to be excused from writing any thing of that nature, and from making a particular defence to a general accusation, lest they should give the first precedent of that kind against the privilege of Peers: besides, that their profession being to promote peace, they thought it belonged not to them to declare war, especially against a Prince so nearly allied to the crown." This answer threw the King into a violent rage. However they persisted in their refusal, in as dutiful terms as possible. The King not being able to prevail with them, ordered them to withdraw, with great indignation. They were afterwards informed, that one of the principal members of the council and jesuitic party, advised the King, "To imprison them all, and extort the truth from them by violence."

Meantime, the King being desirous to conceal the Prince of Orange's declaration from the people, forbade the publishing and dispersing it, by proclamation. But being afterwards informed, that great numbers of copies were handed about the kingdom, and sensible that his prohibition would be to no purpose, he chose to print the declaration, with remarks, tending to justify his own, and render odious the Prince of Orange's conduct.

About the same time was printed a letter from the Prince of Orange, to the officers of the English army, and another from Admiral Herbert to the English fleet. The design of these two letters was the same, namely to inform the army and the fleet of the true intentions of

While the English fleet lay at anchor at the Gunfleet, the Lord Dartmouth, the Admiral, called a council of war, wherein it was debated, whether it was proper to put to sea and engage the enemy? Burchett, the naval historian, says on this occasion, "That this proposal carried the greatest weight with it, had there been a real design of obstructing the Prince of Orange in his passage to England. But instead of that, (continues he) matters were so concerted and agreed among the flag officers and commanders, that had the Admiral come fairly up with the Dutch, it would not have been in his power to have done them much damage." Wherefore, by a great majority it was resolved to continue there, in order to intercept the Dutch fleet.

The damage sustained by the Prince's fleet in the late storm was so inconsiderable, and so easily repaired, that in eleven days it was in condition to put to sea again. The 1st of November, in the afternoon, the Prince embarked in a new vessel called the Brill, and the fleet at first steering northward, it was thought the design was to land somewhere in the north of England; and Burnet says, the first scheme was to anchor in the mouth of the Humber. But during the night, whether the Prince had changed his mind, or was hindered from pursuing this course by a violent east wind, all the fleet steered towards the eastern coasts of England; after which they shortened sail for fear of accidents in the night. The next morning the fleet sailed towards the Channel, without meeting any English ship, and in their passage discovered the coasts of Essex and Kent. The 3d of November the fleet entered the Channel, and lay by between Calais and Dover, to stay for the ships that were behind. Here the Prince called a council of war.

The King, upon advice of the Prince's design to land in the north, had sent part of his army that way. But it was with the utmost surprise that he received several expresses, with the news that the enemy's fleet was sailing westward. He however flattered himself that the Lord Dartmouth would pursue and give a good account of them. But the English fleet remained in their station, till the enemy's ships had passed by.*

The 4th of November being Sunday, and the Prince's birth day, now thirty-eight years of age, was by him dedicated to devotion, the fleet still continuing their course in order to land at Dartmouth or Torbay. But in the night, whether by the violence of the wind, or the negligence of the pilot, the fleet was carried beyond the desired ports, without a possibility of putting back. This accident gave them the melancholy prospect of being forced to sail on to Falmouth, or some other inconvenient place. But soon after, the wind turned to the south, which happily carried the fleet into Torbay, the most convenient place for landing the horse of any in England. The forces were landed with such diligence and tranquillity, that the whole army was on shore before night. The next morning, the wind turning west, blew so tempestuously, that had the landing been deferred a few hours, probably, it would not have been possible to disembark the troops. This wind prevented the Lord Dartmouth, who was come in sight of the Dutch fleet, from attacking it, and obliged him to go into Portsmouth.†

It was thus, the Prince of Orange landed in England without any opposition, the 5th of November, whilst the English were celebrating the memory of their deliverance from the Powder Plot, about fourscore years before.

The Prince's army marched from Torbay about noon the next day, in very rainy weather and bad roads. The soldiers, before they landed, were ordered to bring three days bread with them, and they carried their tents themselves. But the officers, even the most considerable, were in a very uneasy situation, at their first encampment, being wet to the skin, and having neither clothes for change, nor bread, nor horses, nor servants, nor other bed than the earth all drenched with rain, their baggage being yet in the ships. Had this situation lasted two days more, the officers, as well principal as subaltern, would have been reduced to great extremities. But the Prince did all that was in his power to procure them refreshment. He ordered horses, carriages, and provisions from the neighbouring country, and in this state pursued his march to Exeter, about twenty miles from Torbay.

As soon as the King heard the Prince was landed, his first care was to order his army to rendezvous in some convenient place. He chose Salisbury plain, whither his army repaired from several parts, with all possible diligence; and, having sent a reinforcement to Portsmouth under the Duke of Berwick, he vainly amused himself with endeavouring to persuade the people, that the Prince's forces were too contemptible to inspire him with fear. He printed a list of all the regiments of the Prince's army, with the companies, troops, officers and soldiers belonging to each. Hearing that the counties of Kent and York, and the city of London, were preparing to address him for an accommodation with the Prince of Orange, he publicly declared, "That he would look upon all those as his enemies, who should pretend to advise him to treat with the invader of his kingdoms." At the same time, he published a declaration, endeavouring to demonstrate, that the Prince's secret design was to usurp the crown.

Meanwhile, the Prince, now at Exeter, found not at first the encouragement that he expected. The Bishop, Dr. Lamplugh, on the first news of his landing, posted to court, where he was rewarded with the Archbishopric of York, which had been kept long vacant, with intention, as it was thought, to confer it on Father Petre, the King's confessor. The Sunday after the Prince's arrival at Exeter, Dr. Burnet mounting the pulpit to read his declaration, all the canons and part of the congregation left the church, not to be present at the reading. On the other hand, few came to offer their service to the Prince, and the levy of three regiments of foot, for which he had granted commissions, proceeded but slowly. Not but that in general the people of the country were inclined to the Prince, and wished well to his undertaking. But the memory of the severities against the Duke of Monmouth's adherents, was yet so recent, that every one feared to engage in a like enterprise, the success whereof was uncertain. In short, the Prince remained nine days at Exeter, without being joined by any person of distinction. It is even pretended that in a council of war held at Exeter, he suffered it to be proposed to him to re-embark for Holland. But on the tenth day some of the principal gentlemen of the country joined him. Among these was Sir Edward Seymour, by whose advice an association was drawn, and signed by all persons then with the Prince, or who afterwards repaired to him.

From this time the face of the Prince of Orange's affairs, who left Exeter to march to Salisbury, was entirely changed. Every day brought him persons distinguished by their birth, estates, or employments. The Lord Colchester, son to Earl Rivers, a Lieutenant in the life-guards, waited upon the Prince, accompanied by Mr. Wharton, Colonel Godfrey, John Howe, Esq. four life-guard men, and about threescore men more on horseback. These were followed by the Earl of Abington, Captain Clarges, Mr. Russel, and others. But what was more material, the Lord Cornbury, son to the Earl of Clarendon, Colonel of dragoons, leaving Salis-of the Prince, and to represent to them, that in being the King's instruments to accomplish his designs, they were labouring their own ruin. Wherefore the officers, soldiers, and sailors, were conjured not to suffer themselves to be abused by a false notion of honour, to serve the King, contrary to the manifest interest of their religion and country. These two letters had a wonderful effect upon officers, soldiers and seamen; so that from this time many of them resolved not to draw their swords in this quarrel, till they had a free Parliament to secure their religion and liberties.

* Lord Dartmouth was kept in by easterly winds.

† Upon this occasion these two famous verses of Claudian were applied to the Prince of Orange.

O nimium dilecte Deo, cui militat Æther,
Et conjurati veniunt ad Classica Venti.

Heaven's favourite! to whom the skies assistance lend, bury, under pretence of an order from the King, to beat up one of the enemies' advanced posts at Honiton, carried with him his own regiment, and those of horse of Berwick, St. Albans, and Fenwick, and with the major part of them went over to the Prince at Exeter.
Whilst on thy sails conspiring winds attend.

About the same time the Lord Delamere took arms in Cheshire, and declared openly for the Prince, inviting all his tenants to follow his example. The Lord Lovelace was also marching to Exeter, with sixty or seventy horsemen, but passing through Cirencester, was made prisoner, by the militia of the county, after a warm skirmish, in which ten or twelve men were killed on both sides.

On the other hand, the two Archbishops, five Bishops, the Dukes of Grafton and Ormond, the Earls of Dorset, Clare, Clarendon, Burlington, Anglesey, Rochester, the Lords Newport, Paget, Chandos, and Ossulston, meeting together in London, drew up a petition, which was signed at the Bishop of Rochester's house at Westminster. The intent of it was, to pray the King to call a free Parliament, and find some expedient to satisfy the Prince of Orange. The petition being delivered, and afterwards printed by the Lords for their own vindication, this answer was returned from the King, which was also published: "My Lords, what you ask of me, I most passionately desire; and I promise upon the faith of a King, that I will have a Parliament, and such an one as you ask for, as soon as ever the Prince of Orange has quitted this realm: for how is it possible a Parliament should be free in all its circumstances, as you petition for, while an enemy is in the kingdom, and can make a return of near a hundred voices?" This answer was not satisfactory to the Lords, who easily saw, that the King was far from desiring a free Parliament, nor would have any but of which he could be master.

Though the King still put on a face of assurance, the desertions in his army made him very uneasy. He knew not what to resolve, in the fear of some conspiracy among the officers to deliver him to the Prince of Orange, if he should put himself at the head of the army. This was the reason of his stopping the march of his forces, artillery, and his own equipage. But in a council held on this occasion, it was judged necessary for him to be as soon as possible with his army, in order to keep those firm to their duty who were yet unresolved. He therefore departed the 17th of November, after having recommended the care of the city to the Lord Mayor, and in a speech to the officers about him, renewed his promise of calling a Parliament as soon as the Prince of Orange had quitted the kingdom. "He told them, if they desired any thing more, he was ready to grant it, but that if, after all, any of them was desirous to go over to the Prince of Orange, he was willing to grant them passes, and spare them the shame of deserting their lawful sovereign. But at the very time he seemed disposed to give a general satisfaction, he left at Whitehall, a council composed of five Lords, all odious to the people, except the Lord Godolphin. The other four were, the Chancellor Jefferies, the Lords Arundel and Bellasis, both known Papists, and the Lord Preston, suspected of favouring Popery. It is said, the King designed to leave there also his confessor Father Petre, but the jesuit chose rather to retire to France.

The King arrived the 19th of November at Salisbury, where the officers of his army, who were most devoted to him, paid him their compliments, and expressed an abhorrence of Lord Cornbury's defection. At his arrival he was seized with a bleeding at the nose, which increased the next day, as he was going to view part of his army, quartered eight miles from Salisbury. On the same, or the following day, most of the chief officers applied themselves to the Earl of Feversham, their general, desiring him to assure the King, "That upon any occasion they should be ready to spill the last drop of their blood in his service; but yet they could not in conscience fight against a Prince, who was come over with no other design, than to procure the calling of a free Parliament, for the securing of their religion and liberties." This declaration, at which the King was extremely surprised, showed him, that his army, which had been always his principal refuge, could not be relied on. The Earl of Feversham, strongly suspecting the Lord Churchill (afterwards Earl of Marlborough) one of the King's favourites, Lieutenant General, Captain of a troop of his life-guards, and gentleman of his bed-chamber, was very earnest with the King to have him secured. But the King, whether he had no such suspicion, or feared it would occasion a mutiny, would not follow his advice. However, the very next day the Lord Churchill went over to the Prince of Orange, accompanied by the Duke of Grafton, Colonel Berkley, four or five Captains of his own regiment, and some other officers. Father Orleans insinuates, that he had formed a design to deliver the King to the Prince of Orange, which was prevented by his Majesty's bleeding at the nose, at the time he intended to go and view his troops at Warminster, the most advanced post of his army. But this accusation is groundless, and entirely destroyed by the respectful letter written by that Lord to the King on the occasion.

The Lord Churchill's defection quite sunk the King's spirits, who from this time saw not on whom he could rely. So, no longer daring to venture his person with his army, he left Salisbury, and returned to London with a precipitation like a flight. Before his departure he published a proclamation, "Promising a free and absolute pardon to all his subjects, who had taken up arms, and joined with the Prince of Orange, provided they quitted and deserted him within the space of twenty days." But this proclamation had no effect. In his return, he met with a greater mortification, in the defection of the Prince of Denmark his son-in-law, who leaving him at Andover, went off to the Prince of Orange, with the Duke of Ormond, Sir George Hewet, and others. That Prince wrote a very respectful letter to the King, in vindication of his conduct, wherein he grounds his defection chiefly on his concern for the Protestant religion, which the King had openly attempted to destroy, not only in England, but all Europe, by his strict union with France.

Meantime, the Prince of Orange having left Exeter, was advanced to Sherburn, from whence it was in his power to march to Salisbury or Bristol, according to the resolutions taken by the King. The King had an army so superior to that of the Prince in number, that had he marched directly to the Prince, and attacked him, he would, doubtless, have very much distressed him. It is not likely, the Prince would have ventured a battle, but on the King's advancing, would probably have retired to Bristol, in expectation of a more general defection in the King's army. But upon hearing that the King was returned to London, and his army retired to Reading, the Prince marched to Salisbury, and made a public entry into that city, amidst the acclamations of the people. During his march, there was a slight skirmish between two parties of the armies, in which that of the Prince, though very inferior in number, defended themselves with so much bravery, that the enemy had no reason to boast of the advantage, the loss being almost equal on both sides.

The desertion of his principal officers was not the only cause of the King's mortal fears. Scarcely a day passed, but what brought him some disagreeable news from different parts of the kingdom. The Earl of Bath had made himself master of Plymouth, where the Dutch fleet lay secure. The Earl of Shrewsbury, and Sir John Guise had, with the assistance of the inhabitants, forced the Duke of Beaufort to surrender the important city of Bristol. The Earl of Devonshire, at the head of a great number of Derbyshire gentlemen, had declared for a free Parliament, agreeably to the Prince's declaration. The Earl of Danby had secured York, and having disarmed and turned out all the Papists, (who, under the protection of the Duke of Newcastle, stood up for the King) declared for a free Parliament. The town of Berwick soon followed the example of York, and the gentlemen of Nottinghamshire had done the same. Colonel Copley, Deputy-Governor of Hull, surprised that town, and made the Lord Langdale, the Popish governor prisoner. The Duke of Somerset and the Earl of Oxford, came to offer their service to the Prince of Orange. The Duke of Ormond entered Oxford without resistance, and caused the Prince's declaration to be read there. In fine, the King heard, that five commissioners from Scotland, among whom were the Duke of Queensbury, and the Lord of Belcarris, were coming to London, to demand a free Parliament in that kingdom. But the King's greatest affliction was, to see himself forsaken by his own daughter, the Princess of Denmark, who had privately withdrawn from Whitehall, being attended by the Bishop of London, mounted and armed, and retired to Nottingham, whence she was conducted to the Prince her husband at Oxford. Some days before, it was reported, that the Queen had treated her very rudely, and proceeded so far as to strike her. This so incensed the people, that as soon as they found she appeared not at Whitehall, they offered to tear all the Romish party in pieces, upon a surmise of her being murdered, or confined, but on the news of her being in safety they were appeased.

The King now found himself plunged in a gulph of difficulties, without perceiving any way to escape. The Queen was dismayed, and her consternation inexpressible. Father Petre had retired into France, under the protection of the Lord Waldgrave, sent thither in the room of Skelton. The Popish counsellors seeing all their measures broken, took care to shelter themselves from the impending storm, to which they left the King exposed. M. Barillon the French ambassador, and Monsieur de Lausun, then in London, vented themselves in fruitless reproaches on the King, for refusing the assistance offered by France, without directing him how to repair that error. In this extreme distress (more easy to be imagined than described) his sole refuge was to turn to the Protestant Peers, whose counsels he had before rejected, whom he had deprived of their employments, and in a word, treated as enemies. He therefore assembled all the Peers, spiritual and temporal, that were in London. The number indeed was but small, there being many with the Prince of Orange, or in several parts of the kingdom, for his service. When they were met, he prayed for their advice concerning the present emergencies. On this occasion, he had the mortification to hear a long enumeration of all his unwarrantable proceedings, since his accession to the throne, and particularly his violent measures to destroy the Protestant religion, and subvert the liberties of England. These, it was said, had occasioned the dangerous symptoms that now appeared in the body politic, and for which there was no other remedy than a free Parliament. The necessity therefore was represented to his Majesty,

I. Of granting a general pardon to all those who either came over with the Prince of Orange, or had joined him since his landing.

II. Of deputing some Lords to his Highness, to treat with him about a supension of arms, and to endeavour to bring matters to an accommodation.

III. And lastly, of turning all Papists immediately out of their employments, to convince the world, that his Majesty acted with sincerity.

The King took that night to consider of the advice, and the next day declared in council, that he was resolved to call a free Parliament, that should meet the 15th of January next ensuing. Accordingly the Chancellor was ordered to issue the writs. Then he published a proclamation, in which he declared, that all his subjects should have free liberty to elect, and all the Peers, and such as should be elected members of the House of Commons, should have full liberty and freedom to serve and sit in Parliament, notwithstanding they had taken up arms, or committed any act of hostility, or been any way aiding or assisting therein. He also declared in council his intention of sending commissioners to treat with the Prince of Orange: but as to that part of the advice relating to the Roman Catholics, his Majesty only said, "He would leave that matter to be debated in Parliament." However, Sir Edward Hales, a Papist and Lieutenant of the Tower, having been obnoxious to the city of London, by threatening to bombard it, was displaced, and Colonel Skelton put in his room.

The commissioners nominated by the King to treat with the Prince of Orange, were the Marquis of Hallifax, the Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Godolphin. They left London the 2d of December, and on their way met with passes from the Prince.*

The 6th of December the three commissioners by an express acquainted the King, "That they were to meet the Prince of Orange that night at Amesbury." But the next day they informed his Majesty, "That his highness had made a new appointment to meet them at Hungerford, and had sent to them the Earls of Clarendon and Oxford, to desire them to make their proposals in writing." This message surprised the King chiefly because the Prince had deputed the Earl of Oxford, who had never been concerned in any public affair, and the Earl of Clarendon was mortal enemy of the Marquis of Hallifax. He inferred from thence, the Prince's unwillingness to come to any accommodation. For this cause, Barillon and Lausun earnestly pressed the King, to secure himself, the Queen, and the Prince of Wales, by a timely recess from the nation. But he was willing still to wait for the success of the negotiation with the Prince of Orange.

The substance of the proposals delivered by the King's commissioners to the Prince was, "That the King observing that all the causes of complaint, alledged by his Highness, seemed to be referred to a free Parliament, he had issued his writs for calling one. That he had sent commissioners to his Highness for adjusting all matters relating to the freedom of elections, and security of the Parliament; and, in order to that, proposed, that the respective armies might be kept at such a distance from London."

The Prince, who was then marching towards London, returned no answer to these proposals, but the next day, with the advice of the Lords and gentlemen assembled with him, he put the following propositions into the hands of the King's commissioners.

"I. That all Papists and all such persons as are not qualified by law, be disarmed, disbanded, and removed from all employments, civil and military.

"II. That all proclamations that reflect upon us be recalled; and that if any persons, for having assisted us, have been committed, that they be forthwith set at liberty.

* About the same time appeared a printed paper at London, and other places, called, "The third Declaration of the Prince of Orange." It was penned by a private hand, who had the boldness to put the Prince's name to it, and disperse it through the kingdom. Amongst other things he made the Prince say, that as he would offer no violence to any but in his own necessary defence, so he would not suffer any injury to be done to the person, even of any Papist, provided he was found in such place, and condition, and circumstance, as the law required. But he declared, that all Papists, who should be found in open arms, or in any office, civil or military, contrary to the known laws of the land, should be treated by him and his forces, not as gentlemen and soldiers, but as robbers, freebooters, and banditti; so should all persons found any ways aiding or assisting them: that whereas he was certainly informed, that great numbers of armed Papists had of late resorted to London and Westminster, and parts adjacent, not so much, he had reason to suspect, for their own security, as out of a wicked design to make some desperate attempt upon the said cities and their inhabitants, he therefore required all magistrates and officers, civil and military, to disarm and secure them, that all power of doing mischief might be taken from them: that those magistrates or others, who should refuse to assist him, to execute vigorously what he required of them, should be esteemed the most criminal and infamous of all men; betrayers of the religion, laws, and country, of whom he would require the life of every single Protestant that should perish, and every house that should be burnt or destroyed, by their treachery and cowardice." This declaration, published in the Prince's name, though it was disowned by him, finished the confusion of the Papists; and the more, as several justices of peace caused it to be published, not imagining that any private man would have had the boldness to undertake such a thing. From this time the Popish party were reduced so low, that they durst not hold up their heads. A hue and cry after Father Petre, was publicly cried and sold in the streets, notwithstanding he was a privy counsellor. A legal accusation against the Earl of Salisbury, "For infringing the most sacred laws of the kingdom by turning Papist," was preferred to the grand jury of Middlesex, who found the bill.

"III. That

"III. That for the security and safety of the city of London, the custody and government of the Tower, be immediately put into the hands of the city.

"IV. That if his Majesty shall think fit to be in London, during the sitting of the Parliament, that we may be there also, with equal number of guards: and if his Majesty shall please to be in any place from London, whatever distance he thinks fit, that we may be at a place of the same distance; and that the respective armies be from London thirty miles; and that no further forces be brought into the kingdom.

"V. That for the security of the city of London, and their trade, Tilbury fort be put into the hands of the said city.

"VI. That a sufficient part of the public revenue be assigned to us, for the support and maintenance of our troops, until the sitting of a free Parliament.

"VII. That to prevent the landing of the French, or other foreign troops, Portsmouth may be put into such hands, as by his Majesty and us shall be agreed on."

These proposals were so reasonable, that the King himself could not help owning, "They were better than he expected." He even seemed at first disposed to accept them, and refer to the next Parliament the decision of all differences, since that very day he called an extraordinary council of all the Lords that were in town. Before the council broke up, the King, addressing himself to the Duke of Bedford, said, "My Lord, you are a good man, and have a great influence: you can do much for me at this time." To which the Duke replied, "I am an old man, and can do but little;" then added with a deep sigh, "I had once a son, that could now have been very serviceable to your Majesty." This was meant of the Lord Russel, beheaded in the late reign, who was sacrificed to the vengeance of the King, then Duke of York. The King was struck dumb with this answer.

Every thing seemed to promise an accommodation, and it was not doubted, but the next day some resolution would be taken for the peace and security of the kingdom. But that same night the King, as it is supposed, consulted with some of his Popish counsellors, whose interested advice overthrew all these flattering expectations. They thought it more advantageous to their religion, that the King should preserve all his pretensions, though unable to support them, than sacrifice them to the Parliament. To that end, they advised him to withdraw into France. They represented, how dishonourable it would be to retract what he had done, how prejudicial to the Catholic religion, to be forced to give his assent to such acts of Parliament as would tend only to render its establishment impracticable. That the Catholics would be entirely destitute of any resource, whereas by preserving his rights, he might hope to be restored by the arms of France, and finish the work so gloriously begun. To give more weight to their reasons, they instilled into the Queen such apprehensions, as made her use all her influence with the King, to engage him to do as he was advised. They told her, the Parliament would be far from being favourable to the King and herself: that being both suspected and even openly accused in the Prince of Orange's Declaration, of imposing an heir upon the crown, it was apparent, the Parliament, to favour the Princess of Orange, would declare the Prince of Wales supposititious: that perhaps she herself would be accused for the fact, since it was not scrupled to impeach the Queen, her mother-in-law, for matters much less important: that a short exile with a powerful and generous Prince, who was able to restore them, was preferable to living in their own kingdom, with only the shadow of sovereignty, in dishonour, indigence, and in dependence upon those whom they ought to command. These considerations, supported, as it is pretended, by Barillon and Lausun, made such an impression upon the Queen, that she resolved to retire into France with the Prince of Wales, after a positive promise from the King, that he would follow her with all convenient speed.

Pursuant to this resolution, in the night between the 9th and 10th of December, the Queen in disguise crossed the Thames to Lambeth in an open boat, exposed to wind and rain. At Lambeth, under the walls of the church, she waited till a coach could be got ready in the next inn. She went from thence to Gravesend, where she embarked with the Prince of Wales, in a small vessel, which conveyed them safely to Calais. From thence she went to Versailles, where she was received by the King of France with great marks of affection, which was some alleviation to her melancholy situation.

The King being fully determined to follow the Queen, waited but one day to execute his design. The night between the 10th and 11th of December, in a plain suit, and a bob wig, he took water at Whitehall, accompanied only by Sir Edward Hales, Mr. Sheldon, and Abbadie a Frenchman, page of the back stairs, without acquainting any other with his intention. Before he went off, he wrote to the Earl of Feversham to disband the army, without any care of their pay, probably, to cause disturbances in the kingdom, by the discontents of the officers and soldiers. He ordered all the writs to be burnt, that were not sent out, for electing the Parliament, imagining, doubtless, that after his departure, it would not be possible to assemble a Parliament, which by the laws could only be called by the King. When he took water, he threw the great seal into the Thames, that nothing might be legally done in his absence.

As soon as the King's flight was known, a general consternation ensued, most people being ignorant how they were to behave on so extraordinary an occasion. However, about thirty spiritual and temporal Lords met at Guildhall, and sent for the Lord Mayor and aldermen. After a short consultation, it was resolved, to adhere to the Prince of Orange, and send deputies to him, with this resolution signed by the whole assembly. Then they sent for Colonel Skelton, Lieutenant of the Tower, of whom they demanded the keys, which he willingly resigning, they were given to the Lord Lucas. Presently after, the common council of the city sent deputies to the Prince, with an address, imploring his protection, and praying him to honour the city with his presence.

Though, upon the King's flight, the militia of London and Westminster were immediately up in arms, they could not prevent the mob from assembling and committing some disorders. They confined their rage chiefly to the mass houses erected by the King in the city and suburbs, which they demolished entirely, and made bonfires with the materials. And as there were also chapels in the houses of ambassadors, those of the Spanish and Florentine ambassadors were rifled, before a stop could be put to the disorder. Into the first of these chapels the principal court Papists had conveyed all their valuable effects, and this probably was the chief cause of the pillage. The houses of the other ambassadors were preserved, by the great care of some Lords. The two ministers of Spain and Florence were afterwards largely recompensed for their losses.

During these irruptions of the mob, Chancellor Jefferies, disguised in a seaman's habit, in order to escape in a vessel freighted for Hamburgh, was discovered, as he was looking out of the window of the house where he had concealed himself. He was immediately seized by the mob, and, after many indignities put upon him, carried before the Lord Mayor, who declined meddling with him. But the Chancellor seeing himself in the hands of an enraged mob, which threatened to tear him in pieces, desired that he might be sent to the Tower, which at last was granted him, not as a favour, but in hopes of seeing him shortly conducted from thence to the gallows. It is pretended, he offered to discover many secrets, and for that reason, was kept some time in prison, till the affairs of the government should be settled. But he died in that interval, by the blows he had received, according to some; by drinking spirituous liquors, according to others; and as some pretend, of the stone. Never man had better deserved a public punishment, as an atonement for all the mischiefs done done to his country, and for all the blood spilt by his means.

Some Irish soldiers of the disbanded troops, finding themselves moneyless, and incapable of subsisting in a country where they were so generally hated, resolved to keep themselves from starving, by forcibly entering a country house. Whereupon, a man of the neighbourhood ran directly to London, crying, as he passed, "That the Irish were up, and marching to London, firing of houses, and putting man, woman, and child, to the sword." The news immediately flew through the city, and caused a strange panic. The city was in alarm all night, expecting every moment the arrival of the Irish. Some prepared for flight, others ran to arms, not a window in London and Westminster but what was illuminated. From London the consternation spread through the whole kingdom, so that in the remote parts, where people had more time to consider what was to be done, a resolution was taken, in case the news should be true, of destroying all the Irish, and Papists in England. Happily, this terror vanished in London as soon as the real cause of it was known.

Meantime, the Prince of Orange being advanced as far as Henley, and fearing the disorders which might be committed by a disbanded army, published a short declaration, requiring all Colonels to call together the several officers and soldiers of their respective regiments, in such places as they should think convenient, and there to keep them in good order and discipline, till farther orders. This declaration was followed by another, of the Lords assembled at London, to the same effect, with an additional promise of subsistence, till they should be otherwise provided for, to all officers and soldiers who should obey, and deliver up their arms to persons appointed to receive them. Besides this, all magistrates were required to apprehend, and seize, all such soldiers as should not repair to their respective bodies, and to deal with them as vagabonds.

All these things were transacted, in the belief, that the King had left the nation; and indeed he had gone from Whitehall with that intention. He had got as far as a little place near Feversham, and had even embarked in a small vessel that was to carry him to a frigate, ready to transport him to France. This vessel not being able to sail immediately, by reason of a tempestuous wind, Sir Edward Hales, one of the King's attendants, sent his footman to the post office at Feversham. His livery was known by a man, who told some others, that Sir Edward was not far off. The footman was followed to the river side, and seen to make signs to some people on board a bark, whereupon the fishermen, and other persons of Feversham, immediately boarded the vessel where the King was. Sir Edward was soon known, and the King being taken for his chaplain, had many indignities put upon him. Then searching him, they found four hundred guineas, and several valuable seals and jewels, which they took from him. Amongst the people who crowded into the ship, there happened to be a constable who knew the King, and throwing himself at his feet, begged him to forgive the rudeness of the mob, and ordered restitution to be made of what had been taken from him. The King received the jewels and the seals, but gave the four hundred guineas among them. After this, he desired to be gone, but the people, by a sort of violence, conducted him to a public inn in the town. Here he sent for the Earl of Winchelsea, Lord Lieutenant of the county, who prevailed with him not to leave the kingdom, but to return towards London.

This news being brought to London produced various effects. Some wished the King had never been stopped, others were glad of an opportunity to convince him, there was never any ill design against his person. The Lords and Magistrates of London, who had made such advances towards the Prince of Orange, were confounded at their haste, and were under some fear, in case the state of affairs should be altered. At last, the Lords assembling, thought proper to appoint four of their body to wait on the King, with an invitation to return to Whitehall, and with assurances of being received with all due respect; the coaches were immediately sent to bring him. At the same time, an express was dispatched to the Prince of Orange, to acquaint him that the King was still in the nation. The Prince, who had come as far as Windsor, was not a little surprised at the news. He was marching to London to settle with the Lords, by whom he was expected, the affairs of the nation, in the supposition, that the King had left it. But his Majesty's return threw the Prince into great perplexity, and of course would oblige him to take other measures. Nevertheless, as the King had no army, and by his hasty flight, had entirely forfeited the confidence of all his friends, and the esteem of his enemies, as he was not in a condition to command, but in some measure depended upon others, the Prince dispatched Monsieur Zuylestein to him, to desire him to remain at Rochester, till it could be agreed what was to be done. But Zuylestein missing his way, the King came to London the 16th of December, about four in the afternoon, where he was received with acclamations, as if he had been returning from victory.

The King being restored to his palace, and in some manner to his deserted royalty, discovered an inclination to resume his old measures, and still brave the Protestants. In all appearance, the acclamations, as he passed through London, had revived his courage, and put him in hopes of a general declaration in his favour. The first thing he did was to publish an order of council, wherein he said, that being given to understand, that divers outrages had been committed in several parts of the kingdom, by burning, pulling down, and defacing of houses, he commanded all Lord-Lieutenants, to prevent such outrages for the future, and suppress all riotous assemblies. This was his last public act, which crowned so many others done in his reign, in favour of the Papists. Moreover, he discharged Leiburn, a popish Bishop, who had been sent to Newgate, and during his short stay at Whitehall, was surrounded, as formerly, with priests, jesuits, and Irishmen.

The King, in his journey to London, dispatched the Earl of Feversham with a letter to the Prince, "Kindly to invite him to the palace at St. James's, with what number of guards and troops he should think convenient to bring along with him, that they might amicably and personally confer together about the means of redressing the public grievances." The Prince returned no answer. But the moment the Earl of Feversham was out of his presence, M. Bentinck demanded his sword, and told him, he had orders to secure him. This, doubtless, was owing to his precipitate disbanding of the army.

In a council held by the Prince, and the English Lords who were with him, it was resolved, "That the royal palace at Whitehall, being still crowded with Irish Papists, Priests and Jesuits, his Highness could not with ease and safety remain at St. James's, where he must necessarily go the next day, without his Majesty and his popish guards were removed within a reasonable distance from London." Moreover, an accident which happened two days before, provoked those who were concerned for the Prince's life. The Duke of Grafton marching through the Strand at the head of a regiment, to take Tilbury fort out of the hand of the Irish, an Irish officer riding up to him, fired a pistol at him; for which he was shot dead upon the place. Much more might such an attempt be apprehended against the Prince, from some of the King's guards. In the debate, it was proposed to send the King prisoner to Breda. But the Prince of Orange rejected the proposal with indignation, protesting, that he could not consent to put him under any restraint. At last, since the Prince's presence at London was absolutely necessary, it was agreed, that the King should be desired to remove to Ham, a house belonging to the Duchess of Lauderdale. Pursuant to this resolution, the Prince of Orange signed an order, directed to the Marquis of Hallifax, the Earl of Shrewsbury, and the Lord Delamere, to acquaint the King with it, and to tell him, he should be attended with his guards, to preserve him from any disturbances.

Immediately after, the Prince ordered the regiment of his guards, consisting of three battalions, to march and take possession of all the posts about Whitehall and St. James's, either by persuasion or force. The King being informed of it, sent for Count Solms, who commanded these guards, and desired him, "If it could be, to let him have his own guard at Whitehall, only for that night;" but the Count alledged his order, "to relieve all the posts;" the King answered, "do your office." At ten o'clock at night, the Dutch blue guards entered St. James's house, and towards eleven, those who were ordered to Whitehall, moved through the Park, and with lighted match, and in order of battle, marched up to the King's guards. The captain of the guards scrupling to dislodge, at last received the King's orders to retire. After this, the Dutch took possession of the guard-house, and at the same time relieved all the posts about Whitehall and the Park, placing every where double centries. So that, during the rest of the night, the King was really in the power of the Prince of Orange. An hour after midnight, the three Lords appointed by the Prince came to Whitehall, and sent to awake the King for an audience. The King ordering them to come to his bed-side, they delivered the Prince's message, which was to desire his Majesty's departure to Ham; to which the King consented; but after they were withdrawn, he ordered them to be recalled, and bade them tell the Prince, that he desired rather to get to Rochester, according to the Prince's message by Zuylestein, to which the Prince consented that very night. His answer coming to the King at eight in the morning, the King about noon took a barge, attended by the Earls of Aylesbury, Litchfield, Arran, and Dumbarton, six of the yeomen of his guard, and about a hundred of the Dutch guards, commanded by the Lieutenant-Colonel of the regiment. About nine at night he arrived at Gravesend, where he found his own coaches, and some troops of the militia, by whom he was the next day conducted to Rochester.

The Prince arrived at London the same day the King left Whitehall, and lodged at St. James's, where he received the compliments of the nobility, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-council of the city of London. From this time it may be said, the King was a mere cypher. He was not a prisoner, but had no power left of doing good or hurt, so that most of the Lords who had any employments at court, laid down the badges of their offices, as the staff, the key, &c. believing they had no longer any right to exercise them.

During the rejoicings at London, for the Prince's arrival, the mob insulted the Papists again, not excepting ambassadors. As there was properly no government, such disorders were almost unavoidable, no person daring to undertake to restrain them. At last, the Privy-Council ordered, that all foreigners should be permitted quietly to leave the kingdom. The Prince of Orange sent particular passes to the Pope's nuntio, the Envoys of Poland, Savoy, and Modena. The popish Lords, Langdale and Montgomery, were released. But the Earls of Peterborough and Salisbury were kept in custody, on account of impeachments against them. Romish priests and jesuits, apprehended since the King's flight, were likewise detained.

Meanwhile, as it was absolutely necessary to put an end to the present anarchy, the Prince of Orange assembled the Lords spiritual and temporal in London, to the number of above threescore, and made this short speech to them. "My Lords, I have desired you to meet here, to advise the best manner how to pursue the ends of my declaration, in calling a free Parliament, for the preservation of the Protestant religion, the restoring the rights and liberties of the kingdom, and settling the same, that they may not be in danger of being again subverted." Upon speaking these words, he withdrew and left them to consult together. His declaration was read, and the Lords voted him their particular thanks. Then they resolved to assemble every day in their old House at Westminster, and named five of the most eminent lawyers to assist them in the room of the Judges, who were most of them absent. It was farther proposed, that the whole assembly should sign the association subscribed by the nobility and gentry at Exeter. To this all agreed, except the Duke of Somerset, the Earls of Pembroke and Nottingham, the Lord Wharton, and all the Bishops but that of London. The objection of the Bishops was chiefly founded upon the unchristian word Revenge, which, to satisfy them, was afterwards changed for that of Punishment.

In the mean time, the King was at Rochester in a melancholy situation. He perceived, his flight had done him an irreparable injury. The proceedings at London showed, that he was no longer regarded as a King to be intrusted with the government, and it was not in his power to restore himself by force. Nevertheless, some of his friends pressed him to call a Parliament, assuring him that since his misfortune there was a great turn in the minds of the city and army, and that compassion for him generally prevailed. But the very name of a free Parliament made him tremble. For, besides that his conscience might reproach him and inspire this fear, he plainly saw, the least which could befal him, would be, that the Parliament would take effectual measures for the security of the Protestant religion, and that, as long as he lived, he should be ever distrusted. Probably it was the fear of passing the rest of his days in so uncomfortable a state, which determined him to withdraw into France. Indeed in taking that course, he might hope one day to be restored by the assistance of that crown. Whereas by staying in England, he saw no other advantage, than the enjoyment of a royalty, surrounded with troubles and mortifications, and in which he could not without danger attempt to recover his former authority. Whatever were his motives, on the 23d of December, about three in the morning, he privately withdrew, taking with him only the Duke of Berwick his natural son, Mr. Skelton, and Abadie, and went on horseback to a place near the river, where he embarked in a small frigate, which landed him safely at Ambleteuse in France, whence he repaired to St. Germans. It was easy to execute this design, no person about him having orders to stop or hinder him from disposing of himself as he pleased. Probably, the Prince of Orange received not less satisfaction from this second than he had from the first flight. The King's presence in the nation could not but greatly embarrass him. Besides his natural generosity, he had promised the Princess that nothing should be attempted against the life or liberty of her father. So, the King could not do a greater service to the Prince, than voluntarily to retire out of the kingdom. And the more, as this afterwards furnished a pretence to say, he had abdicated the crown, which abdication paved the Prince's way to the throne.

THE INTERREGNUM.

As soon as the Lords heard of the King's departure, they believed themselves invested with a power to act in their own names. The first thing done, after consulting together, was the addressing the Prince of Orange, "To take upon him the administration of public affairs, both civil and military; the disposal of the public revenue; and the care of Ireland, till the meeting of the intended convention." The address was dated the 25th of December. By a second address they desired him, "To issue out missive letters, subscribed by himself, to the Lords spiritual and temporal being Protestants, and to the several counties, cities, and boroughs, containing directions for the chusing, within ten days, such a number of persons to represent them, as are of right to be sent to Parliament." The Prince thought, that besides the suffrages of the Peers, it was proper to be authorized by others, which might pass for those of the people." He therefore published an order, "Desiring all such persons as had served in any of the Parliaments during the reign of the late King Charles II. to meet him at St. James's, upon the 26th of December, by ten of the clock in the morning. He desired likewise, that the Lord Mayor and court of Aldermen Aldermen of the city of London; and fifty of the Common-council, would be there at the same time."

In pursuance of this order, about a hundred and sixty members, the Aldermen of London (the Mayor being indisposed) and the deputies of the Common-council, met at St. James's on the day appointed; where the Prince briefly told them, "That he had desired them to meet him there, to advise the best manner how to pursue the ends of his declaration, in calling a free Parliament, for the preservation of the Protestant religion, and the restoring the rights and liberties of the kingdom." They all repaired immediately to the Commons House in Westminster, where the first question they debated, was, "What authority they had to assemble?" Upon which it was soon agreed, that the request of the Prince was a sufficient warrant. The next question was, "How the Prince could take upon him the administration of affairs, without a distinguishing name or title." But as this question tended to prolong the deliberations, and defeat the ends proposed by the meeting, it was thought proper to wave such questions in their future debates. An association was likewise proposed to be signed, but every person was left at liberty to subscribe it or not. After these previous debates, they resolved to address the Prince, to take upon him the administration of public affairs, until the meeting of the convention, the 22d day of January next. The answer returned by the Prince to this address, and to that of the Lords, was the same, that he would endeavour, as far as he was able, to secure the peace of the nation, according to their desire.*

On Sunday the 30th of December, the Prince of Orange went to the royal chapel at St. James's, where he was present at Divine Service, and a sermon preached by Dr. Lloyd, Bishop of St. Asaph; after which he received the Sacrament from the hands of the Bishop of London. This public profession of the established religion, greatly contributed to dispel the fears of those, who dreaded his too zealous adherence to the Presbyterian religion, in which he had been educated. When the Prince of Orange's declaration for Scotland (the same in substance with that for England) appeared there, the Presbyterians began to take courage, those at the helm not daring to use any violence for fear of a general insurrection, which would have been extremely prejudicial to the King's affairs at that juncture. Things remained in this situation, till the King's party began o retire into England. For though the Scotch Bishops had published an abhorrence of the Prince's expedition, it was by no means the sentiments of the nation in general. Every one felt the weight of the yoke imposed on them, and the Episcopalians themselves had reason to fear, that under the pretence of humbling the Presbyterians, the King intended to destroy the Protestant religion. So far their case was the same with that of the English. And therefore the Duke of Queensbury, and some other Scotch gentlemen were come to London, to desire a free Parliament. The Lord Chancellor, upon the news of King James's withdrawing, immediately resigned the Great Seal, and retired from Edinburgh. Upon which, the populace of that city, insulted and rifled, not only the Roman Catholics, but also those who had appeared most devoted to the Episcopal party. So, the Bishops were forced to retire, to avoid the insults of the Presbyterians, who were now much superior to their late persecutors. On the other hand, several Scotch Lords and Gentlemen repaired to London, to observe the motions there, and to determine their conduct by that of the English.

The Prince of Orange, who could not visit Scotland, assembled all the Scotch Nobility and Gentry then in London, who meeting at St. James's, to the number of thirty Lords and fourscore Gentlemen, he asked their advice, what was to be done for the securing the Protestant religion, and restoring their laws, and liberties, according to his declaration? After this short speech, the Lords and Gentlemen repaired to the council-chamber at Whitehall, and chusing Duke Hamilton then President, consulted together, what advice was most proper to be given to the Prince. This affair was in effect settled the first day. But on the morrow, they were interrupted by a proposal from the Earl of Arran, that the King should be desired to return, and call a free Parliament. The tendency of this proposal was easily seen, and therefore it was unanimously rejected. At last, it was agreed to present an address to the Prince of Orange to desire him to take upon him the administration of all affairs both civil and military, and to call a general meeting of the States to be holden the 14th of the following March. This address being presented to the Prince, he desired time to consider of it, and two days after returned much the same answer as he had to the English.

The prospect from Ireland was not so pleasing. The Earl of Tyrconnel, a zealous papist and entirely devoted to the King, was Lord-Lieutenant, and supported by an army, which he had taken care to compose of Popish officers and soldiers. There was room therefore to fear, that the Earl would not submit to the resolutions taken in England, and he was not then to be forced to obedience. Meanwhile, the Prince of Orange having received addresses not only from the English Lords and Commons concerning Ireland, but likewise from the Protestants of that kingdom, could not but endeavour to procure the happiness of a nation which depended upon England. It was therefore thought proper to summon the Earl of Tyrconnel, by letter, to submit to the present administration in England. The delivery of this letter was committed to Colonel Hamilton, who promised to second it with his persuasions. But it was afterwards known, that he acted in concert with Tyrconnel directly to oppose it.

The Prince, and the Lords, as we have said, had ordered the forces disbanded by the Earl of Feversham to re-assemble. When this was done, the Prince discharged the arrears of the English army, with two hundred thousand pounds advanced in four days by the city of London, sixty thousand of which were lent by Sir Samuel Dashwood. After this, he ordered a reform of eight new raised regiments, besides the troop of Life-guards, commanded by the Lord Dover, who were all Papists. Then, several Colonels and other officers having resigned their commissions on account of the oath exacted of them, he filled their places with Protestants, and in a word, took all possible care to put the army under such a regulation, as might render it serviceable to the state.

The Prince considering, that the convention was to settle the government, thought it proper to send for his Princess; since if, as it was probable, the convention should declare the throne vacant, no person had a juster pretension to it than she. Very likely also, he thought he had himself room to aspire to it, by his late great service to the English. But a severe frost retarded her departure from Holland longer than he expected.

The Commons met the 22d of January in two Houses, as a Parliament. The Peers chose the Marquis of Hallifax for their Speaker, and the Commons, Mr. Henry Powle. In each House was read the following letter from the Prince of Orange, on the occasion of their meeting:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have endeavoured to the utmost of my power, to perform what was desired from me, in order to the public peace and safety; and I do not know that any thing

* During the King's stay at Rochester, Barillon, the French ambassador, had been very active to promote divisions amongst the Peers, with a view to serve the King. Of this the Prince was not ignorant; but as he was not yet invested with any authority, he was obliged to suffer it, though he knew he had not a greater enemy in England than that ambassador. But the moment he was entrusted with the government, he sent an express order to him to leave the kingdom within four-and-twenty hours. At the same time, he sent St. Leger, a French refugee, to attend him to the ship. That gentleman could not forbear saying to the ambassador, as they were on the road, "Sir, had any one told you a year ago, that a refugee should be commissioned to see you out of England, would you have believed it?" The ambassador answered, "Sir, cross over with me to Calais, and I will give you an answer."

hath been omitted which might tend to the preservation of them, since the administration of affairs was put into my hands. It now lieth upon you to lay the foundations of a firm security for your religion, your laws, and your liberties. I do not doubt; but that by such a full and free representative of the nation, as is now met, the ends of my Declaration will be attained: and since it hath pleased God hitherto to bless my good intentions with so great success, I trust in him, that he will complete his own work, by sending a spirit of peace and union to influence your counsels, that no interruption may be given to a happy and lasting settlement.

"The dangerous condition of the Protestants in Ireland, requiring a large and speedy succour, and the present state of things abroad, oblige me to tell you, that next to the danger of unseasonable divisions amongst ourselves, nothing can be so fatal as too great delay in your consultations. The States, by whom I have been enabled to rescue this nation, may suddenly feel the ill effects of it, both by being too long deprived of the service of their troops, which are now here, and of your early assistance against a powerful enemy, who hath declared a war against them. And as England is by treaty already engaged to help them upon such exigencies, so I am confident, that their cheerful concurrence to preserve this kingdom with so much hazard to themselves, will meet with all the returns of friendship and assistance, which may be expected from you, as Protestants and Englishmen, whenever their condition will require it.

"Given at St. James's, the 22d day of January,
"1688-9.

After the reading of this letter, the two Houses presented an address to the Prince, in which they acknowledged him, under God, the deliverer of the nation: they approved likewise of all that he had done since he had been intrusted with the administration, which they prayed him to continue till farther application should be made to him by them, which should be done with all convenient speed. They promised also to dispatch the matters recommended to them by his letter. The Prince in his answer accepted the offers made him by the two Houses, and strongly pressed them to a consideration of the affairs of Europe.

The first thing done by the two Houses after their address of thanks to the Prince, was to appoint a day of public thanksgiving to God, for the happy deliverance of the nation.

In the mean time, King James, perceiving the prejudice his flight would do him, endeavoured to prevent it, by a letter directed to the Lords, and others of his Privy-Council; in which he declared his intention to return to England for the holding a free Parliament. He reproached the Prince of Orange with artifices to hinder his holding such a Parliament, and required their advice, "what was fit to be done by him towards his returning." Though this letter was immediately printed and dispersed, it was little regarded. Even the persons to whom it was addressed, judged it not proper to return an answer, at a time the convention was sitting. James therefore sent a letter of the same tenor to both Houses of the convention, adding a promise, on the word of a King, of a pardon even to those that betrayed him, (some few excepted) and a resolution by an act of oblivion, to cover all faults. But both Houses returning the letters unopened, the King's friends complained of it, as of a great hardship.

The House of Commons deferred their sitting till the 28th of January, to give time to the rest of their members to come up to town. That day, Mr. Dolben, son to the late Archbishop of York, made a long speech to prove the vacancy of the throne, by the King's deserting the kingdom. Upon this arose a debate, which held four or five hours, and ended with this memorable vote:

"That King James the Second, having endeavoured to subvert the constitution of the kingdom, by breaking the original contract between King and people; and by the advice of jesuits and other wicked persons, having violated the fundamental laws, and withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, hath abdicated the government, and that the throne is thereby become vacant."

The next day, the Commons farther voted, "That it hath been found by experience to be inconsistent with this Protestant kingdom, to be governed by a popish Prince."

They presented likewise an address to the Prince of Orange, for the stopping all ships that were going to France. Two days after, they voted, that the thanks of the House should be given to the clergy of the church of England, who had refused to read in the churches the King's declaration for toleration; and also to the officers and soldiers, for having testified their adherence to the Protestant religion; and to all such as had appeared in arms for the defence of the same. All these votes were sent up to the Lords for their concurrence.

But in the House of Lords things passed not with that unanimity. There were several parties, who caused every question to be nicely examined. It was on the 29th of January, that the Lords began to consider the vote of the Commons, concerning the vacancy of the throne The first motion was, "Not to agree with the Commons that the throne was vacant, but only to suppose it for the present, leaving it to be further examined afterwards, in order to cut short several other questions, by determining this first, "Whether the throne being vacant, it ought to be filled up by a Regent or a King?" The Earl of Nottingham, who was at the head of the party for a Regent, made a long speech, alledging several arguments for a Regency, taken from the English and other histories. He insisted particularly upon what had very lately passed in Portugal, where, Alphonso VI. being deposed, his brother Don Pedro had only the title of Regent of the kingdom conferred on him. But the Marquis of Hallifax and the Earl of Danby demonstrated on the other side, the insuperable difficulties attending the administration of the government under a Regent. At last, after a very long debate, the question being put to the vote, fifty-one were for a King, and forty-nine only for a Regency. Thirteen Bishops were among the last, and but two among the first, namely, Dr. Compton, Bishop of London, and Sir Jonathan Trelawney, Bishop of Bristol. The Archbishop of Canterbury was absent.

On the morrow, January 30, this question was put in the House of Lords, "Whether or no there was an original contract between the King and people?" This question was warmly debated, several maintaining, that such a contract was only a chimera. Others rejecting the general assertions urged by the first, and the instances brought from the practice of other countries, confined themselves to the particular constitution of the English government. They endeavoured to show, that it must have been by virtue of such a contract, that the Parliament were possessed, jointly with the King, of the legislative power; otherwise, the right of the Parliament, in their opinion, could be founded only upon custom, which was not sufficient to balance the King's pretended divine right; whence it would follow, that the King, in virtue of his divine right, might abolish this custom, and render him absolute. But that the prevention of such a misfortune was the occasion of their present meeting. The question being put to the vote, fifty-three were for the original contract, and forty-six only against it.

The next day, they took into consideration the word Abdicated, and entered into a grammatical dispute, to know whether the word could be understood only of a voluntary abdication, without any mixture of compulsion, and it was concluded, that the word Deserted was more proper. They next examined the word Vacant, and put this question, "Whether King James, having broke that original contract between him and his people, and deserted the government, the throne was thereby vacant?" The debates upon this question were longer, and more warm than any of the former. In short, the party that maintained it was a law-maxim, That the King never dies, and consequently that the throne can never never be vacant, carried the negative of the question by eleven voices. But on the morrow, forty Lords entered their protestations against the vote. As the Lords' vote was founded upon the crown's devolving, on the King's demise, immediately to the next heir, without any vacancy, some of the other party moved, that, supposing King James to be dead in law, the Prince and Princess of Orange should be declared King and Queen. But this was also determined in the negative by five voices.

If these several resolutions be considered, and compared together, the Lords will doubtless seem to have rendered it impossible to settle the government any way. This no doubt, was the aim of some among them, that the difficulties might not possibly be surmounted, but by recalling King James. Many were satisfied of this, and therefore a petition was drawn up to be presented to the Lords, desiring, in plain terms, that the Prince and Princess of Orange might be settled on the throne. Care was taken to get this petition signed by all sorts of people, that by the great number of subscribers it might pass for the sense of the nation. But the Prince of Orange not liking this way of proceeding, sent the Lord Mayor orders, to put a stop to this tumultuous project, which was accordingly done.

The 2d of February, the Lords sent a message, to acquaint the Commons with two amendments they had made to their vote of the 28th of January. The first was, instead of the word Abdicated, they would have Deserted be put in. The second, that the words, "and that the throne is thereby become vacant," should be left out. The Commons, not pleased with these two amendments, appointed a committee to draw up reasons why they must insist upon their vote, and desired a conference with the Lords upon that subject. This conference produced no effect, each House persisting in their opinion. Only the Earl of Nottingham intimated from the Lords, that they insisted upon the amendments, not to favour King James, but solely to maintain Hereditary right, in the fear that the election of a King might destroy that right. But the Commons persisting still in their opinion, by a superiority of two hundred and eighty-two, against one hundred and fifty-one, appointed twenty-four of their most able members to manage on this extraordinary occasion at a free conference, for which the Lords named on their part, the Earls of Nottingham, Clarendon, Rochester, Pembroke, with the Bishop of Ely, and some others. This conference, however, in which all that logic or eloquence could devise was advanced, produced no decision.

During all these debates, the Prince of Orange staid at St. James's, without taking the least pains to gain any one person to his party. The two Houses were surprized that no body spoke to them in the Prince's behalf. At last, finding that his silence might be ill-construed, as if he was unwilling to take upon him the burden of royalty, he sent for the Marquis of Hallifax, the Earls of Danby, Shrewsbury, and some others, and told them:

"He had been till then silent, because he would not say or do any thing that might seem in any sort to take from any person the full freedom of deliberating and voting in matters of such importance: he was resolved neither to court nor threaten any one. Some were for putting the government in the hands of a Regent: he would say nothing against it, if it was thought the best means for settling their affairs: only he thought it necessary to tell them he would not be the Regent: so, if they continued in that design, they must look out for some other person to be put in that post: he himself saw what the consequences of it were likely to prove: so he would not accept it. Others were for putting the Princess singly on the throne, and that he should reign by her courtesy: he said, no man could esteem a woman more than he did the Princess; but he was so made, that he could not think of holding any thing by apron-strings: nor could he think it reasonable to have any share in the government, unless it was put in his person, and that for term of life: if they did not think it fit to settle it otherwise, he would not oppose them in it: but he would go back to Holland, and meddle no more in their affairs: he assured them, that whatsoever others might think of a crown, it was no such thing in his eyes, but that he could live very well, and be well pleased without it: in the end, he said, he could not resolve to accept of a dignity, so as to hold it only the life of another: yet he thought that the issue of the Princess Anne should be preferred in the succession, to any issue he might have by any otherwise than the Princess."

This declaration being immediately divulged, did not a little contribute to bring the debates in the House of Lords, to a speedy determination. As for the Commons, about two thirds were for the Prince.

When the report of the conference between the two Houses was made to the Lords, there was a very warm debate, whether they should insist upon the amendments. During the debate, it was moved, that the birth of the Prince of Wales might be examined into. But this motion was at length rejected for several reasons:

I. The Prince of Wales was now sent out of England to be bred up in France, an enemy both to the nation and the established religion. What therefore would such an examination signify?

II. It was impossible for the people of England to know, whether he was the same person that had been carried over or not.

III. In case he should die, another might be put in his room, in such a manner, that the nation could not be sure concerning him.

IV. The English nation ought not to send into another country for witnesses to prove that he was their Prince, much less receive one upon the testimony of such as were not only aliens, but ought to be presumed enemies.

V. It was known that all the persons who had been the confidents in that matter, were conveyed away; so it was impossible to come at them, by whose means only the truth of that birth could be found out.

It is pretended, there were some who thought it a deep piece of policy, to let the Prince of Wales's title remain undecided, in order to deter the succeeding Kings from imitating King James.

At length, after a long debate, the majority of the Lords departed from their two amendments, and agreed with the vote of the Commons, "That King James had abdicated the government, and that the throne was thereby become vacant." Very likely, they who deserted the party of the Earls of Nottingham, Clarendon, and Rochester, considered, that the suggested danger of the crown's becoming elective, was not only to be compared to that which must necessarily happen, if the kingdom was left in the present confusion, or King James recalled, or the Prince of Wales acknowledged for King.

This great step being made, the next thing to be debated was, who should fill the vacant throne. The Marquis of Hallifax moved, that the crown should be given to the Prince of Orange alone, and to the two Princesses after his death. But he was not seconded. If Dr. Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, is to be credited, Bentinck, the Prince's favourite and confident, strenuously supported this proposal. The debate upon this affair was very long. It was readily agreed, that the Princess of Orange should be placed on the throne; but the question was, whether the Prince should be King of himself, or a husband of the Princess? Upon this, parties began to be formed in both Houses. Meanwhile, as the Princess was detained in Holland by the frost, and by contrary winds after the thaw, the Earl of Danby sent one over to the Princess, with an account of the present state of the debate, and to tell her, that if she desired it, he did not doubt but he should be able to carry it, for setting her alone on the throne. The Princess answered, she was the Prince's wife, and would never be other than what she should be in conjunction with him, and under him. Adding, she would take it very ill, if any, under a pretence of their care for her, would set up a divided interest between her and the Prince. Not content with this, she sent the Lord Danby's letter and her answer to the Prince, and thereby broke all the measures of those, who wished to create a misunderstanding or jealousy between them. The Earl of Danby received not the least mark of displeasure from the Prince of Orange, who continued still to employ and trust him.

At last, both Houses agreed, and voted severally, that the Prince and Princess of Orange should be King and Queen of England, but that the sole and full regal power should be in the Prince only, in the name of both. However, this was carried in the House of Lords by two or three voices only, and not without a protestation entered against it by the contrary party.

The last debate in convention, was, concerning the oaths that should be taken to the King and Queen. To avoid all cavils upon the terms, "rightful and lawful King" in the usual oath, it was thought proper to reduce the oath to the ancient simplicity of swearing, "to bear faith and true allegiance to the King and Queen." Hence arose the famous distinction of a King de facto, and a King de jure; some pretending, that they took the oath to the King and Queen, only as King and Queen de facto, whom they were bound to obey no longer than they continued in quiet possession; but that it was lawful for them to assist King James, if he should come to recover his crown, as being still their King de jure. This distinction proceeded chiefly from the clergy, who had so far entangled themselves with those strange conceits of the divine right of monarchy, and had so engaged themselves by publicly preaching Passive-obedience and Non-resistance, as an essential doctrine of the church of England, that they did not know how to disengage themselves from the snare they themselves had laid, at a time when they little thought of being ever taken in it.

At length, on the 12th of February, the Princess of Orange arrived at London, and seemed well pleased with what had been resolved, that the administration of the government should be in the Prince only, in the name of both. Thus the strict union between the Prince and Princess broke the measures of such as hoped to create a misunderstanding between them, in order to serve their old master.

The next day, the Prince and Princess of Orange being seated on two large chairs, under a canopy of state in the Banquetting-House, both Houses of the Convention waited upon them in a full body, to offer them the crown. But before they proceeded to this solemn offer, they caused the clerk of the crown to read the memorable Declaration of Rights, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons assembled at Westminster;* in which all the points which had, of late years, been disputed between the King and people, were finally determined; and the powers of royal prerogative were more narrowly circumscribed, and more exactly defined, than in any former period of the English government.

* "Whereas the late King James II. by the assistance of divers evil counsellors, judges, and ministers employed by him, did endeavour to subvert and extirpate the Protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of this kingdom; by assuming and exercising a power of dispensing with, and suspending of laws, and the execution of laws, without consent of Parliament: by committing and prosecuting divers worthy prelates, for humbly petitioning to be excused from concurring to the said assumed power: by issuing and causing to be executed, a commission under the great seal, for erecting a court, called, "The court of commissioners for ecclesiastical causes:" by levying money for and to the use of the crown, by pretence of prerogative, for other time, and in other manner, than the same was granted by Parliament: by raising and keeping a standing army within this kingdom in time of peace, without consent of Parliament; and quartering soldiers contrary to law: by causing several good subjects, being Protestants, to be disarmed at the same time, when Papists were both armed and employed contrary to law: by violating the freedom of election of members to serve in Parliament: by prosecutions in the court of King's Bench for matters and causes cognizable only in Parliament; and by divers other arbitrary and illegal courses. And whereas of late years, partial, corrupt, and unqualified persons, have been returned and served on juries in trials, and particularly divers jurors in trials for high treason, which were not freeholders; and excessive bail hath been required of persons committed in criminal cases, to elude the benefit of the laws made for liberty of the subjects; and excessive fines have been imposed; and illegal and cruel punishments inflicted; and several grants and promises made of fines and forfeitures, before any conviction or judgment against the persons upon whom the same were to be levied. All which are utterly and directly contrary to the known laws and statutes, and freedom of this realm.

"And whereas the said late King James II. having abdicated the government, and the throne being thereby vacant, his highness the Prince of Orange (whom it hath pleased the Almighty God to make the glorious instrument of delivering this kingdom from Popery and arbitrary power) did, (by the advice of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and divers principal persons of the Commons) cause letters to be written to the Lords spiritual and temporal, being Protestants, and other letters to the several counties, cities, universities, boroughs, and cinque-ports, for the chusing of such persons to represent them, as were of right to be sent to Parliament, to meet and sit at Westminster, upon the 22d day of January, in this year 1688, in order to such an establishment, as that their religion, laws, and liberties, might not again be in danger of being subverted. Upon which letters, elections having been accordingly made; and thereupon the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, pursuant to their respective letters and elections, being now assembled in a full and free representative of this nation, taking into their most serious consideration the best means for attaining the ends aforesaid, do, in the first place (as their ancestors in like cases have usually done) for the vindicating and asserting their ancient rights and liberties; declare,

"I. That the pretended power of suspending of laws, or execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of Parliament, is illegal.

"II. That the pretended power of dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal.

"III. That the commission for erecting the late court of commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, and all other commissions and courts of the like nature, are illegal and pernicious.

"IV. That the levying of money for or to the use of the crown, by pretence of prerogative, without grant of Parliament, for longer time, or in any other manner than the same is, or shall be granted, is illegal.

"V. That it is the right of the subjects to petition the King, and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning, are illegal.

"VI. That the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of Parliament, is against law.

"VII. That the subjects, which are Protestants, may have arms for their defence, suitable to their condition, and as allowed by law.

"VIII. That election of members of Parliament ought to be free.

"IX. That the freedom of speech, and debates or proceedings in Parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned, in any court or place out of Parliament.

"X. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

"XI. That Jurors ought to be duly empannelled and returned; and Jurors, which pass upon mens' trials for high-treason, ought to be free-holders.

"XII. That all grants and promises, of fines and forfeitures of persons, before conviction, are illegal and void.

"XIII. And that for redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving of the laws, Parliaments ought to be held frequently.

And they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights, and liberties; and that no declarations, judgments, doings, or proceedings, to the prejudice of the people in any of the said premises, ought in any wise to be drawn hereafter into consequence or example. To which demand of their rights, they are particularly encouraged by the declaration of his Highness the Prince of Orange, as being the only means for obtaining a full redress and remedy therein.

"Having therefore an entire confidence, that his said Highness the Prince of Orange will perfect the deliverance so far advanced by him, and will still preserve him from the violation of their rights, which they have here asserted, and from all other attempts upon their religion, rights, and liberties; the said Lords spiritual and temporal, assembled at Westminster, do resolve, that William and Mary, Prince and Princess of Orange, be, and be declared KING and QUEEN of England, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, to hold the crown and royal dignity of the said kingdoms and dominions, to them the said Prince and Princess during their lives, and the life of the survivor of them; and that the sole and full exercise of their regal power be only in, and executed by, the said Prince of Orange, in the names of the said Prince and Princess, during their joint lives; and after their decease, the said crown and royal dignity of the said kingdoms and dominions to be to the heirs of the body of the said Princess; and for the default of such issue, to the Princess Ann of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and for default of such issue, to the heirs of the body of the said Prince of Orange.

"And the said Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, do pray the said Prince and Princess of Orange, to accept the same accordingly. And that the oaths hereafter-mentioned, be taken by all persons of whom the oaths of allegiance and supremacy might be required by law instead of them; and that the said oaths of allegiance and supremacy be abrogated.

"I, A. B. do sincerely promise and swear, That I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to their Majesties King WILLIAM and Queen MARY. So help me God. I, A. B. do swear, That I do from my heart abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and heretical, this damnable doctrine and position, that Princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, or any authority of the see of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other whatsoever. "And I do declare, that no foreign Prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm." So help me God.

After the reading of this declaration, the Marquis of Hallifax, Speaker of the House of Lords, made a solemn tender of the crown to their Highnesses, in the name of both Houses, whereupon the Prince of Orange returned the following answer:

"My Lords and gentlemen, this is certainly the greatest proof of the trust you have in us, that can be given, which is the thing that makes us value it the more; and we thankfully accept what you have offered. And as I had no other intention in coming hither, than to preserve your religion, laws, and liberties, so you may be sure, that I shall endeavour to support them, and shall be willing to concur in any thing that shall be for the good of the kingdom, and to do all that is in my power to advance the welfare and glory of the nation."

All this was followed with the acclamations of the people, which quickly flew over the whole city. The same day the Prince and Princess were proclaimed King and Queen of England, France, and Ireland, by the names of WILLIAM and MARY, to the inexpressible joy of the people.*

* King James the Second's natural issue was as follows.

I. By Mrs. Arabella Churchill, sister of John, Earl of Marlborough, afterwards married to Colonel Godfrey, he had

1. James Fitz-James, Grandee of Spain, Mareschal of France, Knight of the Golden Fleece, commonly called Duke of Berwick. Outlawed in 1695.

2. Henry Fitz-James, commonly called the Grand Prior, born 1673. Outlawed in 1695. Lieutenant-General and Admiral of the French gallies. He died in France, December 7, 1702.

3. Henrietta, born 1670, who married Henry Lord Waldegrave, 1683.

II. By Mrs. Catherine Sedley, daughter of Charles Sedley, Baronet; created Baroness of Darlington, and Countess of Dorchester, afterwards married to Sir David Collier, who was made Earl of Portmore, he had Catherine Darnley, Duchess of Buckingham, born 1681. She married,

1. James Annesly, Earl of Anglesey, in October 1699. By whom she had Catherine Annesly, January 7, 1701, who married William Phips, Esq. son of Sir Constantine Phips.

2. John Sheffield, Duke of Buckinghamshire and Normandy; 1 March, 1705. By whom she had Edmund, Duke of Buckinghamshire, born 11 January, 1716.

† It is deserving of remark, that the commerce and riches of England never increased so much, within a similar period, as during the two last reigns. The two Dutch wars promoted the navigation of this island; and after Charles had made a separate peace with the States, his subjects enjoyed, unmolested, the trade of Europe. The recovery, or conquest, of New York and the Jerseys was a considerable accession to the strength and security of the English colonies; and, together with the settlement of Pensylvania and Carolina, which was effected during that reign, extended the English empire in America. In this period, several new manufactures were also established; in iron, brass, silk, hats, glass, paper, &c. One Brewer, from the Low-Countries, brought the art of dying woollen cloth into this country, and by that means saved the nation great sums of money. Sir Josiah Child states, that, in 1688, there were on the 'Change more men worth ten thousand pounds than there were in 1650 worth a thousand; that five hundred pounds with a daughter was, in the latter period, deemed a larger portion than two thousand in the former; that gentlewomen, in those earlier times, thought themselves well clothed in a serge gown, which a chamber-maid would, in 1688, be ashamed to be seen in; and that, besides the great increase of rich clothes, plate, jewels, and houshold furniture, coaches were in that time augmented a hundred fold.——The Duke of Buckingham introduced, from Venice, the manufacture of glass and crystal. Prince Rupert, a great encourager of arts and manufactures, was the inventor of etching

During the two last reigns, the people were, in a great measure, cured of that wild fanaticism by which they had formerly been so much agitated. Licentiousness and debauchery succeeded; the pleasures of the table were much pursued; love was treated rather as an appetite than as a passion; and both sexes degenerated in chastity and delicacy of sentiment.—Many of the ingenious men of this period lie under the imputation of deism: besides wits and scholars, by profession, Shaftsbury, Halifax, Buckingham, Mulgrave, Sunderland, Essex, Rochester, Sidney, Temple, &c. are supposed to have adopted these principles.

Previously to the Revolution, the liberty of the press was very imperfectly enjoyed. The Star Chamber, while that court existed, put effectual restraints upon printing. The liberty of the press did not even commence with the Revolution; as it was not till the year 1694, that the restraints were taken off.

During the Commonwealth and Protectorship, a few sedate philosophers, at Oxford, cultivated their reason, and established conferences, for the mutual communication of their discoveries in physics and geometry. Immediately after the restoration, these men procured a patent, and, having enlarged their number, were denominated the Royal Society; but the patent was all which they obtained from the King. Besides Wilkins, Wren, Wallis, eminent mathematicians; Hooke, an accurate observer by microscopes; and Sydenham, the restorer of true physic, there flourished during this period a Boyle and a Newton; men who trod with cautious and therefore secure steps the only road which leads to true philosophy.—This age was less favourable, to polite literature than to the sciences. The productions represented at this on the stage, were, most of them, such monsters of extravagance and folly, so utterly destitute of reason and common sense, that they would be the disgrace of English literature had they not been deservedly consigned to oblivion. Most of the celebrated writers of this age remain monuments of genius, perverted by indecency and bad taste. Dryden himself, admirable as were his talents, justly falls under this censure; and the very name of Rochester is offensive to modest ears. Sir William Temple is almost the only considerable writer of his day, who kept himself altogether unpolluted by that inundation of vice and licentiousness which overwhelmed the nation.

BOOK XXV.

THE REIGN OF WILLIAM III. AND MARY, COMPRISING A PERIOD OF TWELVE YEARS, TEN MONTHS, AND TWENTY-FIVE DAYS.

28. WILLIAM III. and MARY.

A. D. 1689.] THEIR Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Orange, having been crowned King and Queen of England, by the names of William and Mary, on the 11th of April, a proclamation was issued, confirming all Protestants in the offices held by them on the 1st of December 1688; and a new privy council was in a few days after nominated, consisting chiefly of the Whig party. The animosity between the two state factions immediately re-appeared. The Earl of Danby, who had devised and effected the marriage of the Prince and Princess of Orange, and who was one of the seven * who risqued their lives and fortunes by signing the original invitation to the Prince, transmitted to him through the hands of M. Zuylestein, aspired to the office of Lord High Treasurer, which he had filled during the reign of Charles II. The King however determined to put the treasury into commission; and Lord Mordaunt, created Earl of Monmouth, was declared first commissioner. Danby, thus excluded from the treasury, accepted the post of president of the council, with the title of Marquis of Carmarthen. The Earl of Shrewsbury, whose character stood high with both parties, was appointed secretary of state, jointly with the Earl of Nottingham, a determined Tory, who had refused to sign the invitation to the Prince, but declared himself willing to share the responsibility as far as secrecy would go. In the conventional debates he had vehemently opposed the vote of abdication; but he subsequently declared, "That though he would not make a King, yet upon his principles he could obey him better than those who did." The Marquis of Halifax had conducted himself with such inconsistency, as to lose the confidence of both parties. He had originally acted with the Whigs, whom he offended by the decided part which he took in opposing the Exclusion Bill, and by supporting the measures of the last years of Charles II. and the first of his successor, as president of the council. To recover his credit with the Whigs, he opposed in the convention the project of a regency, and went so far as to move that the Prince should be declared King, and the Princesses next in succession. This proposition, though negatived, raised him high in the King's favour; but it made him odious to the whole body of the Tories. He now received the privy seal. The great seal was put into commission; Maynard, Keck, and Rawlinson being nominated commissioners. Sir John Holt, a man of talent and integrity, was made chief justice of England; Admiral Herbert, a popular and skilful seaman, was placed at the head of the Admiralty; the white staves were bestowed on the Dukes of Devonshire and Dorset, (the former being appointed Lord Steward, and the latter Lord Chamberlain;) and M. Bentinck, a native of Holland, who had long been in the King's confidence, was raised to an honourable station in the King's household, and soon afterwards created Earl of Portland. Mr. Sydney, brother to Algernon Sydney, was distinguished in the new promotions, and subsequently advanced to very high offices in the state, and created Earl of Romney. The diocese of Salisbury being at this time vacant by the death of Dr. Seth Ward, the King nominated as his successor Dr. Burnet, who had been an active and zealous instrument in accomplishing the revolution.† The primate, Sancroft, positively refused to consecrate the new Bishop; but, at length, dreading the penalties of a premunire, he granted a commission to the Bishop of London and three other suffragans to exercise his metropolitical authority.

On proposing the question in council, whether it were necessary to dissolve the convention and to call a new Parliament, the voices were divided; but the Whigs, aware of the inconveniences which would result from a dissolution, and satisfied with the apparent disposition of the Commons, were unanimous in the negative. The King, therefore, went in state to the House of Lords, and, from the throne, recommended to both Houses to "Consider of the most effectual means to prevent the inconveniences which might arise from delays in accomplishing whatever measures they might have in contemplation for the good of the nation." A bill was immediately brought in, and carried expeditiously through the House of Lords, to remove and prevent all questions and disputes concerning the assem-

* Danby, Shrewsbury, Devonshire, Lumley, the Bishop of London, Admiral Russel, and H. Sydney.

† Gilbert Burnet, whom we have so often had occasion to mention, was born at Edinburgh, in 1643, and educated at Aberdeen. In 1664 he went to Holland, where he studied the Hebrew language, and on his return was ordained and presented to the living of Saltoun. In 1669 he was appointed divinity professor at Glasgow, and soon after was employed in writing the Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton. About the same time he married the daughter of the Earl of Cassilis. In 1672 he published a Vindication of the Church and State of Scotland, and received the offer of a bishopric, which he declined. In 1674 he resigned his professorship and settled in London, where he became preacher at the Rolls and lecturer at St. Clement's. In 1679 appeared the first volume of his History of the Reformation, for which he received the thanks of Parliament. This work he afterwards completed in 3 vols. He also published a judicious abridgment of it. His conduct at the trial and execution of Lord Russel was so displeasing to the court, that he was dismissed from his lectureship and from his situation at the Rolls by royal mandate. At the accession of King James he went abroad, and after travelling through France, Switzerland, Italy, and Germany, settled in Holland, where he was in great favour with the Prince of Orange. King James sent to the States to deliver him up; but Dr. Burnet having married a Dutch lady, was considered as a citizen of Holland, and the demand was refused. He accompanied the Prince of Orange to England, and in 1689, as mentioned above, was made Bishop of Salisbury. His first pastoral letter gave offence to both Houses, on account of the Bishop's asserting the title of the King and Queen to the crown as the right of conquest, and it was ordered to be burnt by the hangman. In 1698 he lost his lady, and soon after married Mrs. Berkeley. In 1699 appeared his Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, a work of considerable value. He died in 1715, and was interred in the church of St. James's, Clerkenwell. Besides the above, he published an excellent Treatise on Pastoral Care, and several Sermons. The History of his own Times appeared in 1724, and is very entertaining, though far from being impartial. The Bishop possessed many virtues, but he was vain, officious, and credulous. He had three sons. William, the eldest, died Governor of New England, in 1729; Gilbert was chaplain to the King, and defended Hoadley in the Bangorian controversy; Thomas became a Judge of the common pleas, and died in 1753.

bling and sitting of this present Parliament. In the Commons, however, the Tories maintained, that if the convention were in itself an illegal assembly, its acts could not be legalized by giving it the name of a Parliament—that the King's writ was as necessary as his presence to constitute a legal Parliament—that the convention of 1660 was called by the consent, if not by the authority, of the lawful King, and when there was no great seal in being to affix to the writs; notwithstanding which it had never been considered as a legal Parliament, its acts were ratified in a subsequent Parliament, and thence they derived their validity. No constitutional power existing, therefore, by which the convention could be converted into a Parliament, they inferred that it must of necessity be dissolved, and a new Parliament summoned. The Whigs replied, that the whole of the proceedings relative to the revolution now accomplished were in a legal sense irregular and anomalous to established principles of the constitution; but that essentials must not be sacrificed to forms. From a view of English history it was apparent, that it was never considered by our ancestors as so material how the King, Lords, and Commons came together, as that they were together. Various precedents were adduced, in support of this point; the arguments of the Whigs prevailed; and the Commons agreeing to the bill, the convention was from that time called the Parliament.

The 1st of March was appointed for taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; but several dissatisfied members, chiefly of the Upper House, retired into the country. When summoned to give their attendance, the Earls of Clarendon, Litchfield, Exeter, and eight of the Bishops, including the Primate Sancroft, continued contumacious. The example of the Bishops was followed by many of the inferior clergy, who were consequently deprived of their benefices. The recusant prelates * were at first suspended from their episcopal functions, and it was not till after an interval of more than a year that the vacant sees were filled with men of less scrupulous principles.†

Soon afterwards the faction of the non-jurors, and many who had taken the oaths to the government, were discovered by intercepted letters to be engaged in secret practices against it; in consequence of which, the Earl of Arran, Sir Robert Hamilton, and some others were committed to the Tower, and a bill was passed for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act—for the first time since that far-famed law had been enacted. At this period, a spirit of mutiny broke out in the army; and the royal Scotch regiment of horse and that of Dumbarton, having declared for King James, began their march from England to the North, but were pursued by General Ginckel, and compelled to surrender at discretion. This incident gave rise to the bill, now annually renewed, for punishing mutiny and desertion.

The revenue of the crown, which had been settled upon the late King for life, was declared by the House of Commons to be expired, though the courtiers pretended that the revenue had devolved to the present sovereign with the crown. They now established a distinction between the ordinary and extraordinary expenditure of the nation; settling by a provisional act the sum of 600,000*l.* upon the crown, to defray the necessary demands of the civil governments, under the appellation of the civil list; and leaving all the remaining supplies to be voted upon estimate, and appropriated to specific services, stated by ministers, and approved by the Parliament. At this political novelty, the King was not perfectly pleased; particularly as the civil list itself was granted for so short a term as one year only.‡ To extend his popularity, the King expressed, in a message to the Commons, his readiness to acquiesce in any regulations they should think proper to adopt for the suppression of hearth money, which he understood to be a grievous imposition on the subject. This tax was ultimately abolished; but in a few years afterwards, a heavy duty on windows was laid on. By the King's recommendation, also, the House of Commons voted 600,000*l.* as a compensation to the States General for the expence incurred by them in fitting out the fleet which brought the Prince of Orange to England. Another important measure brought forward during the present session, though not carried into full effect till the succeeding one, was the conversion of the Declaration of Rights, already mentioned, into the Bill of Rights. An important clause was inserted in this bill, disabling Papists from the succession to the crown—to which the Lords added, or such as should marry Papists—and absolving the subjects in this case from their allegiance.

His Majesty was now extremely solicitous that an act of Indemnity, with certain exceptions, should immediately pass. The infamous Jefferies, was under close confinement in the Tower; and Wright, formerly Lord Chief Justice of England, with several of the late judges, &c. were prisoners in Newgate. However, under the specious pretext of the difficulty of making the proper exceptions, and of the encouragement which a general indemnity would afford to the partisans of James, the bill was lost for the present session.§

King William had given a proof of his freedom from religious bigotry, when, in his speech to the two Houses on passing the Habeas Corpus Act, he expressed his hope, that in providing against Papists they would leave room for the admission of all Protestants who were willing and able to serve; affirming, that such a conjunction would unite them more firmly amongst themselves, and strengthen them against their common adversaries. When the bill for abrogating the old and appointing the new oaths was brought forward, a clause was inserted to remove the necessity, with respect to Protestants, of taking the sacramental test as a qualification for office. This, though strongly supported by the Whigs, particularly by the Marquis of Halifax, was ultimately negatived. A spirited protest was signed by the Lords Delamere, Wharton, Mordaunt, &c. against the rejection of this clause. To conciliate the Tories, the King was desirous to mitigate the severity of the bill, by vesting a discretionary power in the crown to dispense with the oaths in respect to the established clergy, the greater part of whom were notoriously inimical to the government. However, as the zeal of the Tories had defeated the former clause, the violence of the Whigs prevented the adoption of the latter.

To accomplish the project of a comprehension, a bill was introduced into the House of Lords, under the title of a bill for uniting their Majesties' Protestant subjects; by which many points in dispute between the church and dissenters respecting the use of the cross and surplice, &c. were conceded to the latter, and some verbal alterations admitted in the liturgy. This giving little satisfaction to many of the Lords, a proviso was offered, extending the prospect of reformation;—"That, in imitation of the acts passed in the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. a number of persons both of the clergy and laity might be empowered to prepare such a reformation of things relating to the church, as might be offered to King and Parliament in order to the healing

* Sancroft, of Canterbury; Turner, of Ely; Lake, of Chichester; Ken, of Bath and Wells; White, of Peterborough; Lloyd, of Norwich; Thomas, of Worcester; and Frampton, of Gloucester; were the non-juring Bishops. The five first, were of the number of the seven Bishops sent to the Tower by King James for refusing to promulgate the declaration of indulgence.

† The new metropolitan, Dr. Tillotson, sustained a high character for moderation, wisdom, and probity. Sancroft retired to a small paternal estate in Norfolk, cultivating his garden with his own hands, and enjoying in quiet the sacrifices he had made for conscience' sake.

‡ King William declared, "that without a settled revenue a King was but a pageant;" "he understood," he said, "the good of a Common-wealth as well as of a kingly government, and it was not easy to determine which was best: but he was sure the worst of all governments was that of a King without treasure and without power."

§ Amongst those excepted by name were the Chief Justices Herbert and Wright, the Lords Jefferies and Sunderland, the Bishops of Durham, Chester, &c. Lord Warrington informs us, "that the party most affected by the bill retarded their proceedings by throwing stumbling-blocks from time to time in their way"—thinking, probably, that their peril would be greatly increased, by such an act of grace and favour as this.

of our divisions, and the correcting what might be amiss or defective in our constitution." This was strenuously opposed by Bishop Burnet; and, in consequence of his intervention, it was thrown out by a small majority. Against this decision a strong protest was entered upon the journals of the House. The bill was at length sent down to the Commons, where it was opposed by the whole strength of the high church party; and being very feebly supported by the dissenters, the leaders of whom were secretly averse from the scheme, it was finally lost. An address to the throne was moved and carried by the opponents of the bill, in which the Lords concurred, thanking his Majesty for his gracious declarations and repeated assurances that he would maintain the church of England established by law—and humbly praying that, according to the ancient usage and practice of the kingdom, in time of Parliament, his Majesty would be pleased to issue his writs for calling a convocation of the clergy to be advised in ecclesiastical matters; and assuring his Majesty that it was their intention forthwith to proceed to the consideration of giving ease to Protestant dissenters. The way being thus paved for the act of toleration, it passed rapidly through both Houses, and received the royal assent. From this toleration the Papists were expressly excluded.

As the only remaining chance of effecting any plan of ecclesiastical comprehension, the King summoned a convocation, which met in the autumn of the present year; previously to which a special commission was issued to ten Bishops and twenty dignitaries of the church to prepare such alterations of the liturgy and canons as might be proper to lay before the convocation. A great majority of these were of the moderate party; but, in the number were included several of a different complexion, such as Lamplugh, Archbishop of York; Mew and Sprat, Bishops of Winchester and Rochester; Jane, Divinity Professor at Oxford; Aldrich, Dean of Christchurch, &c. Scarcely had the commission been opened, in the Jerusalem chamber, than its legality and authority were called in question by Dr. Sprat. He was informed that the commissioners pretended to no authority, but were met merely to consult upon such matters as it might be necessary to arrange and prepare for the consideration of the convocation; notwithstanding which, he retired in high disgust, with Mew, Jane, and Aldrich. The commissioners, however, proceeded to digest a plan of reform, resembling that of the bill of comprehension. On the ensuing meeting of the convocation, it appeared that the court or moderate party would be left in a minority, by the choice of Dr. Jane as prolocutor, in opposition to Dr. Tillotson. When presented for approbation to the Bishop of London, who officiated as præses of the convocation during the suspension of Sancroft, the prolocutor delivered it as the sense of the Lower House, that such was the transcendent excellence of the liturgy, that it needed no amendment. A prorogation took place, in the hope of a more conciliatory decision; and at their second meeting (December 4, 1689,) the Earl of Nottingham delivered a message from the King expressed in the mildest terms, and exhorting them calmly and impartially to attend to the propositions which were to be laid before them, which would assuredly tend to the honour, peace, and advantage of the Protestant religion in general, and particularly of the church of England. After much contention, the Lower House of convocation acceded to an address proposed by the Bishops, "Thanking his Majesty for his gracious message, and expressing their fidelity and allegiance to his person:" at the same time they resolved not to enter into any debates respecting alterations. Perceiving its hopes entirely frustrated, the court now determined to put a period to the sitting of the convocation. The session of Parliament, protracted to the period of seven months, had been previously terminated on the 20th of August 1689. In the course of it, the attainder of Lord Russel, whose execution is stiled in the act a murder, and that of Algernon Sydney, were reversed.

The convention of estates in Scotland met at Edinburgh on the 14th of March 1689; and the Duke of Hamilton was chosen president by a great majority, in opposition to the Marquis of Athol, who was supported by the partisans of the late King James. Expresses arriving nearly at the same time, with letters from William and James to the convention, it was decided, after a vehement debate, that King William's letter should be the first read. It recommended to the convention, "To enter upon such consultations as were best calculated to settle the public welfare upon sure and lasting foundations; exhorted them to lay aside all animosities and factions which might impede so good a work; and expressed an earnest wish for the accomplishment of a union of the two kingdoms, as the most effectual means of securing the happiness and prosperity of both nations. A committee was immediately appointed to draw up a respectful answer to this letter; and as it was thought, that the letter of King James, then about to be read, might contain some clause to dissolve the assembly or annul their proceedings, a unanimous resolution was passed, "That the convention was a free and lawful meeting of the estates; and that they would continue undissolved until they had settled and secured the Protestant religion, the government, laws, and liberties of the kingdom."—James's letter was found to contain a violent declamation against the authors and abettors of what he stiled "The blackest of usurpations, and the most unjust as well as unnatural of all attempts; and warning the convention to avoid, by a loyalty suitable to the many professions they had made, the infamy and disgrace they must bring upon themselves in this world, and the condemnation due to the rebellious in the next." Irritated by these reproaches, they ordered the messenger to be taken into custody, and after some time dismissed him with a pass instead of an answer.

A committee of twenty-four persons, consisting of eight members selected out of each of the three estates of Lords, Knights, and Burgesses, was now appointed to prepare and digest the plan of a new settlement; and, in a few days, they came to the following resolution: "The estates of the kingdom of Scotland find and declare that King James VII. being a professed Papist, did assume the royal power, and acted as a King without ever taking the oath required by law; and had, by the advice of evil and wicked counsellors, invaded the fundamental constitution of this kingdom, and altered it from a legal and limited monarchy to an arbitrary despotic power; and had governed the same to the subversion of the Protestant religion, and violation of the laws and liberties of the nation, inverting all the ends of government; whereby he had forfeited the right of the crown, and the throne was become vacant." This resolution was adopted and confirmed by the convention, with the exception of five dissentient voices only—the adherents of the late King James having previously seceded from the assembly. The new sovereigns were on the same day proclaimed at the market cross of Edinburgh. The Earl of Argyle (who had been permitted to take his seat, notwithstanding the attainder of his father,) Sir James Montgomery and Sir John Dalrymple were then nominated commissioners to invest their Majesties with the royal dignity; and on the 11th of May 1689, they were introduced to the King and Queen at Whitehall, and delivered to them, together with a letter from the estates,

I. The instrument of government.

II. A paper containing a catalogue of the national grievances.

III. An address to the King for turning the convention into a Parliament—to all which the King replied very graciously.

The coronation oath was then tendered; but, as it contained a clause, "That they would be careful to root out all heretics and enemies to the true worship of God, &c." the King protested that he did not mean to bind himself by these words to become a persecutor. The commissioners replying, that neither the meaning of the oath nor the law of Scotland did import it; his Majesty rejoined, that he took the oath in that sense, and called upon the commissioners themselves and others present to witness that he did so.

The whole kingdom seemed to submit to the new authority, the castle of Edinburgh excepted, of which the Duke of Gordon, a Papist, was governor. Upon being summoned by the convention, he peremptorily refused to deliver up the fortress; upon which he was publicly proclaimed a traitor and rebel. But a formidable opposition to the new government was soon excited by the celebrated Viscount Dundee; who had formed himself upon the model of the heroic Montrose. Having left the convention with the rest of the seceders, he quitted Edinburgh at the head of about 50 horse. On being asked whither he was going, his answer was, "Wherever the spirit of Montrose shall direct me." In the interior of the country, he soon collected a considerable force, entirely composed of highlanders. He soon made a rapid and alarming progress; and receiving great promises of support from the late King, he flattered himself with the hope of ultimately restoring the royal authority in Scotland. Being closely followed by General Mackay, and the English army, after various marches and counter-marches the two armies came to an engagement May the 26th, 1689, at the pass of Killicranky, some miles above Dunkeld. The English troops were entirely broken in less than ten minutes: the dragoons fled at the first charge, and the whole train of artillery fell into the hands of the enemy. The victory thus obtained appeared decisive, when a random shot put an end to the life of Dundee; and General Mackay, taking advantage of the circumstance, rallied his men, and retrieved the battle thus apparently lost. Struck with grief and consternation, the highlanders were never after able to make head; and they almost universally took the benefit of the pardon offered by King William. The Duke of Gordon, despairing of relief, surrendered the castle of Edinburgh at discretion on the 13th of June 1689: so that the whole island of Britain now acknowledged the sovereignty of the new monarch.

Ireland, however, was far from following this example. In March, 1689, the King, by message, informed the Parliament, that the late King had sailed from Brest with French troops in order to effect a landing in Ireland; on which a joint address was presented, declaring "That they would with their lives and fortunes assist his Majesty in supporting the alliances abroad, in the reduction of Ireland, and in defending the religion and laws of the kingdom." In April the House of Commons further resolved, "That in case his Majesty thought fit to engage in the war with France, the House would give him all such assistance in a Parliamentary way as should enable him to support and go through with the same." In a subsequent address, founded on this resolution, they expressed their confidence, that through his Majesty's wisdom the alliances already made and hereafter to be concluded, would be effectual to reduce the French King to a condition that it might not be in his power hereafter to violate the peace of christendom. On the 7th of May following, 1689, war was formally declared against France.

James, on his arrival in France, had been received by Louis with the utmost hospitality and kindness; and hopes were given him that he should be speedily re-established on his throne. James, however, evinced no symptoms of spirit or understanding. His faculties appeared to be absorbed in the lowest superstition. His favourite occupation was holding conferences with the jesuits, into which order he had been initiated, on the mysteries of religion. He consequently became the subject of public contempt and derision in France. Great naval and military preparations, however, were made with a view of accomplishing his restoration. Early in March, a fleet of 14 ships of the line was collected at Brest, on board of which James embarked with a considerable body of troops, Irish, French, and English, commanded chiefly by French officers, under M. Rosen, a general of approved skill and courage. At parting, Louis, embracing James with demonstrations of high regard, said, "The best thing I can wish your Majesty is, that I may never see you again." The whole armament arrived safely at Kinsale, where a landing was effected without opposition on the 22d of March, 1689.

Lieutenant General Hamilton, an Irish officer of great address, and at this time a prisoner of war, in England, having served in the armies of France, was at his own request suffered to go on his parole to Ireland, with a view to persuade the Lord Lieutenant, Tyrconnel to surrender. If there were any previous indecision in the counsels of Lord Tyrconnel, it vanished on his interview with Hamilton, who, with the most profligate dereliction of principle, used every effort to confirm him in his attachment to King James, and exerted himself to the utmost, in support of the same cause. On James's arrival in Ireland, the whole kingdom seemed to be at his devotion. Tyrconnel had disarmed the Protestants, and assembled an army of forty thousand Catholics well provided by means of the supplies sent from France: and about the end of March, James made his public entrance into Dublin, and assisted at a solemn mass.

A strong squadron under Admiral Herbert was fitted out with all expedition, with the view of intercepting the French fleet on its return: on the 1st of May it came in sight of the enemy, lying at anchor in Bantry bay. The French perceiving an engagement inevitable, bore down in line of battle; but Admiral Herbert not being able to gain the wind, the ships fought at a great distance; and, the engagement proving indecisive, both sides boasted of the victory. The French, however, had some reason to be elated with the success of the expedition; their commander having landed his troops, repulsed the enemy, taking several prizes, and brought his ships back to Brest in good condition and without loss, in the course of a few weeks.

A Parliament was convened by James to meet in Dublin on the 7th of May 1689, by which the famous act of settlement, passed soon after the restoration, was triumphantly repealed. Thus two thirds of the Protestants in Ireland were deprived of their estates, without any exception or consideration. Even the estate of Sir Phelim O'Neil, the notorious rebel, was unconditionally restored to his descendants.*

The bill of repeal was followed by an act attainting all Protestant absentees; the attainder also reaching all such as from and after the 1st of August 1688, corresponded with any who were in actual rebellion, or who were any ways aiding, abetting, or assisting thereto; that is, the whole body of Irish Protestants, who were universally attached to the new government. By a barbarous and bloody clause, supposed to have been inserted at the express desire of James, the monarch was debarred the power of pardoning after the last day of the ensuing month of November 1689—the pardon, if not enrolled previously to that time being declared null and void.†

Londonderry almost singly adopted the resolution of shutting

* The chief supporter of the bill in the House of Lords was the Lord Chancellor Fitton; a wretch, if possible, more infamous than the English Chancellor Jefferies; he had been taken from prison, where he had lain several years a convicted felon under punishment for the crime of forgery, and placed by King James at the head of the law department in Ireland, with no other merit than that of a furious zeal for Popery, or rather rage approaching the limits of insanity, combined with the most abject subserviency to the mandates of the court.

† Another act was passed, of a different and more ambiguous nature, to abolish the dependency of Ireland upon the Parliament of England, and to prohibit the transmission of all writs of error and appeal to the English courts of judicature. A bill was also introduced for the repeal of Poyning's law; but this James angrily resisted. A law was indeed enacted for liberty of conscience; but as this indulgence was not to take place till after the legal massacre of the Protestants, it seemed only calculated to add insult to injury. A royal proclamation was about the same time issued, forbidding above five Protestants meeting any where upon pain of death; and the question being submissively asked, whether this prohibition extended to the churches, Colonel Luttrel, Governor of the city, declared that it was intended to prevent their assembling there as well as in other places; in consequence of which the Protestant clergy were universally silenced, and the religious assemblies of Protestants every where suppressed.

shutting its gates against King James. Colonel Lundy had been appointed governor of this place. At a council of war, this cowardly or traitorous officer declared that the place was not tenable: a message was consequently sent to James, who was on his march to the city, offering to negotiate, and requesting that the army might halt at the distance of four miles from the town. James, however, in violation, as it is said of an agreement signed by General Hamilton, in the evening of the 18th of April, encamped under the walls of the city. Exasperated at this refusal to treat, the besieged made a furious sally, and compelled the King's forces to retire in disorder to St. John's town. The governor finding himself the object of popular rage, and perceiving that his schemes were frustrated, made his escape in disguise; and the inhabitants chose Major Baker and Mr. Walker, a clergyman, joint governors. These gentlemen prepared for defence with most heroic resolution. The city was imperfectly fortified; the cannon were badly mounted; they had no engineer to direct their operations; the garrison were undisciplined; they were destitute of stores, and exposed to the attack of a numerous and enraged enemy, provided with all the means for a regular siege, with the King at their head. Yet was there no mention of a surrender. The batteries were opened; but in every attack the besiegers were repulsed with considerable loss. Soon, however, the garrison and inhabitants had the additional calamities to contend against, of a contagious disorder and a scarcity of provisions, which by degrees arose to an absolute famine. Wearied with the perseverance of the besieged, James withdrew to Dublin, and left the command with Rosen, who declared that he would rase the town to its foundations, and destroy all the inhabitants without distinction of age or sex, if they any longer delayed their submission. Finding his threats ineffectual, he ordered all the Protestant inhabitants of the neighbourhood, to the amount of several thousands, to be drawn under the walls of Londonderry, there to perish, should the refusal to surrender be persisted in. At the same time he declared, that he would lay the whole country waste if any attempt were made for their relief. The Bishop of Meath having remonstrated to the King in person against these cruelties, James replied, "That General Rosen was a foreigner, and accustomed to these proceedings;—but that he had ordered him to desist." A prospect of relief at length appeared. An armament from England appeared in the Lough, having on board a considerable body of troops; but the enemy had erected batteries opposite the ships, and thrown a boom composed of timber, chains, and cables, across the narrow part of the river, so that it was doubtful whether the passage could be forced. Taking advantage however of a favourable gale, the Montjoy boldly sailed athwart and broke the boom: she was run aground by the violence of the shock; but, firing a broad side at the enemy, who attempted to board her, she cleared and righted, and passed the boom, followed by the Phœnix and Dartmouth. They now proceeded without farther molestation to the city, where they were received with transports of joy, the garrison being reduced to the last extremity. M. de Rosen immediately raised the siege, July 31, 1689, with the greatest precipitation, having lost eight or nine thousand men before its walls, with more than a hundred officers. The heroic defence of Londonderry was attended with the most important consequences. The town of Inniskillen also distinguished itself by a very gallant and successful resistance.

On the 12th of August 1689, General Schomberg, who had accompanied King William on his expedition to England, and who now held the chief command of the army destined for the relief of Ireland, landed with his troops, amounting to about sixteen thousand men, at Carrickfergus. After taking possession of the towns of Carrickfergus and Belfast with little opposition, he began his march to the southward. Upon his approach the Irish abandoned Newry, a strong post, and Dundalk; and here, in a situation very ineligible, M. Schomberg encamped his army in a low moist ground, having the town of Dundalk and the river towards the south, the Newry mountains to the east, and to the north hills and morasses intermixed. He meant, it is said, to continue his progress, but was disappointed of his train of artillery, which was to have been embarked at Chester for Carlingford. The army, therefore, remained wholly inactive during the autumnal months at Dundalk. Rosen, hearing that the English general halted at Dundalk, said he was sure Schomberg wanted something, and he ventured to advance as far as Ardee. No provocation, however, could induce Schomberg to engage, being much inferior in force, and conceiving the loss of a battle to be the loss of Ireland. King William repeatedly urged him in his letters to put something to the hazard, but he would not deviate from his plan of defence. This general was now upwards of eighty years of age; and after the numerous victories which had distinguished his military career, he would not risque the disgrace of a defeat from an army of Irish rebels. In the interim, a detachment of the Irish army under Colonel Sarsfield, seized on the important town of Sligo. Winter approaching, both armies went into quarters, to the great discontent of the English, who had formed high expectations from the skill and conduct of General Schomberg.

After a very short recess, the English Parliament met on the 19th of October, 1689, and the session was opened by a speech from the throne, remarkable for being the composition of the King himself. The House of Commons, in the very spirit of the speech, expressed their unanimous determination to prosecute the war against the French, in conjunction with the allies, and immediately voted a large supply. A committee was then appointed to examine who were the advisers and prosecutors of the murders, as they were termed, of Russel, Sydney, Armstrong, &c. and who were chiefly concerned in the practices touching the writs of Quo Warranto, and the surrender of charters. This enquiry was levelled at the Marquis of Hallifax, who had resigned his office of Speaker to the House of Lords, and now saw the necessity also of relinquishing the Privy-Seal, and withdrawing entirely from court. At this period, pressing instances were made by the Tories to the King to dissolve the Parliament. These intrigues coming to the knowledge of the Whigs, a bill was introduced by them into the House of Commons, for restoring corporations to their rights and privileges. It contained the following clause: "that every Mayor, Recorder, &c. of any city or borough, who did not consent to or join in the surrender of any charters, or did solicit or contribute to the charge of prosecuting any scire facias or information in the nature of a quo warranto, shall be adjudged incapable of holding or executing any office of trust in such a capacity for the space of seven years." After a violent contest, the clause was negatived; and, in this state, the bill was transmitted to the Lords, by whom it was passed, though not without some difficulty. The King, however, had been persuaded, that to give his assent to the bill, even in this form, would be a virtual surrender of himself to the Whigs. To avoid the consequences of a rupture with the latter, he went to the House of Peers on the 27th of January, 1690, and, after announcing his intention to repair in person to Ireland, prorogued the Parliament to the 2d of April. On the 6th of February, a proclamation was issued for its dissolution, and a new Parliament was summoned to meet on the 20th of March, 1690.

Before the Parliament was prorogued, General Ludlow, a member of the high court of justice which had sentenced King Charles I. to the block, unexpectedly made his appearance in England, with a view of being employed in Ireland, where he had formerly served with great credit. Having been excepted in the act of indemnity passed at the Restoration, he had retired to Vevay in Switzerland, where he had resided many years. Soon after his arrival in this country, the House of Commons were induced to vote an address to the King, to issue his royal proclamation for the apprehension of the regicide, which the King complied with, but not till Ludlow had safely arrived in Holland, whence he returned to Vevay, where he wrote his well known Memoirs.

A. D. 1690.] King William's displeasure at the Whigs appeared by the dismission of the Lords Monmouth and Delamere from the Treasury, of which Sir John Lowther was appointed first commissioner, under whom Mr. Hampden acted as Chancellor of the Exchequer. The complexion of the new Parliament appeared by their choice of Sir John Trevor as Speaker, who had occupied the same office in the Parliament held in the late reign. The King, after repeating his former declaration to prosecute the war in Ireland in person, urged the settlement of the revenue, and stated, that having often unavailingly recommended a general indemnity to the last Parliament, he now proposed sending them an Act of Grace, with only a few exceptions. He recommended an union between England and Scotland, as an event which would be productive of great benefit to both nations.

The Tory interest predominated in the new Parliament; but the Whigs retained sufficient influence to prevent the revenue being settled for life; and it was agreed that the hereditary excise should be granted for life, and the Customs for four years from Christmas 1690. The first great trial of strength between the two parties was occasioned by a bill introduced into the House of Lords, recognizing their Majesties as the rightful and lawful sovereigns of these realms, and declaring all the acts of the last Parliament to be good and valid. This very much perplexed the Tories. The words "rightful and lawful" were strongly objected against, and at length dropped as superfluous. Respecting the latter clause, the Tories would only consent to enact, that the laws passed in the last Parliament should be good for the time to come. After a violent debate the bill was committed: but the declaratory clause was lost on the report by six voices; which occasioned one of the most able and decisive protests upon record.* In consequence of this exertion the clause was restored; upon which the Tory Lords in their turn, signed a protest, in which they affirmed, that the declaring of laws to be good which had been passed in a Parliament not called by writ in due form of law, was destructive of the legal constitution of the monarchy. This gave such offence, that the Whigs moved and triumphantly carried, a resolution for expunging the protest from the Journals of the House. In the Commons, the Tories declined the contest; and, when a solitary member presumed to question the legality of the Convention, Somers, the Solicitor General, answered, "that if the Convention Parliament was not a legal Parliament, they who were then met, and who had taken the oaths enacted by that Parliament, were guilty of high-treason—the laws repealed by it were still in force—they must therefore return to their allegiance to King James. All the moneys levied, collected, and paid, by virtue of the acts of that Parliament, made every one concerned in the execution of such acts highly criminal." Struck with these arguments, the House passed the bill without farther debate; and thus the Tories themselves gave the last hand to that settlement which they had hitherto affected both to consider and represent as illegal.

Another measure, still more obnoxious to the Tories than the former, was a bill requiring from all persons holding offices, ecclesiastical, civil, or military, an oath abjuring the late King James and his title. King William entirely disapproved this bill, recommending the House of Commons, "to go to other matters that were more pressing;" and on a division it was rejected by a majority of 192 against 165. A bill for reversing the judgment on a Quo Warranto against the city of London, for restoring it to its ancient rights and privileges, and declaring the charters granted since the late judgment null and void, passed, with a proviso, that the act should not extend to discharge any of those persons who had acted as magistrates in virtue of those charters without the legal qualifications. Another bill soon followed, ordering the 500l. forfeitures, to which those persons were liable who had acted in any civil or military capacity in the late reign, in violation of the Test laws, to be paid into the Exchequer.

The session concluded May 21, 1690, with the Act of Grace announced by the King, which passed without debate, division or amendment in either House.†

Disgusted at the turn things had now taken, the Earl of Shrewsbury determined upon resigning the Seals as Secretary of State, not yielding even to the entreaties of the King to retain possession of them till his return from Ireland. Affairs were now entirely in the hands of Carmarthen and Nottingham, who hated the Whigs as republicans and levellers, and by whom they were equally detested as men of intolerant, and despotic principles.

It was on the 4th of June, 1690, that King William set out for Ireland, attended by the Prince of Denmark, the Duke of Ormond, and many other Noblemen and Gentlemen. On the 14th, he arrived at Belfast, where he was met by Marechal Schomberg, who had obtained several advantages during the winter campaign. The important post of Charlemont, with several others, was reduced; and upon the whole, the province of Ulster was nearly recovered. The King now declared, "that he did not come to Ireland to let the grass grow under his feet." On a general review of the troops on the arrival of all the reinforcements, they were found to amount to 36,000 effective men, English and foreigners. William immediately began his march to Dundalk, and afterwards advanced to Ardee, which the Irish, with James at their head, quitted upon his approach, and repassed the Boyne, encamping on the southern banks of the river. The Irish army was inferior in numbers, and also in courage and discipline, to that of the English; but James, contrary to the advice of his officers, who proposed strengthening their garrisons and retiring beyond the Shannon, was determined to risque a general engagement on this spot. The river was deep; and, his front being farther secured by a morass and rising ground, he could not be attacked without evident disadvantage; so that he expressed much "satisfaction in this opportunity of fighting one fair battle for his crown." On the 30th of June King William encamped at break of day with his whole army on the northern side of the Boyne, resolved, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Schomberg, to pass the river and attack the enemy the next day. Upon reconnoitring the enemy's camp, the King made at one place so long a stop, that it was perceived by a party of horse on the opposite side; who, bringing a couple of field pieces to bear upon him, at the first discharge killed a man and two horses very near to his person, and by the second the King himself was slightly wounded, the ball grazing the right shoulder. William treated this as a trifle; but it occasioned great confusion amongst his attendants; and the report of his death flew rapidly to Dublin, and even to Paris, where it was celebrated with bonfires and illuminations. Previously to his retiring to his tent, the King rode through the ranks by torch-light, to produce the most perfect conviction of his safety. The plan of the battle, without any previous communication, was transmitted by the King to Marechal Schomberg late in the evening: that General received it with dissatisfaction, declaring that it was the first which he had ever so received.

On the morning of the 1st of July, 1690, the army

* At the conclusion, the Protesting Lords thus expressed themselves: "If the last was no Parliament, and their acts no law, the nation is engaged in a war without the consent of Parliament, the old oaths of supremacy and allegiance remain in force, and the nation forced under colour of law to swear fidelity to King William. The Peers and Commons now assembled are under a perpetual disability; and the nation is involved in endless doubts and confusions, without any legal settlement, or possibility to arrive at it, unless a Parliament be summoned by King James's writ, and the oaths of allegiance taken to him."

† Some of the more remarkable exceptions in the Act of Grace were, the Marquis of Powis; the Earls of Sunderland, Melfort, Huntingdon, and Castlemain; Lord Chief Justice Herbert; the Bishops of Durham and St. David's; the Judges Withers, Jenner, and Holloway, &c. in all about thirty; of whom it does not appear that any were prosecuted to conviction, excepting such as were afterwards concerned in plots against the government.

BATTLE OF THE BOYNE.

passed in three bodies at Sloane to the westward, Old Bridge in the centre, and certain fords nearer Drogheda to the left. The respective divisions of the English army vied with each other in gallantry, and nobly repulsed the attempts of the Irish to obstruct the passage. M. Caillemotte, a French refugee officer of great merit, on receiving a mortal wound at the head of his regiment, was carried back to the English camp, and, meeting others crossing the river; encouraged them by exclaiming "A la gloire, mes enfans—à la gloire!" (To glory, my lads; to glory!) M. Schomberg perceiving the French Protestants exposed, and in some disorder, from the loss of their commander, passed the river in haste without his armour, with all the ardour of youth, to put himself at their head. In a short time he fell; whether by the fire of his own men, or of the enemy, could not be clearly ascertained.* The courage, activity, and presence of mind of the King himself were extremely conspicuous during the whole of this engagement; in the course of which he repeatedly charged the enemy sword in hand. An English soldier in the heat of the battle pointing his piece at him, he turned it aside without emotion, saying only, "Do you not know your friends?" The day was far advanced, and the Irish began to retire on all sides: General Hamilton, who commanded the horse, making a furious charge, in the desperate hope of retrieving the battle, was wounded and taken prisoner. When brought into the presence of the King, who knew him to be the life and soul of the Irish army, William asked him, "if he thought the enemy would make any farther resistance?" to which Hamilton replied, "Upon my honour, I believe they will." The King, regarding him with a look of disdain, repeated, "Your HONOR!" but took no other notice of his treachery. The Irish now fled; but William having neglected the advice of Schomberg to secure the pass of Duleek, they suffered little loss in their flight. The King also, recalling his troops from the pursuit, expressed himself averse to the unnecessary sacrifice of life.

James kept his station with a few squadrons of horse on the hill of Dunoré, to the south of the river, viewing through a telescope from the tower of the church the movements of the two armies. On learning that he was in danger of being surrounded, he marched off to Duleek, and thence in great haste to Dublin. There he assembled the Magistrates and council, and told them, "that the army he had depended upon had basely fled the field, nor could they be prevailed upon to rally, though the loss in the defeat was but inconsiderable; so that henceforward he determined never more to head an Irish army, but resolved to shift for himself, as they themselves must also do." He departed for Waterford, the next day, attended by the Duke of Berwick, the Marquis of Powis, and the Earl of Tyrconnel—ordering the bridges to be broken down every where behind him. At Waterford he embarked, and was conveyed to his former residence, at St. German's.

Immediately after the victory, Drogheda was invested, and speedily it surrendered. On the 5th of July the King encamped at Finglass, within two miles of Dublin, where he was informed of King James's flight to Waterford, and subsequent embarkation for France. The principal Catholics having also abandoned Dublin, the Protestants had recovered their ascendency; and, a deputation being sent, requesting the King to honour that city with his presence, he made his public entrance the next day.

The Irish army, having retired in confusion towards Athlone, on the banks of the Shannon, the King, dividing his forces, detached General Douglas to pursue the flying enemy, proceeding himself to the southward, and taking possession successively of Carlow, Kilkenny, and Waterford. About this period, a proclamation of grace and pardon was published, but less comprehensive than the King was desirous to have made it. General Douglas having reached Athlone on the 27th of July summoned the town to surrender; but Colonel Grace, the Governor, undaunted by the ill-success which had recently attended their arms, fired a pistol at the trumpeter, saying, "These are my terms." The English General resolved on undertaking the siege of the place; but his force was not adequate to the enterprize; and, after battering the castle for some days with little effect, he hastily withdrew his troops, on finding that General Sarsfield was on his march to relieve the fortress, at the head of 15,000 men. The principal object of the campaign, was the reduction of the important city of Limerick, in the vicinity of which the Irish had concentrated the far greater part of their force. A junction having been formed between the King's forces and those employed in the attack of Athlone, within a few miles of Limerick; the city was invested on the 9th of August, 1690. The siege was prosecuted with great diligence, and the place defended with equal resolution; but a most disastrous incident took place in the surprisal, by General Sarsfield, of almost the whole train of heavy artillery destined for the besieging army, and the total destruction of the carriages, waggons and ammunition; after having previously attacked and cut in pieces the detachment by which the convoy was guarded. A breach having been at last made of about 12 yards in breadth, the King ordered a general assault; but the courage of the enemy seemed to rise to fury; and, after being driven from the counterscarp, they returned to the attack with impetuosity never exceeded: even the women rushed forward and encouraged the soldiers of the garrison with amazonian fortitude. At length, the English were repulsed with the loss of 1200 of their choicest troops. The King gave orders, two days after, to raise the siege, and the army retreated towards Clonmell. Having constituted Lord Sydney and Sir Thomas Coningsby Lords Justices of Ireland, and leaving the command of the army with Count Solmes, who soon after resigned it to General Ginckel, his Majesty embarked at Duncannon on the 5th of September, 1690, and arrived safely within a few days at Windsor.

The Earl of Marlborough, who had already distinguished himself, gained additional fame by a successful attack on Cork and Kinsale with 5000 troops from England, joined by 5000 more in Ireland. By the capture of these cities, all connection between Ireland and France on that side was cut off; and the Earl of Marlborough returned to England covered with laurels, having been absent on this expedition only thirty-seven days.

General Ginckel, reinforced by a considerable body of troops from Scotland under General Mackay, took the field, about the beginning of June, 1691, and immediately directed his march to Athlone, taking in his way the town of Ballymore, which was fortified and garrisoned as a sort of advanced post. On the 18th, he sat down before Athlone. That part of the town which is situated to the eastward of the Shannon river was soon carried by assault; but the chief strength of the besieged lay in the fortifications on the Connaught side, defended by a castle which could be approached only by forcing the passage of the river; and several vigorous but unsuccessful attempts were made, to gain possession of the bridge. A council of war was consequently held on the 30th, to determine whether it would not be adviseable to raise the siege. Generals Mackay, Talmash, Rouvigny, &c. urged that no brave action could be performed without hazard, and gave it as their opinion that the attack on the bridge should be given up, and the passage of the river attempted at a ford a little below the bridge; and they offered to head the troops which should be destined to the service. General Ginckel acceded to the offer. The fords of the Shannon are few and dangerous; and, that in question was only wide enough for twenty men to march abreast. The bottom was rocky, the stream flowing with prodigious rapidity, and rising in the shallowest part nearly breast high. On the opposite shore was a bastion raised to defend the pass. To deceive the enemy, the troops were not drawn out till six o'clock, the time of relieving guard; and, on the customary signal for that duty, a detachment of grenadiers, supported by six battalions of infantry, commanded by the Prince of Wirtemberg, the Generals Mackay, Tetteau, and Talmash, who served that day as a volunteer, entered the water by twenties, to the astonishment of the Irish, who instantly commenced a heavy fire from all their forts and batteries. General Sarsfield hastily communicating to M. St. Ruth, now commander-in-chief of the combined armies of French and Irish, lying a few miles from the town, that the English were attempting the passage of the river, and demanding immediate succours, St. Ruth roundly affirmed the thing to be impossible. "They dare not make such an attempt," said he, "and I so near! I would give 1000 pistoles to find it true." Sarsfield told him, "he would find English courage capable of attempting any thing."—The assailants gradually advanced, in the face of a tremendous fire; and having gained the opposite bank, the rest of the army soon followed the pontoons, and planks thrown across the broken arches of the bridge. The Irish, panic-struck, scarcely attempted resistance; and in half an hour the town was in possession of the besiegers, with the works, which remained entire towards the enemy's camp. St. Ruth now made a late and vain attempt to dislodge the English: but the cannon of the garrison were by this time turned against him; and that very night he silently decamped with his whole army, and took a new and strong position in the neighbourhood of Aghrim. His camp was extended two miles on the ridge of a hill, with a morass in front, passable only by a narrow central path, crossed by the river Suke, and defended at the extremity by the castle of Aghrim; on his left were steep hills rising among swamps; and on the right was a pass defended by two old forts about half a mile from the morass, the interval being occupied by many small enclosures lined with musqueteers. General Ginckel, having viewed the enemy's position, declared his determination to attack them. St. Ruth, perceiving the preparations, exerted all the efforts of an able commander to counteract them, making an harangue to his troops well calculated to produce upon minds so gross and barbarous a very powerful effect. He issued strict orders to give quarter to none, especially not to spare any of the French heretics in the Prince of Orange's army. He took also the most effectual way to infuse courage into the Irish, by sending their priests among them to animate them, and by making them swear on the sacrament never to forsake their colours.—About eleven in the morning of the 12th of July, 1691, being Sunday, the English army advanced to the edge of the morass with a view to force the passes, which were defended with enthusiastic resolution. After several hours contest, no ground being gained, a feint was made on the enemy's left: large reinforcements were immediately sent by St. Ruth to that quarter, to the weakening of the right and centre, and the passes after much effusion of blood, were forced. The English, however, had scarcely obtained firm footing on the other side of the morass, and begun to ascend the hill, than the main body of the enemy fell upon them with such fury, that they were compelled to retreat with precipitation into the morass; at the sight of which St. Ruth cried out in a bravado, "Now will I drive the English army back to the gates of Dublin." Reinforcements arriving, however, the English rallied; and the enemy at the same instant sustaining an irreparable loss by the death of their General, who was taken off by a random ball, the fate of the battle was decided. Sarsfield, to whom St. Ruth had not communicated his dispositions, was unable to counteract the despair of the moment. The camp was abandoned, and great slaughter was made in the pursuit. The English army now marched to Galway, which made no serious resistance; but Limerick displayed, under the auspices of Sarsfield, every symptom of determined courage. On the 26th of August that city was a second time invested on the Munster side; two days previously to which died within its walls the Earl of Tyrconnel. The operations of the army were seconded by a squadron of ships of war, which sailed up the Shannon. The siege having been pressed for nearly a month, and little progress made, the enemy receiving continual supplies from the other side of the river, General Ginckel, at the head of a large division of the army, passed the Shannon over a bridge of boats on the 22d of September, some miles above the town, leaving the Prince of Wirtemberg, Mackay, and Talmash to command on the other side. After several bloody encounters, he succeeded in effecting the complete investment of the city. The garrison now seemed to think only how to secure the best terms for themselves; and General Ginckel acceded to terms more moderate than they had been led to expect. On the first of October, the Lords Justices arrived in the English camp; and on the 3d the articles were signed, comprehending not the surrender of Limerick merely, but all the forts, castles, and garrisons still in possession of the Irish. In return, a general indemnity was granted; and they were reinstated in all the privileges of subjects, on condition of taking the oaths of allegiance, without being required to take the oath of supremacy. They were also restored to the enjoyment of such liberty in the exercise of religion as was conformable to that which they possessed in the reign of Charles II. Such officers and soldiers in the service of James as were desirous to go beyond sea, were to be furnished with passports, convoys, and carriages by land and water, to the amount of 70 transport vessels, accompanied, for their protection and the accommodation of the officers, by two ships of war—and they also had liberty to transport 900 horses. The inhabitants of Limerick and other garrisons were empowered to remove their goods and chattels, without search, visit, or payment of duty; it was agreed, that all prisoners of war should be set at liberty; and all the respective garrisons were allowed to march out of the towns and fortresses yet in their possession, with the honors of war. Great offence was taken at these articles, by the malignity of some, and the rapacity of others; but the many thousands who retired to the continent, left behind them sufficient property to gratify any ordinary lust of wealth or vengeance. The refugees were received, on their arrival in France, with much kindness and generosity. General Ginckel was solemnly thanked by Parliament for his services; and the titles of Earl of Athlone and Baron Aghrim were conferred upon him.

* This celebrated personage was regarded as one of the first military characters of the age; and he possessed all the virtues and accomplishments of a hero. He was nobly rewarded in England, for services expected, rather than performed by him, with a dukedom and a parliamentary donation of 100,000*l*. Walker the clergyman, who had rendered himself so famous by his defence of Londonderry, also lost his life in this action, gloriously combating in the cause of his country. Inflamed by the irresistible impulse of military enthusiasm, he could not, after his brows were encircled with the laurel wreath of victory, reconcile himself to his former habitudes—and with him the gown ceded to arms.

When King William left England, the Queen was appointed sole Regent, with a Cabinet Council, consisting of nine persons, four of whom were Whigs; but the real power was supposed to reside in the Lords Carmarthen and Nottingham. Her Majesty had hitherto led a private domestic life; but it now appeared that she was by no means destitute of talents for business; and, notwithstanding the perpetual conflict between the two state factions, she governed with such mildness, and mediated with such address, that she rose higher than ever in the estimation of both.

During the Regency, the first great object of the government was to fit out a fleet, equal to that which the French were preparing in Brest. The English Admiralty, however, was not successful. By the exertions of M. de Seignelay, the Marine Minister of France, a fleet of 78 ships of the line, commanded by the Count de Tourville, entered the English Channel, and were discovered off Plymouth on the 20th of June, 1690. Lord Torrington, commander-in-chief of the combined squadrons of English and Dutch, fell down to St. Helens, in order to give the enemy battle, though inferior in force by 22 ships of the line; thirty ships of war lying in Plymouth Sound not being able to join them. His Lordship, extremely chagrined at this disappointment, would have avoided an engagement; but the the Queen was persuaded to send him positive orders to fight; so that, standing far up the Channel, he again bore down upon the enemy off Beachy-head, on the 30th of June, making two hours after day-break the signal for battle, which the French were not disposed to decline. The Dutch squadron were soon engaged with the van, and the blue division of the English with the rear of the French; but the red, which formed the centre, under the command of Torrington in person, could not, or at least did not, come into the action till ten. At that time, a wide interval was left between the center and the van; of which the French took the advantage, and so surrounded the Dutch ships, that they would have been entirely cut off or destroyed had not the centre division at length borne down to their assistance, and run between them and the enemy. About five in the afternoon the action was interrupted by a calm; and the English admiral, perceiving how severely the fleet had suffered, declined a renewal of the engagement; and weighing anchor at the close of day, he retired eastward. The French pursued in a regular line of battle, as far as Rye; and the English were compelled to burn the disabled ships, that they might not fall into their hands. This was the most signal naval victory ever gained by the French over the English. Three Dutch line of battle ships were sunk in the engagement, and three more stranded and burnt in the pursuit; besides two ships lost by the English. The Earl of Torrington brought the shattered remains of his fleet into the Thames, and, resigning the command to Sir John Ashley, he immediately repaired to the metropolis, which he found in a state of the greatest consternation. An immediate invasion was expected; but the French fleet, after insulting the defenceless coasts, retreated to Brest harbour.

The Queen immediately issued a proclamation, requiring the prompt service of all able seamen and mariners, with bounties for rendering themselves voluntarily, and penalties for disobedience; ordered a number of new commissions for the army, and a camp to be formed in the vicinity of Torbay, where a descent was deemed most probable; caused the Earls of Litchfield, Aylesbury, Castlemain, and the Lords Preston and Bellasis, with various other disaffected persons, to be apprehended; deprived the Earl of Torrington* of his command, and sent him prisoner to the Tower; and deputed an Envoy Extraordinary to the States General, to inform their High Mightinesses, "how much she was concerned at the misfortune which had befallen their squadron in the late engagement, and at their not having been seconded as they ought; which matter her Majesty had directed to be examined into, in order to recompence those that had done their duty, and to punish such as should be found to have deserved it; that she had directed 12 great ships to be fitted out, and hoped the States would do their utmost to reinforce their fleet in this juncture."

The English Parliament assembled at Westminster, on the 2d of October 1690, and the leading topics of the speech from the throne were the success of the war in Ireland, the late naval defeat, and the necessity of acting with vigour in support of the confederacy abroad. The most loyal addresses were returned, and extraordinary supplies voted, to the amount of four millions—at that time the largest sum ever asked, or given to a King of England, in one session. That the money thus bestowed might be honestly expended, a committee of accounts was instituted, consisting of nine members of the House of Commons, invested with full powers to summon whatever persons they thought proper, and to tender them an oath to answer all such questions as should be required of them. In the month of November Lord Sydney was appointed Secretary of State, in the room of the Earl of Shrewsbury; and Lord Godolphin, First Lord of the Treasury, in the room of Sir John Lowther.

King William was now impatient to repair to the Grand Congress appointed to be held at the Hague during the winter. On the 5th of January, 1691, therefore, he came to the House, and, communicating his intentions, gave his assent to the bills which were ready, and put an end to the session. Early in the same month he embarked at Gravesend, under convoy of a powerful squadron commanded by Sir George Rooke; and on the 18th about noon, being informed by a fisherman that Goree was distant only a league and a half, he resolved to quit the yacht and go on board a shallop, attended by the Duke of Ormond, the Earls of Devonshire, Dorset, Portland, and several other persons of distinction. A thick fog, however, coming on, and the coast being surrounded with ice, they were not able to make the shore, and for the space of 18 hours, they were exposed to the inclemency of a winter's night. The danger was extreme; but the fortitude of the King did not for a moment forsake him. On hearing some of the sailors express their apprehension of the event, "Are you then," said he, "afraid to die in my company?" Soon after day-break, however, they made their landing on the island of Goree, and about six in the evening arrived at the Hague; where he was received with transports of joy, and immediately complimented by the States General, the States of Holland, the Council of State, the other colleges, and the foreign Ministers. On the 26th, by desire of the Magistrates, he made his public entry with surprizing magnificence; and the Dutch celebrated his arrival with bonfires, illuminations, and other marks of tumultuous joy. He assisted at their different assemblies; informed them of his successes in England and Ireland; and assured them of his constant zeal and affection for his native country.

The most extraordinary and splendid Congress of Princes and Ministers which Europe had ever known, was now opened. To this illustrious assembly King William addressed himself in an eloquent and pathetic speech, representing the imminent dangers to which they were exposed from the power and ambition of France. In the circumstances they were in, he observed, it was not indeed a time to deliberate so much as to act. As to himself, he would spare neither his forces, credit, nor person; and he proposed to appear, in the spring, himself at the head of the army of the allies, and they might depend upon his royal word for the strict performance of his engagement. Actuated by the same spirit, the assembly came to the most vigorous resolutions; and it was agreed to employ in the ensuing campaign 222,000 men against France, of which number each State was to furnish its specific and equitable proportion. The Congress broke up early in March; no disputes relative to precedency, or any perplexing etiquette of state, so common in assemblies of this nature, having impeded their deliberations.

After passing some weeks at his favourite residence of Loo, William embarked for England, and arrived safely at Whitehall on the 13th of April. The chief event which had occurred during his absence, was the discovery of a conspiracy against the government. Notice having been given to Lord Carmarthen, that a vessel at Barking, in Essex, had been taken up to carry some unknown persons to France, she was boarded, under the pretext of searching for seamen, the moment she fell down to Gravesend; and Lord Preston, Secretary of State to King James; Ashton, who had held a place in the household of the late Queen, and one Elliot, were found in the hold. Some papers which Ashton attempted to throw into the sea were also secured, and Lord Preston's seal of office. The most remarkable of the papers was—"The result of a conference between some Lords and Gentlemen, both Tories and Whigs, respecting

* How far the Earl of Torrington was censurable in this business, is not clear. The Dutch exclaimed against him with the bitterest acrimony, and the French accounts represented him as extremely deficient in naval conduct. The Earl of Nottingham, in his official letter to Lord Dursley, ambassador at the Hague, expressly charged him with treachery; and the Earl of Torrington, on the other hand, brought an accusation against Nottingham for purposely suppressing the necessary intelligence. After lying many months in the Tower, he was brought to a trial by a court martial, and acquitted; but the King dismissed him from the service, and he never afterwards recovered any share of credit.

specting the Restoration of King James, without endangering the Protestant religion, and civil administration according to the laws of this kingdom. From the general tenor of this paper, and of the declaration annexed, it appeared that the Whigs concerned in this political intrigue insisted upon nothing less, on the part of the King, than an entire surrender of himself into their hands. Amongst the letters, were two by Dr. Turner, Bishop of Ely, to the King and Queen, under the names of Mr. and Mrs. Redding, full of loyal expressions, and assuring them "that he spoke his sentiments of his elder brother and the rest of his relations." A paper of memorandums, written by Lord Preston, contained the names of the following Lords:—Dorset, Cornwallis, Montague, Stamford, Shrewsbury, Macclesfield, Monmouth, Devonshire; immediately after which were the words—"In February the King comes to Scotland—endeavour to unite the Episcopal and Presbyterian parties—land at Leith—the Scots army, not a French one—5000 good Swedish foot—the reputation of a Protestant ally—two months to settle Scotland—leave all to free Parliament, &c. &c." Elliot had the good fortune to make his peace with government; but the others were brought to their trials before Lord Chief Justice Holt; and Lord Preston and Mr. Ashton were both pronounced guilty. The latter, a blind and honest bigot, suffered with great resolution; but the former, who was supposed to have communicated the whole secret of the intrigue, or conspiracy to the government, ultimately obtained his pardon. A proclamation was soon after issued for the apprehending the Bishop of Ely, Mr. James Graham, and Penn the Quaker, noted for his attachment to the Stuarts; but they had previously absconded. The Earl of Clarendon, (uncle to the Queen,) who had refused the oath, was committed to the Tower; but, after some months, he was released by the King's order, out of tenderness to the Queen. Lord Dartmouth was also sent to the Tower, where he soon after died, and was buried with funeral honours.

It was now determined to bring matters to a crisis with respect to the non-juring Bishops and clergy, who had been deprived of their fees and preferments. The vacancies were supplied with men of known candor and moderation; amongst whom were Tillotson, Sharp, More, Cumberland, and Patrick.*

The King, in pursuance of his resolution to command in person the grand confederate army, embarked for Holland, early in May, and after a speedy passage arrived safely at the Hague. The affairs of the continent were at this period in a truly critical state. The confederacy against France was such as had never been equalled in Europe. All the contiguous countries, Switzerland excepted, were engaged in it as principals; yet she neither displayed signs of despondency, nor made unbecoming submissions. On the contrary, she prepared to exert her strength, spirit, and genius, in proportion to the difficulties and dangers which threatened her; and boldly entered the lists against them all.

Before William had taken the field, while the congress was sitting at the Hague, the French suddenly invested the city of Mons, which the Prince of Waldeck attempted in vain to relieve. The Marechal de Luxemburg was on his march to surprise Brussels, when the King of England put himself at the head of the allied army, by this time confessedly superior to that of the enemy, and effectually covered Brussels from attack. He then sent a detachment to the relief of Liege, threatened by Marechal Boufflers. Passing the Sambre, he tried all possible means to bring the enemy to a battle, exhausting his invention in marches, countermarches, and stratagems; but, being in every attempt disappointed by the skill and caution of Luxemburg, he relinquished the command to the Prince of Waldeck, and retired in September to Loo. The campaign on the Rhine, where the elector of Saxony this year commanded, was equally inactive. In Catalonia, the Duc de Noailles renewed his unavailing incursions; but on the side of Italy, M. de Catinat made himself master of Montalban, Villa Franca, Nice, and Carmagnola. He then invested the strong fortress of Coni, situated on the summit of a steep and craggy mountain, and defended by a numerous garrison. At this critical period King William sent to the assistance of the Duke of Savoy a body of auxiliary troops commanded by the Duke of Schomberg (son of the late Marechal Schomberg,) preceded by a supply of money. In pursuance of advice given by the new general, a large body of troops, under the command of Prince Eugene of Savoy, was detached to attempt the relief of Coni; which he executed with such address, that M. Bulonde raised the siege in extreme haste and confusion. Prince Eugene then attacked and captured Carmagnola, and obliged M. Catinat to retire with his whole army beyond the Po. The court of Versailles was now struck with astonishment. At the end of the campaign, however, M. de Catinat retrieved his reputation, by taking the town and castle of Montmelian.

In the autumn of 1691, King William returned to England, the Parliament having been summoned to meet on the 22d of October. The speech from the throne strongly recommended the vigorous prosecution of the war. The nation, however, was much disappointed at the ill success of the last campaign, and began to doubt the policy of continuing the continental war. The zealous Whigs were not disposed to view the measures of the King with any peculiar favour. The Tories were still the favoured and governing party; and, just at this period the Earl of Rochester, Lord Ranelagh, and Sir Edward Seymour, three of the leading men in that interest, were sworn of the privy-council. The Earl of Pembroke, who wavered between the two parties, was advanced to the office of Lord Privy Seal; and Lord Sydney, who retained a personal interest with the King, though a Whig, was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The behaviour of the King himself was not calculated to acquire popularity. He was of a disposition naturally silent, reserved and thoughtful. He never appeared perfectly naturalized amongst the English; and was scarcely ever known to unbend himself but in company with his Dutch counsellors and favourites, Bentinck, Zuylestein, Auverquerque, &c. He avoided coming to the metropolis except on council days, and spent his leisure hours either in stag hunting, of which diversion he was exceedingly fond, or at his favourite residence of Hampton court, where he expended much money in magnificent, and, as many styled them, superfluous embellishments. He indeed made a visit to the University of Cambridge, to partake of the sports of the turf at Newmarket; and he accepted of the freedom of the city of London; but these condescensions not being natural to him, the coldness of his manner seemed to cancel the favour.

During this session, an attempt was made to supersede and destroy the existing East India Company, who had, as their enemies alledged, greatly abused their powers and privileges, and to establish a company upon their ruins. This design however was opposed with vigor and spirit; and, after long and warm debates, the House of Commons passed a series of resolutions, upon the ground of which "it might be proper to prolong and continue the charter of the present company." The company acceded to these conditions, amongst which several were very hard; particularly the resolutions enjoining that no one person should have or possess any share of East India stock exceeding 5000*l.* in the stock of the present company, in their own or other persons' names, but be obliged to sell so much thereof as should exceed the said sum of 5000*l.* at the rate of a 100*l.* in money for every 100*l.* stock.

In January 1692, a bill was brought in accordingly; but new petitions were presented against the company;

* Nothing more provoked the resentment and chagrin of the non-juring party at this period, than the defection of the celebrated Sherlock, Master of the Temple, after a long and pertinacious refusal to submit to the oaths, and his public justification of his conduct in so doing. This was a great triumph to the court; and he was immediately rewarded, for what one party stiled his happy conversion, and the other his faithless apostacy, by the deanery of St Paul's.

the temper of the House suddenly changed, and they came to a resolution, "That an humble address be presented to his Majesty, to dissolve the East India Company, according to the powers reserved in their charter, and to constitute another East India Company, for the better preserving of the East India trade to this kingdom, in such manner as his Majesty in his royal wisdom should think fit." To the address, the King replied with much seeming indifference, that this was a matter of very great importance to the trade of the kingdom; that he would consider of it; and that in a short time he would give the Commons a positive answer. The conduct of this business was now transferred to the privy council: but the company endeavoured to show that their present constitution required no material alteration, and admitted no essential improvement; and in this state of suspense the contest remained till the commencement of the succeeding session.

On the 29th of February, the King acquainted the two Houses with his intention of going beyond sea very speedily, and prorogued the Parliament.

A short time before this period, the Earl of Marlborough, who had always appeared to be in high favour at court, was suddenly disgraced; and in the month of May following, he was committed to the Tower on a charge of high treason. The Earl, it appeared, in common with many other persons of rank and consequence, had holden a clandestine and unlawful correspondence with the court of St. Germaine's; and his disgrace was owing to the information received by the King of his practices. The Earl had written letters of deep contrition to the court of St. Germaine's, imploring pardon and forgiveness for his past conduct, which James granted, though he entertained great doubts respecting his sincerity, which his recent services at Cork and Kinsale were ill calculated to remove. A message was also sent by Marlborough to James, engaging to excite a revolt in the army; of which being after a considerable interval reminded, he declared that he had been misunderstood by the person, Captain Lloyd, who conveyed it. On which James remarked, "That he suspected Churchill wished to regain his confidence only to be able a second time to betray him." Not only were Sunderland, Halifax, Monmouth, Marlborough, &c. involved in these machinations, but men of the greatest virtue—Godolphin, Shrewsbury, and Russel; and even the Marquis of Carmarthen, one of the heads of the administration, became a plotter or pretended plotter against the government.*

For some time past, a great coolness had subsisted between the King and Queen, and the Princess Anne, on account of an application made by the latter to Parliament for an independent revenue without the privity of the King, and the actual grant of the sum of 50,000*l* per annum, by the House of Commons, out of the civil list for that purpose. This misunderstanding was greatly heightened by the refusal of the Princess, at the request of the Queen, to dismiss the Countess of Marlborough from her household, where she had long occupied the station of First Lady of the Bedchamber. In consequence, the Prince and Princess of Denmark no longer appeared at court, and the rupture in the royal family was a subject of general conversation.

King William embarked for Holland on the 5th of March; and arrived in a few days afterwards at Loo, whence he proceeded to the army, assembled near Louvain. Through his Majesty's influence, the elector of Bavaria had been recently appointed governor of the Spanish Netherlands; and by his care and activity those provinces exhibited a much better posture of defence than formerly: great hopes were therefore entertained of a successful campaign, especially as M. de Louvois, the spirit of the French councils, was dead. The King of France took the field in person, attended by Madame Maintenon and a vast retinue, and on the 20th of May joined the army under the command of Marechal Luxemburg, which he found in excellent order. The French army being put in motion on the 23d, Louis, assisted by the Marechals Boufflers and Vauban, sat down before Namur, while the Duke of Luxemburg covered the siege. On the 5th of June, when the attack had scarcely commenced, the town capitulated, on condition that the garrison should be allowed forty hours to retire into the citadel. King William was on his march towards the Mehaigne, in order to relieve the place, when he received notice of this surprising event, and that the French had invested the citadel. His army amounting to upwards of 100,000 men, he resolved to risk a battle, in the hope of saving this important fortress. Unfortunately, heavy rains swelled the waters of the Mehaigne, which flowed between the King's army and that of Marechal Luxemburg, and swept away the bridges; and, by the time the floods had abated, the French general had fortified the passes to his camp so as to render an attack impracticable. The citadel, after a feeble resistance, surrendered on the 30th of June; and the King of France immediately left the camp to celebrate his triumph at Versailles.

King William now formed a design of surprising the city of Mons: but was prevented by the vigilance of Luxemburg. The French army took an advantageous position between Enghien and Steinkirk; and here William, having received erroneous information respecting the ground, determined upon a general attack. On Sunday, the 24th of July, the Prince of Wirtemberg, sustained by General Mackay at the head of the British infantry, advanced to the assault of the enemy's right, through a deep defile, terminating in a small plain in view of the French camp. The onset was made with such vigour, that the French abandoned their lines in disorder and confusion; and, had the first column of attack been properly supported, the battle must have been won. Count Solmes, however, who commanded the centre, though repeatedly applied to by messages to march forward to sustain the van, delayed; and when a positive command arrived, he detached a body of cavalry, which he knew from the nature of the ground could not act, and ordered the foot to halt, saying to those about him, "Let us see what sport these English bull dogs will make us!" The King, astonished at this disobedience, brought up in person the reserve of infantry to the relief of the van. But Luxemburg had had time to rally his broken battalions, and the Princes of the blood and nobles led them back to the conflict, charging sword in hand. This dreadful scene of carnage lasted four hours; and, overpowered by numbers, and exhausted by fatigue, the allies were compelled to give way. The King, who had impatiently expected the approach of Solmes, repeatedly exclaimed, "O my poor English! how they are abandoned!" The night drawing on precluded a

* It appears from the Dalrymple and M'Pherson collections of state papers, that, about the end of the year 1690, Colonel Bulkley and Colonel Sackville arrived from St. Germaine's in England, and applied with success to the Lords Godolphin, Halifax, and Marlborough; a promise of pardon being not only obtained, but formally granted, Shrewsbury and Carmarthen professed their conversion The Admirals Russel and Carter followed their example; and in a short time also the Princess of Denmark joined the same party. Some months afterwards, the Earl of Middleton was sent over to England. A considerable time was spent in adjusting terms, because the Whigs, and particularly Russel, contended for concession after concession for the security of the constitution. At length all things were settled, and the court of St. Germaine's obtained assurances that the army would be directed by Marlborough, the fleet by Russel, and the church by the Princess Anne. Marlborough was, at his own request, excepted from the declaration of pardon. During the preparations for an invasion, the correspondence between Russel and James continued; in the course of which Russel entreated James to prevent the two fleets from meeting, warning him, that, as an officer and an Englishman, it behoved him to fire upon the first French ship that he met, although he saw James upon the quarter-deck; and he complained that proper provision was not yet made for the security of the subject—so that James was provoked to say, "Russel's views were not so much directed to serve him, as from republican principles to degrade monarchy in his person. If he missed the French fleet, he would claim credit with him; if he met it, he would, as was manifest, use his utmost efforts in favour of his rival." In the books of the privy council, May 3, 1692, there is a warrant for seizing Bulkley, Lloyd, and Middleton; and on the 23d of June following the names of Shrewsbury, Halifax, and Marlborough are struck out of the council book.

renewal of the attempt, and a general retreat was thought necessary. Count Solmes, it appeared, hated the English, and was extremely jealous of the Prince of Wirtemberg, having himself aspired to the command of the column of attack; but, as he was an officer in great estimation with the Dutch, he was never punished as he deserved. The loss of the French, however, was at least as great as that sustained by the Allies, who had to regret the fall of two excellent officers, in the Generals Mackay and Lanier, and about 6 or 7000 men killed, wounded, and prisoners.

In the month of August, a horrid conspiracy against the life of the King was discovered. In the course of the preceding year, M. de Grandval, a captain of dragoons in the French service, M. Dumont, and Colonel Parker, had proposed this assassination to M. Louvois; but the design proved abortive, through the want of resolution on the part of Dumont, who retired to Hanover. Suspicions arising that some dangerous design was in agitation, one Leefdale, a Dutchman, was sent to France as a spy; and, ingratiating himself with Grandval, he pretended to engage as an accomplice in the conspiracy. Dumont at length revealed all the circumstances of the plot to the Duke of Zell; and Grandval, having accompanied Leefdale to Holland, was arrested at Eyndhoven, where he made a free and full confession. He was afterwards tried by a court-martial, convicted, and executed in the camp.*

This year, the Duke of Savoy, accompanied by M. Schomberg and Prince Eugene, made a formidable irruption into Dauphiné, crossing the Durance, and reducing Fort Guillestre, with the towns of Ambrun and Gap. Marechal Catinat, at the head of a small force, exerted himself in vain to stop the progress of the Allies, who threatened Grenoble, and even Lyons. Contributions were levied, and seventy or eighty chateaus and villages were destroyed, in revenge for the ravages committed by the French in the Palatinate. M. Schomberg published a declaration in the name of King William, inviting all persons to repair to his standard, and assuring them that his Majesty's only aim in causing his forces to enter France, was to restore the nobility and gentry to their ancient splendor, the Parliaments to their former authority, and the people to their just privileges. This manifesto produced very little effect. At this time, dissensions arose, and differences of opinion prevailed amongst the respective generals; and, a dangerous illness seizing the Duke of Savoy, the vigilance of Catinat, who had possessed himself of some important passes, and the approach of winter, made a retreat necessary. After demolishing the fortifications of Ambrun, the confederates evacuated their conquests with as much expedition as they had been achieved.

In Germany, the Protestant interest acquired this year an increase of strength, by the creation of a ninth electorate in favour of Ernest Augustus, Duke of Hanover. Renouncing its ancient connection with France, that House now formed new ties of amity and alliance with England; and, in consequence of the interposition of King William, the Emperor consented to bestow upon it this dignity, to which was annexed the office of Great Marshal of the Empire.

In October, William returned to England, where events of great importance had taken place. So early in the year as January, Colonel Parker arrived in England, and communicated to various persons the design of assassinating the King in Flanders, and of making a descent upon England. Their lawful sovereign, he said, would once more visit his dominions, at the head of 30,000 men, to be embarked at La Hogue, the transports being already collected, and a fleet equipped for their convoy. James, at the same time, published a declaration, importing, that the King of France had enabled him to make another effort to retrieve his crown, and soliciting all persons to join his standard. He promised pardon, and even rewards, to all those who should return to their duty; and engaged to procure in his first Parliament an act of indemnity, with the exception, however, of a long list of names, enumerated in the Declaration, concluding with vague promises of protection to the church as by law established, and pompous protestations of paternal attention to the welfare and happiness of all his subjects.—His agents were indefatigable in enlisting men for his service; and were very successful in Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Durham. By this time James had repaired to La Hogue, and was ready to embark with his army, consisting of a body of French troops; with a considerable number of English and Scotch refugees, and the regiments which had been transported from Ireland by virtue of the capitulation of Limerick. The government of England was well informed of these proceedings; the Queen issued a proclamation, commanding all Papists to depart from London and Westminster; warrants were expedited for apprehending divers disaffected persons; the Earls of Huntingdon, Marlborough, Dunmore, Middleton, &c. were committed to the Tower; and various other suspected persons, amongst whom was the notorious Ferguson, said to have been engaged in every plot against the government for the last thirty years, were imprisoned in Newgate. The Bishop of Rochester, and the Lords Brudenel and Fanshaw were secured; the train-bands of London and Westminster were armed by the Queen's direction, and she reviewed them in person; and the grand Channel fleet, under Admiral Russel, was ordered to put to sea with all expedition. A report of the disaffection of the officers prevailing, the Queen ordered Lord Nottingham to write to the Admiral, that she would change none of them; and that she imputed the reports which had been raised to the contrivances of her enemies and theirs. This measure produced a warm and loyal address from the naval commanders and captains, in which they vowed they were ready to die in her cause and that of their country. Instead of prohibiting James's Declaration, the Queen ordered it to be published, with an answer drawn by the Bishop of St. Asaph.

On the 5th of May (1692) Admiral Russell sailed from the Nore; and, desirous of joining the squadrons of Carter and Delaval, then cruising on the coast of France, he, after having been joined by the Dutch, plied through the sands, from the Nore to the Downs, and effected the junction off Beachy-head; thus disappointing the hopes of Tourville, the French Admiral, who had formed a plan to intercept them. On the 19th of May they descried the enemy's fleet to windward bearing down upon them with full sail—Cape Barfleur being then about seven leagues to the S. W. The English and Dutch fleets conjoined consisted of no less than ninety-nine ships of the line, being, next to the Spanish armada, the greatest armament ever seen in the English Channel. Tourville, though inferior in force, had positive orders from his court to fight, under the persuasion that the Dutch had not yet left their harbours; and when he discovered his mistake, it was too late to retreat. The Count himself, in the Soleil

* The particulars of Grandval's confession, were, in substance, as follow:—"That the Marquis de Barbesieux, having found the project of this plot amongst his father's papers, held several conferences with the assassins respecting it; and that the plan was finally agreed upon with this minister—that on the 16th of April 1692, Grandval, Leefdale, and Parker went to St. Germaine's to speak with the late King James about the said design, who had knowledge of it, and to take leave of him before they began their journey—that the prisoner had audience of the King, the Queen being present; the King telling him: 'Parker has given me an account of the business: if you and the other officers do me this service, you shall never want.'—That the prisoner, with Chanlais (Quarter-Master General to the French King) and Leefdale, were agreed in what manner the assassination should be committed: viz. that when the King should ride along the lines, or should go out to take any view, &c. Dumont should lie in ambuscade and fire upon the King; that Chanlais should be with three thousand horse at the Duke of Luxemburg's grand guard; the prisoner saying, that it little concerned them whether Dumont should be taken or not, provided they could escape themselves—that the prisoner, as they were travelling, told Leefdale, that, their design taking place, the alliance among the confederate Princes would be broken; that the Princes concerned would each of them recall their troops, and, the country being thereby left without soldiers, the King of France would easily make himself master of it, and King James would be restored again—that the prisoner, with Leefdale, went to the Mayor of Boisledue, and was apprehended at Eyndhoven."—On the part of the courts of Versailles and St. Germaine, no disavowal or attempt at confutation was ever made.

BATTLE OF LA HOGUE.

Published by J. R. Tutte, Queen Street, London, 1851

Royal of 110 guns, bore down upon the English Admiral with great courage. The battle soon became general, and lasted from ten in the morning till four in the afternoon, when a thick fog arose, and for a time separated the combatants. The sun at length breaking out afresh, Admiral Russel perceived the French towing away in great disorder. The signal for a general chase was then made, which continued during the remainder of the evening, and the whole of the night, to the westward—supposing they would make for the harbour of Brest. The next morning, thirty-four of the enemy's ships were seen crowding all their sail, and steering westerly. The pursuit continued with redoubled vigour, without regarding the order of battle, every ship making the best of her way. On the morning of the 22d, part of the French fleet was descried near the Race of Alderney, some at anchor, and some driving to the eastward with the tide of flood. Tourville's ship, the Soleil Royal, having lost her masts, ran ashore, together with the Admirable, another first rate, and the Conquerant, of 80 guns, near Cherbourg, whither they were followed and burnt by Sir Ralph Delaval. Eighteen other ships of the enemy's line stood for La Hogue; and, being unable longer to keep the sea or elude the pursuit, as a last resource stranded themselves as far as possible on the beach. Vice-Admiral Rooke immediately ordered the boats and fireships of his squadron, under cover of several frigates, to attack them. Of this extraordinary scene the troops destined for the invasion of Great Britain, and encamped at La Hogue, the late King himself, the Marechal de Bellefonds, &c. with many thousands of the people inhabiting the surrounding country, were the amazed spectators. The ships were protected on one side by cannon planted on platforms; and on the other by shallops manned by numerous crews with all the means of annoyance. Regardless of danger, the English sailors rent the air with shouts; they crowded to the boats with an emulation of eagerness; and no sooner had they reached the ships, than they attacked them in swarms. At length, all opposition being disarmed, they proceeded to burn the ships amidst acclamations of triumph; and, having accomplished their design, returned unmolested to the fleet. Thirteen capital ships were thus destroyed, besides transports and store-ships. It was remarked, that, during the conflict, James repeatedly exclaimed with rapturous admiration, "See my brave English!"—conscious, nevertheless, that he was beholding the extinction of his hopes. Sir John Ashby, and Admiral Allemond, the Dutch commander, pursued the remainder of the French fleet, which escaped with great difficulty. The loss of the English and Dutch was trifling. The only flag officer killed was Rear Admiral Carter, who fell in the first day's engagement, leaving orders with his Captain to fight the ship as long as she could swim. At the close of the action, James returned in mournful silence to the Convent of La Trappe, there to bury in solitude and despair the remembrance of his former greatness. From his retreat he addressed a letter to the King of France, acknowledging that "This last disaster had entirely overwhelmed him—that he knew too well it was his own unlucky star which had drawn this misfortune upon his forces, always victorious but when they fought for his interests. He therefore entreated his most Christian Majesty no longer to regard as an object of his concern a monarch so unfortunate as himself—but permit him to retire with his family to some corner of the world, where he might cease to obstruct the usual course of his most Christian Majesty's prosperity and conquests." Louis endeavoured to alleviate his affliction by a kind answer, in which he nobly promised, that he should not cease to enjoy his protection.

When informed of this glorious victory, the Queen sent 30,000*l.* to Portsmouth, to be distributed amongst the sailors. She caused medals to be struck in honour of the victory; and as tokens to the officers; and she ordered the bodies of Admiral Carter and Captain Hastings to be interred with great funeral pomp. A descent upon the coast of France was also projected, and the troops were actually embarked on board the transports; but, to the disappointment of the public, this enterprise was abandoned.

Parliament met on the 4th of November; and, soon afterwards, the Earls of Huntingdon, Scarsdale, and Marlborough, who had been committed to the Tower, where they had lain some weeks, complained to the House of Peers, that, on appearing before the judges of the King's Bench at the Michaelmas term preceding, the court had refused to discharge them from their bail, or to bring them to trial, conformably to the provisions of the Habeas Corpus Act. Great debates ensued; and the House came to a resolution, "That no Peer shall be remanded to prison by the King's Bench upon his appearing before them by virtue of the Habeas Corpus Act after having entered his prayer to be tried as the said act directs, or kept under bail unless there be against him two witnesses upon oath or in a capacity to be sworn." A day was appointed, to consider in what manner to discharge the Lords under bail from their recognizance; but the House was informed, that the King had given orders for their release.*

After the victory at La Hogue, a misunderstanding had taken place, between Admiral Russel and the Secretary of State, Lord Nottingham, respecting the abandonment of the projected descent on France. This was now transferred to the two Parliamentary factions, and converted into a party contest. In the Lords the interest of Nottingham predominated; in the Commons the advantage remained with Russel. The latter declared, that they had read and well considered the papers on the subject, and had unanimously resolved, "That Admiral Russel in his command of the fleets had behaved with fidelity, courage, and conduct." They also voted; "That his Majesty be humbly advised, for the necessary support of his government, to employ in his councils and management of his affairs such persons only whose principles oblige them to stand by him and his right against the late King James and all other pretenders whatsoever." Also, "That in future all orders for the management of the fleet should pass through the Admiralty." In a grand committee, they likewise passed an unanimous vote, "That there had been an apparent miscarriage in the management of affairs relating to the descent the last summer." On the ultimate criminatory resolution, however, "That one cause of the said miscarriage was the want of giving timely and necessary orders by such persons to whom the management of this matter was committed," the friends of the Earl of Nottingham so vigorously exerted themselves, that it was carried by a single vote only, viz. 165 to 164—so that this deep laid project of the Whigs for the disgrace and removal of the Earl of Nottingham proved abortive. The King took a decided part in favour of the minister; and, to screen him, dismissed the Admiral.

The affairs of the East India Company were now resumed, and a bill was brought in for regulating, preserving, and establishing the East India trade to this kingdom. The whole business, however, terminated in an address to the King, "That he would be pleased to dissolve the Company upon three years' warning, according to the condition of their charter."

A bill was brought in, the first of a long series of Place Bills which met with the same fate, "for free and impartial proceedings in Parliament, rendering all members of the House of Commons incapable of places of trust or profit." This bill passed the Commons without difficulty; but it was, after violent debate, rejected by

* The Earl of Marlborough had been committed on the information of Young, a prisoner in Newgate, who had, as it proved, framed the draft of a treasonable association to assist King James on his landing, to seize on the person of the Prince of Orange, &c. to which he had forged the names of Archbishop Sancroft, the Bishop of Rochester (Sprat,) the Earls of Marlborough and Salisbury, Lord Cornbury, Sir Basil Firebrace and John Wilcox. One of his emissaries had found means to secrete this paper in the library of the Bishop's palace at Bromley in Kent, where it was found by the King's messengers. On the subsequent examination of this prelate by the privy council, the imposition was detected, the Bishop honourably discharged, the Earl of Marlborough admitted to bail, and a bill of forgery and subornation of perjury found by the grand jury of Middlesex against Young.

the Lords.—Soon afterwards, a bill of still greater importance was introduced by the Earl of Shrewsbury, "for the frequent calling and meeting of Parliaments." This was the Triennial Bill. It passed the Lords by a great majority, and was well received by the Commons; but it was very unacceptable to the King, who regarded it as a dangerous novelty, and a serious invasion of his prerogative, and he ultimately refused to give it the royal assent.

A pamphlet, written by Charles Blount, Esq. intituled "King William and Queen Mary Conquerors," was ordered, by the House of Commons, to be burnt by the Common hangman; with a pastoral letter of Bishop Burnet's, expressing the same opinions.

During the present session, much time was occupied in the investigation of the affairs of Ireland, where gross and flagrant abuses were said to have been committed under the administration of Lord Coningsby and Sir Charles Porter, previously to the appointment of Lord Sydney as Lord Lieutenant. The House, in consequence, presented an address to the King, stating the grievances of that country in strong language; to which, his Majesty, in reply, engaged to remedy whatever was found to be amiss; and, finding that the Lord Sydney had made himself extremely obnoxious to the Irish nation, he immediately recalled him, and the government of the kingdom was again committed to Lords Justices, who were Lord Capel, Sir Cyril Wyche, and Mr. Duncombe.

A. D. 1693.] The Parliament was prorogued on the 14th of March; the King informing them that affairs required his absence abroad. Perceiving the necessity of farther conciliating the Whig party, the King at this period gave the Seals vacated by Lord Sydney to Sir John Trenchard, who had been engaged in Monmouth's rebellion, and afterwards lived some years on the Continent; at the same time, Sir John Somers, Attorney-General, was declared Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, which had been several years in commission; and the department of the Admiralty was placed in the hands of Sir Cloudesley Shovel, assisted by the Admirals Delaval and Killegrew.

On the 31st of March, his Majesty embarked for Holland, and immediately repaired to the army in Flanders, where the French had assembled a force far superior to that of the confederates. Louis having joined his army in person, it was concluded that some grand design was in contemplation; but William having possessed himself of the strong position of Parke near Louvaine, the measures of the enemy were broken; and Louis, after detaching a body of 20,000 men to the Upper Rhine, left the care of the army to the Marechals Luxemburg and Boufflers, and returned to Versailles. The Duke of Luxemburg now removed his camp to Meldert, within half a league of the allies; but, though an engagement was hourly expected, neither side found a favourable opportunity of attack. The Duke of Wirtemberg, however, forced the French lines between the Scheld and the Lys, and laid the whole country as far as Lisle under contribution; and, on the same day, Marechal Luxemburg quitted the camp of Meldert, and moved towards Huy, which was next day invested by Marechal Villeroi; and, after a feeble defence, it capitulated, on the 23d of July. The French General then marched forwards to Liege. The allies had thrown ten battalions into the place; but he nevertheless made such dispositions as seemed to threaten an approaching siege. However, early in the morning of the 28th, he suddenly quitted his post at Hellicheim, twenty miles from the camp of the confederates, passed the Jaar, and, before the close of day, reached the village of Roucoux. William resolved to await the attack, depending much on the strength of his position. The French began the battle at sun-rise, by a furious attack on the villages of Neer-Winden and Landen; and, after a desperate conflict, made themselves masters of these important posts. Luxemburg then ordered a general charge, which was executed with an impetuosity that surmounted all resistance. The King, seeing the battle lost, remained in the field, to give the necessary orders for the safety of the troops.

The loss sustained by the two armies was nearly equal—about nine or ten thousand men. William being joined in a few days by the Duke of Wirtemberg, found himself immediately in a situation to risque another engagement. Both armies however remained for some weeks inactive, till siege was laid to Charleroy, which the utmost efforts of the allies were inadequate to relieve. The surrender of this fortress closed the campaign in the Low Countries.

Marechal de Lorges, commanding the French army on the Rhine, passed that river in May, and invested the city of Hiedelberg, which, being taken by storm, was delivered up to all the horrors of cruelty. Prince Lewis of Baden, who commanded the Imperial army, sent a message to Marechal de Lorges, "that he was come from a war against the Turks; and that he expected Christian enemies would have treated each other with Christian usage; but that he found the French acted more like barbarians than their Turkish allies—He should therefore in future make such reprisals as would teach them, from concern to themselves, to shew compassion to others."

M. de Lorges continued his march to Hailbron, and made several attempts to pass the Necker in order to attack the Prince of Baden; but he was invariably repulsed, and at length obliged to retreat to France by the way of Philipsburg.

In Catalonia, the Spaniards suffered the loss of the important town of Roses, almost without resistance. In Piedmont the French had greatly the advantage. The campaign opened on the part of the allies with the siege of Pignerol; in which the Duke of Savoy had made some progress when he understood that Marechal de Catinat had descended into the plains, and menaced the city of Turin. The Duke immediately drew off his army from Pignerol, and marched in quest of the enemy, whom he found encamped in the vicinity of Marsiglia. The left of the confederate army, composed of Spanish troops and Imperial cavalry, was commanded by the Marquis de Leganez; the right, of Imperial and Piedmontese cavalry and infantry intermixed, by the Duke himself, assisted by the Count de Caprara; and the centre, which consisted of Imperial, British, and Piedmontese infantry, by Prince Eugene of Savoy and the Count de Las Torres. The Duke of Schomberg, who had been denied his just rank, fought in the capacity of Colonel only, at the head of his own regiment. Early in the morning of the 4th of October, the enemy advanced to the attack with undaunted resolution, charging with fixed bayonets at the end of their fusees, without firing a shot—at that time a very unusual mode of fighting. The confederate troops defended themselves with equal spirit; till, the left wing giving way, the infantry in centre were attacked in rear and flank by the enemy's horse. Here the battle raged more desperately than ever; and the British troops had an opportunity particularly to signalize themselves. After the third attack the Count de Las Torres condescended to solicit the Duke of Schomberg to take upon him the command, and secure the retreat of the centre and right wing: but that officer, instead of a compliance, coldly replied, "that it was necessary first to have his Royal Highness's order; in the mean time they had no option but to conquer or die." After exhibiting prodigies of valour the Duke received a mortal wound; and the confederates were finally compelled to abandon the field of battle, covered with heaps of slain, to the enemy, with almost all their artillery, and above 100 standards. The French army, however, was so weakened by this victory as to be incapable of attempting any farther operations, of an offensive nature.

In the month of May, whilst the English ships were in the harbour, the different French squadrons having joined, formed a grand fleet of no less than 71 sail of the line. Early in June the English and Dutch ships sailed down the Channel. On the 6th, Sir George Rooke was detached to the Straits with a squadron of 23 ships as convoy to the Mediterranean and Smyrna trade—the whole fleet accompanying him 50 leagues to the south-westward of Ushant, for greater security to the merchant-ships, amounting to nearly 400 in number. He proceeded on his voyage, till, on the 17th, he discovered the whole French fleet cruising about 60 leagues off Cape St. Vincent. In this emergency there was no alternative but to make signal for the merchantmen to shift for themselves—the convoy maintaining as well as they were able a running fight for their protection. The result was, that two men of war, one English and one Dutch, were burnt, and two Dutch ships after a desperate resistance taken by the enemy, who also captured about 40 of the merchantmen, several of them Smyrna ships richly laden, and destroyed about 50 more. The greater part saved themselves in Faro, St. Lucar, or Cadiz. Sir George Rooke bore away for the Madeiras, whence he arrived at Cork in August; and de Tourville, after insulting the coasts of Spain, and burning several English and Dutch vessels at Malaga, and other places, returned in triumph to Toulon. The greatest clamours were excited in England by this misfortune. The Whigs and Anti-courtiers renewed their attacks on the Earl of Nottingham, through whose criminal negligence, if not more criminal treachery, it was affirmed, this unparalleled calamity had happened. The Admirals Killigrew and Delaval, both strongly attached to the Jacobite party, also fell under great suspicion. No attempt was made to retrieve the honour of the British flag, except by an attack on St. Maloes, a noted rendezvous of privateers, by a squadron under Commodore Benbow, who cannonaded and bombarded the town, for three successive days.

In the spring of the year, a session of Parliament was held in Scotland. The majority of the convention and of the nation at large being Presbyterians, it was a matter of policy to confide the administration of affairs to that party. The Earl of Melville was raised to the office of Secretary of State; but the King was thought to rely principally on the counsels of Dalrymple, Viscount Stair, President of the College of Justice. By the promotion of Melville great offence was given to Sir James Montgomery, who, being disappointed in his views of obtaining the Secretaryship of State, with the chief management of affairs, became the most virulent opposer of the government. He formed a close connection with the Earl of Monmouth, the Duke of Bolton, and other men of the same stamp; and they were so far actuated by the spirit of faction and folly, as to imagine that the national happiness and safety could be permanently established only by a counter-revolution—that King James, convinced of his errors, would detach himself entirely from the French interest; and that, if his restoration were effected by the Whigs, he would entrust himself and his interests wholly into their hands. The particulars of this conspiracy were disclosed by the brother of Montgomery to Bishop Burnet.

Endeavours were used by the court to soften the rage of opposition; and almost every considerable office was put into commission, to provide for as great a number as possible. Such, however, was the strength of the different parties united in opposition, that, in the session of April, 1690, on the first division on a trivial question respecting a contested election, the majority in favour of the court was not more than six or seven voices. The violent Whigs and the violent Tories were equally eager to obstruct the measures of government; but their views and designs were so irreconcileable that no cordial coalescence could long subsist. There were in fact three distinct parties in opposition—the Jacobites, headed by the Dukes of Athol and Queensbury, the Lords Annandale, Breadalbane, Balcarras, &c.—the disaffected Whigs, led by Sir James Montgomery, colleagued with the Lords Argyle, Ross, &c.—and the discontented Revolutionists, at the head of whom was the Duke of Hamilton; who, thinking his merits not sufficiently rewarded, and aiming at the chief direction of affairs, had no farther design than the ruin of the Lords Melville and Stair. The court saw the necessity, in order to break this coalition, of making concessions which had been formerly refused. The Lord Commissioner, therefore, gave the royal assent to the bill for rescinding the act of supremacy; to another for the direct establishment of Presbytery and annihilating the right of patronage; and to a third for the abolition of the Lords of articles. Thus, those members who had been actuated by public and patriotic motives, and whose discontent had never risen to disaffection, were at once conciliated, a majority obtained, and the bills of supply voted without difficulty. The projects of the parties were now entirely disconcerted, and mutual reproaches succeeded. A direct rupture, however, did not take place, till the arrival of a messenger from the late King with a great black box of papers, directed to Sir James Montgomery. This Sir James first opened alone, and afterwards disclosed to the Lords Argyle, Arran, and Ross, who agreed that various of the papers were improper to be seen by the other party. Sir James Montgomery therefore again closed and sealed the box, and appointed a meeting at the apartments of the Marquis of Athol, at which the Marquis himself, and the Lords Linlithgow, Ross, Breadalbane and Balcarras attended. At the meeting, Sir James informed the persons present, that a box of papers had arrived, which he had determined not to open but in their presence; protesting, in the presence of Almighty God, that he was entirely ignorant of the contents. But the Lords present, strongly suspecting the integrity of Montgomery, examined the box and seals with the greatest attention, and plainly perceived not only that the cord had been changed, but that the seals themselves were, by a strange inadvertency, Montgomery's own impression. A scene of the utmost confusion now ensued, not merely from the detection of so infamous a collusion, but from the actual inspection of the papers; by which, notwithstanding the absence of those deemed most obnoxious, it appeared that King James had consented to put the whole power of the government into the hands of the Presbyterians. All confidence being now for ever lost, the only question between the parties seemed to be, which should first impeach the other. Lord Ross, after protesting with oaths, that he never would make any discovery, communicated to a fanatic minister at Edinburgh that he was under great trouble of conscience, and desired his prayers to enable him to open his heart to him. After long prayers and many sighs and tears, he told him all he knew. The minister repeated next morning to Lord Melville the result of this conference, and desired a passport to London for Lord Ross. That nobleman, on his arrival in London and examination before the Lords Nottingham and Danby, being thought to prevaricate in his evidence, was committed close prisoner to the Tower. The Earls of Argyle, Annandale, and Breadalbane withdrawing also under different pretences to England; Montgomery himself repaired to the Earl of Melville, and made a full discovery of the whole conspiracy. Melville furnished this man also with a passport to London, and a letter to the Queen in his favour. On his subsequent examinations, however, he persisted in his refusal to reveal the names of those with whom he carried on a correspondence in England; and he consequently failed in obtaining his pardon. He at length made his escape to the Continent, where his plotting genius involved him in new dangers and difficulties, till spleen and vexation put a premature end to a turbulent and miserable life.—The Earl of Annandale threw himself upon the Queen's mercy, and gave a deposition upon oath against one Neville Payne, as a man who had been the chief medium of connection and correspondence between the English and Scotch mal-contents. Payne was apprehended, and twice put to the torture without making any confession; and it does not appear that the extent of this conspiracy, was ever perfectly ascertained. Several of the Scotch Lords were set at liberty, on giving their words of honour not to disturb the government; but Lord Arran refused, saying, he was certain he should not keep it.

The session of Parliament, which opened with so dark an aspect, may be considered to have terminated very prosperously. During the sitting, it was announced that that about 200 Highlanders, commanded by the Colonels Buchan and Wachop, who had rendezvoused at Strathspey, with a view to a descent into the Low-Country, had been surprised and defeated with great slaughter by the King's troops under Sir Thomas Levingstone. —This was the last military effort of importance, made by James's party, in the north.

A General assembly of the church of Scotland, having been convened in the autumn of the year, 1690, the proceedings of the clergy were so disagreeable to the court, that the assembly was dissolved by an act of state, and another convoked for the following year; the King determining in some measure to restore the balance of the parties, by bringing some of the Tories and Episcopalians into office. The Earl of Melville was removed from his post of Secretary of State, and made Lord Privy Seal; James Johnston, late Envoy to the Elector of Brandenburgh, and Sir John Dalrymple, were constituted joint Secretaries; Lord Tweeddale was appointed Chancellor; the Earl of Lothian, High Commissioner; and the Earl of Crawford, President of the Council. This mixed administration, however, did not conduct the affairs of government with much ability or success. The General assembly met at the close of the year 1691; and the King recommended to them, by the High Commissioner, to receive the Episcopal clergy into the church, and to concur in such measures as would be necessary to effect a general comprehension. The Prelatists now asserted, observes Burnet, "that the King was theirs; in answer to which the Presbyterians affirmed that the Law was theirs, and they would abate in no point of their government." No probability of accommodation remaining, the King ordered the assembly to be dissolved, without appointing any other time or place of meeting. The Presbyterian clergy affirmed, that they had a right to an annual meeting; therefore they adjourned themselves, first protesting against the regal dissolution; a measure which appeared to the King a gross invasion of the royal prerogative.

An unfortunate event took place at this time, which tended to throw a great odium upon the government. Breadalbane, who had been concerned in the late plot, and received his pardon, formed a scheme of quieting the Highlanders, and ensuring their submission, by distributing large sums of money among their chiefs: and 15,000*l.* were remitted from England for this purpose. He covertly informed the Highlanders, that the best service they could do King James was to lie quiet, and to reserve themselves to a more favourable time; in the mean while they were justified in taking the oaths, and sharing the money he had received among them. Many of the Highland chieftains were persuaded to a compliance; but others were obstinate, and made such extravagant demands that Lord Breadalbane found his scheme impracticable. The most refractory amongst them was M'Donald of Glencoe, between whom and Breadalbane a cause of private animosity subsisted. M'Donald having plundered the lands of Breadalbane, that nobleman insisted upon being indemnified from M'Donald's share of the money now to be distributed. M'Donald not only refused this, but was successfully active in influencing others. He also communicated to the Duke of Hamilton and other enemies of Lord Breadalbane, the dangerous secret of his being still avowedly attached to the interests of James. Exasperated at this conduct, Breadalbane devoted M'Donald and his clan to destruction. King William had by proclamation offered an indemnity to all the Highlanders who had been in arms against him, provided they would submit to take the oaths by a certain day. The time had been twice or thrice extended; and it was at last prolonged to the close of the year 1691, with a denunciation of military execution against such as should hold out beyond that time. M'Donald himself, though somewhat more tardily than the others, went to the Governor of Fort William on the last of December, and offered to take the oaths; but, as he was only a military man, he could not legally tender them, and M'Donald set out for Inverary, the county town of Argyle. The ground was covered with snow, and the weather intensely cold; notwithstanding which, he reached Inverary in a few days, or, according to some, within a single day, after the lapse of the term, prescribed by the proclamation. Sir Colin Campbell, Sheriff of the county, informed of the circumstances, administered the oaths to him and his adherents, and they returned in security to their habitations in the valley of Glencoe. Previously to this, Lord Breadalbane had repaired to London, and made his report to the King of the diligence with which he had endeavoured to effect the service entrusted to him, and to return that part of the money which he had not disposed of. He represented M'Donald to the King as the chief person who had defeated the good design; and, to gratify his own revenge, and, as some believe, to make the King odious to the Highlanders, he proposed that orders should be sent for a military execution on the men of Glencoe. This representation was strongly enforced, on the part of Secretary Stair; and shortly after the expiration of the prescribed term, a paper of instructions was drawn by the Secretary, and addressed to Colonel Levingstone, Commander of the forces in Scotland, specifying, "that such as had not taken the oaths by the time limited, should be excluded the benefit of the indemnity—and that they be destroyed by fire and sword." This instrument, dated January 21, 1692, was both signed and counter-signed by the King. However, as it was not deemed sufficiently full and explicit, a paper of additional instructions was prepared by Secretary Stair, who procured it to be, as before, super-signed and counter-signed by the King; in which, after giving directions for receiving the submission of those who had made application for mercy, it is said: "If the tribe of Glencoe can well be separated from the rest, it will be a proper vindication of public justice to extirpate that sect of thieves." Burnet affirms, "that the King signed this paper, as his custom too often was, in a hurry, without examining into the import of it." The execution of this sanguinary commission was committed to a Captain Campbell, of Glenlyon, who, at the head of a body of troops was sent, in February, 1692, to take up their quarters in the valley, remaining, as it appears, fifteen days—the commander professing the most amicable intentions; and he and his men being received with the rude but kind hospitality of the country. On the evening before the massacre, Campbell passed some hours in friendly converse and amusement at M'Donald's house: but, suspicion being excited in the minds of the two sons of M'Donald, they went out to reconnoitre, and found eight or ten sentinels on the spot where only one was accustomed to be posted. The overheard discourse amongst them was, "that they liked not the work: though they would willingly have fought the men of the Glen, they held it base to murder them." Hastening back to apprize their father of the impending danger, they found the mansion surrounded—heard the discharge of musquets, and the shrieks and clamors of those within; and, being unarmed, fled for their lives, and effected their escape. Rushing to his chamber, the assassins had shot the elder M'Donald, who fell lifeless into the arms of his wife. The Laird of Auchintrinkin, M'Donald's guest, who had submitted to the government three months before, and had then Colonel Hill's protection in his pocket, met the same fate; a boy of eight years old was stabbed to the heart, in the act of imploring mercy; and, in this manner, 38 persons were inhumanly butchered. The order extended to all the males in the valley under the age of 70, amounting to about 200: but the parties which were to cooperate with Campbell, did not arrive in time to secure the passes of the Glen, so that 160 escaped. The murderers now set the houses on fire and drove off the cattle; leaving the women and children naked and forlorn, in the midst of the snow which covered the mountains, at the distance of six miles from the nearest habitation. They are said to have mostly perished in the waste; and Lady M'Donald, a woman venerable for her years and condition, expired in a state of phrensy.

The King, moved with resentment at the imposition practised practised upon him, dismissed the Earl of Stair from his service; and caused a commission to be passed under the Great Seal of Scotland for a pre-cognition.—So terrible an example of vengeance effectually prevented any future insurrection; but it naturally inspired the Highlanders with an implacable animosity against the person and government of King William.

The session of Scotch Parliament was deferred to April, 1693, when the Duke of Hamilton having been reconciled to the court, was appointed Lord Commissioner. By the management principally of Secretary Johnston, the discontents of the nation—of the Presbyterian party in particular—were much assuaged. The Parliament consequently voted an increased establishment, and large supplies. The affairs of the church were also conducted with much temper. An act of comprehension was brought into the house, including all such of the Episcopal clergy as submitted to take the oaths before the 10th of July, 1693. An oath of fidelity also, distinct from the oath of allegiance, was imposed upon all who held offices in the church or state, to be tendered at the discretion of the council, who were impowered to fine and imprison such as should refuse.

King William returned to England in October, 1693. The prejudice against the Earl of Nottingham had so far increased as to render the ministry, of which he was the head, extremely odious. It was consequently signified to him, that the King had no farther occasion for his services. At this period, the Earl of Sunderland undertook the task of reconciling the King with the Whigs. The Marquis of Hallifax also attempted to retrieve his credit with the Whig-party, by his ardor in the same cause; but, perceiving himself shunned, neglected, and despised, he soon after terminated a restless and eventful life in a state of political chagrin strangely blended with religious contrition.

Such of the Tories as remained in office did not tamely acquiesce in the measures of their antagonists. Lord Godolphin presented to the King a memorial, in which, after stating the principal difficulties of continuing the war, he represented the great and manifold advantages which would attend the conclusion of a speedy peace. But the counsel of Sunderland was more acceptable to the King, than that of Godolphin; and a resolution was taken to engage the most popular leaders of the Whig party in the Administration. Admiral Russel was restored to the command of the fleet, and in a short time placed at the head of the Board of Admiralty; and the commissions of Lieutenancy, &c. throughout the kingdom, were altered in favour of the Whigs. According to tradition, the tender of the Seal to the Earl of Shrewsbury was attended with some singular and curious circumstances. Amongst other things, it is said, that the King sent a Colonel of the guards to the Earl with the Seals of office in one hand, and a warrant of commitment to the Tower in the other. He did not long hesitate, in the choice of evils.

The King of France was now anxious for the return of peace; sensible that an insurmountable barrier was raised against any farther permanent acquisition of power. In the course of the present winter, he made a very equitable and reasonable proposal for the accommodation of differences, through the mediation of the court of Denmark. Of the terms tendered, the Tory Ministers were supposed to approve; but the King had announced in his speech to Parliament, November 7, "the necessity of increasing the national forces both by sea and land, the next year, as essential to the honour and security of the kingdom—informing them that the Continental powers had on their part resolved upon making proportionable additions, and demanding a supply equal to the present exigency." The House of Commons, in consequence voted, unanimously, "that they would support their Majesties and the government, and grant a sufficient supply for the vigorous prosecution of the war. (a) The bill for rendering all members of the House of Commons incapable of places of trust and profit, which, in the last session, had been rejected by the Lords, now passed with a high hand through both Houses; but the royal assent was again refused. The Commons immediately voted, "that whoever advised the King not to give his royal assent to the bill in question, was an enemy to their Majesties and the kingdom." An address was also unanimously agreed to, representing the grief of the Commons, that a measure which tended so much to the clearing the reputation of the House should be rejected by his Majesty after their great exertions for the public service.

An enquiry having been instituted into the naval miscarriages of the last year, Lord Falkland, who had for some time past, filled the station of First Lord of the Admiralty, fell under Parliamentary displeasure; and Russel, after a short interval, and with unusual powers, was placed at the head of the board.

It was during the present session of Parliament, that a national bank was established, under the denomination of the Bank of England; the original capital stock of which, amounting to 1,500,000*l.* was subscribed in ten days. This was an important relief to government, and greatly raised the value of Exchequer bills, and other government securities, which had experienced considerable depreciation.*

After a violent contest, and repeated hearings before the Privy-Council, a warrant had been prepared by an Order of Council for her Majesty's signature in order to pass a new charter for the East India Company, and the Great Seal was affixed to the same by the Lord Keeper Somers, on the 7th of October, 1693. A petition was, however, presented to the House of Commons, by the antagonists of the Company, on the meeting of Parliament, containing allegations both against the legality and expediency of the new charter: and after high debates, a resolution of the House passed, declaring, "that all the subjects of England had an equal right to trade to the East Indies, unless prohibited by act of Parliament." No censure, however, was passed either on the several charters granted to the Company, or the manner of obtaining them:—nor was any project adopted for regulating the future trade, by authority of Parliament.

In Ireland, the administration of Coningsby and Porter had been rendered odious by a series of frauds and oppressions, which would have disgraced a barbarian government. Their interest, however, was so powerful, and with such plausibility did they urge the pretence of necessity, in extenuation of their measures, that a pardon was ordered to pass the Seals in their favour. This was arrested in its progress by the representations of Lord Bellamont, and James Hamilton, Esq. at the Council Board; and, at the ensuing meeting of Parliament, Bellamont exhibited regular articles of impeachment against them, accusing the Lords Justices of "traitorously abusing the power and authority with which they had been invested, &c. The House seemed greatly impressed, and its indignation was strongly excited by the enormity of the offences proved against them; notwithstanding which, a resolution ultimately passed, "that, considering the state of Ireland at the time, they did not think fit to ground an impeachment upon them." This was followed by the dismission

(a) A. D. 1693-4.

* Apprehensions, however, were intimated by some, "That an institution of this kind would soon become a mere creature of the government—that care would be taken to give it none but government operations—that on any sudden emergency, or even general panic, the Bank might find itself unable to answer the demands of its creditors, and that the failure of a national Bank must be attended with national ruin—that such an institution, under the influence of the executive government, would throw more real power into its hands, and add more facility to the projects of arbitrary and despotic ministers, not to say monarchs, than the erection of a citadel:—that the shutting up the Exchequer in the last reign but one, after the bankers had been induced to deposit the money there, was alone sufficient to manifest the danger of trusting any mighty mass of wealth within the reach of power:—and in fine, that from the time this new wheel was added to the machine of government, all its motions would be mysterious and unintelligible; and a very little cunning might serve to destroy what all the wisdom and virtue of the nation could never restore."

dismission of Bellamont, and the pardon of the accused.

A. D. 1694.] The session having terminated on the 25th of April, a grand promotion, civil and military, took place. The Earls of Shrewsbury, Bedford, and Devonshire were created Dukes; and also the Earl of Clare, and the Marquis of Carmarthen, under the new designations of Newcastle and Leeds. The Earl of Mulgrave was made Marquis of Normandy: Lord Sydney was appointed Master of the Ordnance, declared Warden of the Cinque Ports, and created Earl of Romney; Mr. Montague was made Chancellor of the Exchequer; two patents of Peerage were conferred on Lord Charles Butler, brother to the Duke of Ormond, by the style and titles of Lord Butler of Weston in England, and Earl of Arran in Ireland; and, the Duke of Hamilton dying at this period, his blue ribband was transmitted to the Duke of Shrewsbury.

The King embarked for the Continent, early in May, and, after passing a few weeks at the Hague and Loo, took the command of the allied army, at Louvaine, where he was met by the Electors of Bavaria and Cologne; the latter of whom had recently, in opposition to the French court, been chosen Bishop of Liege. The allied army amounted to about 90,000 men, well trained and provided. The French, inferior in number, had orders to act on the defensive. At length Marechal Luxemburgh, crossing the Maese, made a movement with his whole army on the side of Liege and Maestricht; and, counteracting a subsequent movement of the allies, in a most masterly manner, he posted his army between Courtray and Menin, so that no impression could be made on the French frontier on that side. Thus the grand object of the campaign on the part of the Confederates was wholly frustrated; and the service performed by Luxemburgh was considered so great, that Louis wrote a letter to him with his own hand, acknowledging, that to the unparalleled zeal and diligence of the commander-in-chief, and to the officers and soldiers serving under him, he stood obliged for the preservation of the frontiers on that side.—King William, to make some advantage of his universal superiority, detached a body of troops, to be joined by other detachments drawn from the garrisons of Liege and Maestricht, to invest the town and castle of Huy, which surrendered after such resistance as could be made; and about the middle of October, the armies separated and went into winter quarters. The Prince of Baden, who commanded on the Rhine, also retreated on the approach of winter, into Germany, without having gained any decisive advantage. In Hungary, the war continued with uninterrupted success, on the part of the Emperor. The principal scene of action, however, was Spain. In May, the Marechal Duc de Noailles had forced the Spanish lines on the banks of the Ter, and gained a complete victory; amongst the fruits of which was the reduction of Palamos, Gironne, Ostalric, and Castel Foletto. He menaced the city of Barcelona with an immediate siege; but, on the arrival of Admiral Russel, with the combined squadrons of English and Dutch, de Tourville, who was to co-operate with Noailles in an attempt upon Barcelona, retired into Toulon; and the Marechal was compelled to abandon his object. In Italy, the campaign terminated without siege or battle; the inactivity of the Duke of Savoy was supposed to originate in a clandestine negotiation with the French court.

Admiral Sir Francis Wheeler had been detached with a squadron to the streights to convoy the Mediterranean and Levant trade, and to cruize off Cadiz till the arrival of the Spanish flota. Having performed these commissions, he had the misfortune, in the month of February, to encounter, off Gibraltar, one of the most violent tempests ever known. It began on the 17th, and continued with little or no remission to the 19th. Sir Francis Wheeler, in the Sussex man of war, and two other line of battle ships, were totally lost; besides three of an inferior rate, and a great number of traders and coasting vessels.

Early in the month of June, about thirty sail of the line, English and Dutch, commanded by Lord Berkeley, having on board 6,000 land forces, sailed from St. Helen's, and came to anchor between Camaret and Bertheaume bays, lying on each side the entrance into Brest water, on the evening of the 7th. The defence of this important place had been committed to the famous Vauban, who, previously to the arrival of the English armament, had written to the King of France, "that his Majesty needed to be under no apprehension; that he had made all the subterraneous passages under the castle bomb-proof; that he had placed 90 mortars and 300 pieces of cannon in proper places; that all the ships were out of the reach of the enemy's booms, and all the troops in good order; that there were 300 bombardiers in the place, 300 gentlemen, 4000 men, regular troops, and a regiment of dragoons just arrived." After a bold and ineffectual endeavour to silence the castle and fort which guarded the entrance into the harbour, General Tollemache made a desperate attempt, to effect a landing with the troops in a small bay flanked to the right and left with cannon and entrenchments within half-musket shot of the water. They gained the shore; but they were received so warmly by the French, as to be compelled to a precipitate and disorderly retreat to the boats; and it being now tide of ebb, they could not clear themselves from the ooze in which they were bedded; and the greater part of the troops which had landed were either miserably slaughtered, or obliged to beg for quarter. The General, after displaying the most heroic valour, received a mortal wound, and the whole armament returned immediately to England.* To remove the public depression occasioned by this disaster, Lord Berkeley, agreeably to his instructions, sailed to Dieppe, and threw an immense number of bombs and carcases into the place, so that the town was in a manner ruined and destroyed. From Dieppe he directed his course towards Havre-de-Grace, which met with nearly the same fate. He then attempted Dunkirk and Calais; but the whole country being by this time alarmed, and prepared for defence, these attacks were attended with very slight success.

Admiral Russel, who commanded in the Mediterranean, after relieving Barcelona, and driving the French fleet into their ports, received orders to winter at Cadiz. It was by the appearance of this fleet, consisting of 60 sail of the line, that the Italian powers of Venice and Tuscany were induced to acknowledge the title of King William.

His Majesty landed at Margate, on the 9th of November, and was met by the Queen at Rochester. The session of Parliament was opened on the 12th, and supplies, to the amount of five millions, were readily granted. This session, the bill for the frequent meeting and calling of Parliaments, succeeded in obtaining the royal assent. It enacted, that a new Parliament should be called every third year, and that the present Parliament should be dissolved before the 25th of March, 1696.

Archbishop Tillotson, a prelate, who in a very diffi-

* General Tollemache declared, "That he felt no regret at losing his life in the performance of his duty, but that it was a great grief to him to have been betrayed." His belief of treachery was but too well founded. It appears that, on the 3d of May preceding, the Earl of Marlborough had transmitted through the hands of Colonel Sackville, a letter to King James, communicating the whole design of this expedition, which the Colonel in his dispatch to the Earl of Melfort, then occupying no ostensible office at the court of St. Germaine's, desired for the love of God might be kept a secret even from Lord Middleton. "It is only to-day," said Lord Marlborough, "I have learned the news I now write you; which is, that the bomb-ketches, and the twelve regiments encamped at Portsmouth, with the two regiments of marines, all commanded by Tollemache, are destined for burning the harbour of Brest, and destroying all the men of war which are there. This will be a great advantage to England; but no consideration can prevent, or ever shall prevent me from informing you of all that I believe to be for your service: therefore, you may make your own use of this intelligence, which you may depend upon being exactly true. But I must conjure you, for your own interest, to let no one know but the Queen and the bearer of this letter.——I have endeavoured to learn this some time ago from Admiral Russel; but he always denied it to me, though I am very sure that he knew the design for more than six weeks. This gives me a bad sign of this man's intentions. I shall be very well pleased to learn that this letter comes safe to your hands."

cult and critical situation had conducted himself with great wisdom, temper and moderation, died suddenly about this time.* He was succeeded by Dr. Tennison, Bishop of Lincoln, a man in every sense highly respectable.

In the succeeding month (December) her Majesty was attacked with the small-pox, of the confluent and most malignant sort. She is supposed to have thought herself in danger, from the first, as in an early state of the illness, she shut herself up in her closet for several hours, and, after burning many papers, put the rest in order. Archbishop Tennison attended her; and, when no hope of recovery remained, he, with his Majesty's approbation, communicated to her the true state of her condition. She appeared perfectly resigned; saying, "she thanked God she had always carried this in her mind, that nothing was to be left till the last hour—she had nothing then to do but to look up to God and submit to his will." The day before she died she received the sacrament; after which she had her last interview with the King, to whom she addressed a few broken sentences imperfectly understood. She died on the 28th of December, in the thirty-third year of her age and sixth of her reign. She was buried at Westminster with unusual honours, both Houses of Parliament assisting at the solemnity.† The King was inconsolable for her loss; for many months he seemed plunged into the deepest melancholy; and, to the last moment of his life, he cherished the tenderest affection for her memory.

During the illness of the Queen, the Princess Anne requested to be permitted to see her. This was declined; but a forgiving message was afterwards sent by the Queen, to her sister, and after her decease a reconciliation was effected between the King and Princess, through the sole intervention of the Earl of Sunderland, and she was again received at court, and treated with great demonstrations of regard.

A. D. 1695.] A perplexing question of law was now started in the Upper House by the Lords Rochester and Nottingham, who insisted that the Parliament was dissolved in consequence of her Majesty's death, the writs being issued in the joint names of the King and Queen. The Earl of Portland indignantly answered, "that this was a matter not fit to be mentioned, and much less debated." In this sentiment the House and the nation unanimously concurred.

A petition was about this time presented from the inhabitants of Royston, complaining of oppressive usage from the officers and soldiers of Colonel Hastings's regiment quartered there, in exacting subsistence-money, &c. The House, in consequence, instituted an enquiry into the conduct of the colonels of regiments and army-agents. Several of them were eventually committed to custody; Hastings was cashiered; and a proclamation was issued against such illegal and criminal practices. This enquiry paved the way to others; and it appeared that several of the leading members of the House had been guilty of corrupt practices. The Orphan's bill, brought into the House by the corporation of London, after several years' fruitless solicitation, it was remarked, had past in the course of the last session without difficulty; and, on appointing a committee to examine the Chamberlain's books, the copy of an order was found for paying Sir John Trevor, the Speaker, one thousand guineas as soon as the said bill should be passed, with an intimation from the city solicitor, that unless the said sum were given the bill would not be allowed to pass. When the report was brought up, and received, the Speaker was reduced to the indescribable mortification of putting the question, "that Sir John Trevor, Speaker of the House, in receiving a gratuity of one thousand guineas from the city of London, after passing the Orphan's bill, is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor." The affirmative being carried, the Speaker abdicated the chair, was immediately expelled by an unanimous vote of the House, and Paul Foley, Esq. was chosen Speaker in his room. Nor did the investigations of the House terminate here. The committee having been empowered to examine the books and accounts of the East India Company, it appeared, that whereas the sums issued for special or secret service did not in the year 1688 amount to more than 1284*l.* and in the two following years to more than 2096*l.* and 3056*l.*—in the year 1693 it rose to 167,000*l.* Sir Thomas Cooke, a member of the House, having been Governor of the Company during that year, was called upon to declare in what manner this money had been expended; but, refusing to answer, he was committed to the Tower; and a bill of Pains and Penalties was brought in against him. This bill was strenuously opposed by the Duke of Leeds in the House of Lords, as contrary to both law and equity. His Grace's warmth tended to create farther suspicion, especially as he was loud and earnest in the protestations of his own innocence, although no accusation had been urged against him. The bill ultimately passed, with a clause indemnifying Cooke from any offence committed by him in the distribution of the money in question; on which he delivered in a statement of the various sums paid by by him to various persons: amongst the rest, 40,000*l.* to Sir Basil Firebrace for favours and services done to the Company. The evidence of Sir Basil, and others, tending strongly to criminate the Duke of Leeds, Lord President, the Commons determined on an impeachment, charging his Grace with high crimes and misdemeanors, in that, being President of the Council, and sworn to give their Majesties true and faithful advice, he had, contrary to his oath, office, and duty, &c. contracted and agreed with certain merchants trading to the East Indies, to procure a Charter of Confirmation, &c. for the sum of 5500 guineas. At this time Robart in whose hands the money had been deposited, absconded; and the Duke of Leeds, knowing the evidence to be now incomplete, urged the immediate prosecution of the impeachment, and talked in high terms of the hardships and injustice of delay. A prorogation of Parliament taking place at this juncture, the enquiry was virtually relinquished; but the disgraceful imputations adhered to his Grace's character. He still continued at the head of the council; but his name was not inserted amongst the Lords of the Regency appointed by the King on his departure for the Continent.‡

In the spring of this year, 1695, a session of Parliament was held in Scotland; in the course of which a severe inquisition was made into the affair of Glencoe, and heavy censures passed on the Master of Stair and the other principal actors in that dismal tragedy, and prosecutions ordered to be instituted against them; but it does not appear that the examples made were so conspicuous as might have been wished and expected. This session was chiefly remarkable for an act to establish a company, by the name of the company of Scotland, trading to Africa and the Indies.§

In Ireland, the first session of a new Parliament was held

* Sancroft, the deprived Metropolitan, had died some months before Tillotson. Though he could never conscientiously take the oaths to the new government, he discovered nothing of a factious or seditious spirit, and abstained from whatever had a tendency to violate the public peace. From a conference which during his last illness he held with one of his conforming chaplains, it was evident that he died in charity with all men. "You and I," said Sancroft, "have gone different ways in these late affairs; but I trust heaven's gates are wide enough to receive us both. What I have done, I have done in the integrity of my heart—indeed in the great integrity of my heart."

† The funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Tennison, Archbishop of Canterbury: Dr. Kenn, the deprived Bishop of Bath and Wells, reproached him in a letter, for not having called upon her Majesty on her death-bed to repent of the share she had in the Revolution. This was answered in another pamphlet. One of the Jacobite clergy insulted the Queen's memory, by preaching on the following text: "Go now, see this cursed woman, and bury her, for she is a King's daughter." On the other hand, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of London came to a resolution to erect her statue, with that of the King, in the Royal Exchange.

‡ These were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Keeper Somers, the Lord Privy Seal Pembroke, the Lord Steward Devonshire, the Lord Chamberlain Dorset, the Secretary of State Shrewsbury, and the first Lord of the Treasury Godolphin. Sir John Trenchard, Secretary of State, died about this time, and was succeeded by Sir William Trumbull.

§ This company, in which nearly the whole commercial strength of held this year, by Lord Capel, now advanced to the dignity of Lord Deputy; in which affairs were conducted, with unanimity and dispatch; and many judicious laws were enacted.*

Early this year died Francis de Montmorenci Duke of Luxemburgh, one of the greatest generals of the age. The Marechal Duc de Villeroi was appointed his successor; M. de Boufflers commanding a separate and secondary army under him. This campaign, a new line was drawn for the protection of French Flanders from the Lys to the Scheld, where the storm was supposed most likely to fall; and M. Villeroi was restrained to act strictly on the defensive. King William having put himself at the head of the allied army, advanced by rapid marches to the French lines, apparently with a determination to risk an attack; and, to maintain the deception, a demonstration was made on Fort Knoque. The feint succeeded; all the French forces were drawn within the lines; and the King of England dispatched orders to the Earl of Athlone, who commanded a separate army on the side of the Maese, to invest the city of Namur. This service was performed with success; but, from the difficulty of the ground, and the great extent of the circumvallation, it was not possible to prevent de Boufflers from throwing himself into the place with a strong reinforcement. Thus the garrison amounted to 15,000 men; and great additions having been made to the fortifications, it was considered by the French as impregnable.

King William marched back his army to Rouselaar; left the command to the Prince de Vaudemont; and then, at the head of a grand division of the troops, joined the Elector of Bavaria and the Earl of Athlone, and took the command of the covering army before Namur. The season proved so dry, that the convoys of provision and ammunition could not be sent up the Sambre and Maese for want of water. M. Boufflers having joined M. Villeroi, that General was expected to march to the relief of the besieged; but the Prince of Vaudemont, posted in an exposed situation nine miles only from the French camp, determined first to rout this inferior enemy, and then to proceed to Namur. M. de Villeroi, though evidently having him in his power, resolved, in opposition to advice to the contrary, to defer the attack till the next day. The Prince, sensible of his danger, in the mean time made admirable dispositions for a retreat; and, making a grand movement, the French beheld with amazement a whole army vanish as it were from before them at once. By nine o'clock on the following morning, the Prince found himself perfectly safe under the walls of Ghent. This retreat was highly admired by all military judges; and the French commander was obliged to content himself with the capture of the petty fortresses of Dixmuyde and Deynse, the garrisons of which he detained contrary to the conditions of the cartel which had been established.

In the mean time, King William and the Elector inspired courage in every breast, by sharing the toils and dangers of the siege of Namur, equally with the men whom they commanded. On the storming of the first counterscarp, William remained exposed in the trenches a considerable time to a very hot cannonade from the enemy; which killed several persons about him, and amongst the rest Mr. Godfrey, Deputy Governor of the Bank, who had come over to establish certain regulations relative to the army remittances. On the 4th of August, the town was surrendered by Count de Guiscard, on condition of being allowed to withdraw the garrison into the castle. Villeroi, instead of attempting the relief of the castle, suddenly defiled with his whole army towards Brussels, then the residence of the Electress of Bavaria, to whom a polite message was sent by the Marechal, that he had orders to bombard the place, but would spare the quarter where she had her abode. Upwards of 2,000 bombs, and a prodigious number of red-hot shot were thrown into the place, a great part of which was thus laid in ruins. The siege of the castle of Namur, however, was continued with unabating vigour. M. Boufflers, fearing a speedy surrender, formed a desperate attempt to break through the allied camp, but was prevented. On the 21st of August the batteries opened with a general discharge from 166 pieces of cannon and 60 mortars. On the 28th, M. Villeroi, having received a powerful reinforcement from the Rhine, took post at Gemblours, and drew up his army as near the allies as the ground would permit. King William consequently quitted his lines, and made every disposition to receive his attack; but, in the night, the Marechal decamped; on the following day, a general assault was made on the castle; and, after a dreadful carnage, a lodgment was made nearly a mile in extent. M. de Boufflers at length consented to a capitulation—terms the most honourable being granted to the garrison; and thus the King of England had the honour of taking in seven weeks one of the strongest fortresses in Europe, in sight of an army of 100,000 men. On the marching out of the garrison, Marechal Boufflers was arrested, by way of reprisal for the detention of the garrisons of Dixmuyde and Deynse. At first he appeared much insensed; but he was told, that, far from intending any personal affront, it was the highest compliment to detain him, as an equivalent to the thousands included in the captive garrisons. On the arrest of Boufflers being made known to the French court, orders were dispatched for the instant release of the garrisons; and the Marechal, on his return to Versailles, was received with distinguished marks of esteem and regard.

On the Rhine, where the opposite armies were again commanded by the Marechal de Lorges and the Prince of Baden, the campaign was distinguished only by its insignificance. In Italy, the Duke of Savoy recovered the important fortress of Casal, with so little show of resistance on the part of the French, as to furnish an additional proof of the secret understanding supposed to subsist between the courts of Turin and Versailles.—In Spain also, the war was feebly prosecuted. The French King was impatient for peace, and contented himself with acting every where on the defensive.—The maritime powers had not yet been able to succeed in their design of effecting a peace between the Imperialists and the Turks.

Early in the summer, a considerable naval force under Lord Berkeley, joined by a Dutch squadron under Admiral Allemonde, was employed, though with little effect, in the service of bombarding Dunkirk, Calais, and and St. Malo; but they totally destroyed the neighbouring town of Grandval. The ships thus employed in the destruction of the property of the enemy might have been more beneficially engaged in the protection of our own; for, during the summer, many merchant vessels from the West-Indies, and five East India-men, valued at 1,000,000l. fell into the hands of the French privateers.

Early in the month of October, the King returned to England, and was received with universal acclamation. A resolution was taken to dissolve the Parliament; and, during the ensuing election, the King made a progress to the north, partook of the diversions of the turf at Newmarket, and received the compliments of the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford.

The Whig interest prevailed in the new elections; of Scotland was comprehended, were authorised to freight their own or hired ships for ten years from any of the ports or places in that kingdom, or from any other ports or places in amity with his Majesty, to any lands, islands, &c. in Asia, Africa, or America; and there to plant colonies, hold cities, towns or forts, in or upon the places not inhabited or possessed by any European sovereign or state: with an exclusive right against all persons not of the said company—provided that all the ships so freighted should make their returns to Scotland, on pain of confiscation. An exemption from all impositions, duties, and taxes was granted to the company for the term of twenty-one years. This act excited in Scotland the most eager and flattering hopes, and in England the most alarming jealousies and apprehensions; and it was in the sequel productive of very serious consequences.

* Amongst these laws was an act for abolishing the writs de Hæretico Comburendo; an act declaring all attainders and all other acts in the late pretended Parliament held by King James null and void; an act for disarming Papists; an act to restrain foreign education; and an act for the better settling intestates' estates.

and

and at the meeting of the new Parliament (November 22d) the King expressed his entire satisfaction at the choice which his people had made. Mr. Foley was again chosen Speaker; and the two Houses congratulated the glorious success of his Majesty's arms, and engaged effectually to assist the King in the prosecution of the war, which they confirmed by voting large and liberal supplies.

Four days afterwards, a bill, which had been formerly offered and rejected, for regulating trials in cases of high treason, was once more brought into the House by the Tories. It enacted, "That all persons indicted for high treason, or misprision of treason, shall have a copy of the whole indictment five days, and of the pannel of the jurors two days, at least, before the trial; that they shall be permitted the assistance of counsel; that they shall not be convicted but upon the oaths of two witnesses, joining to evidence some overt act; that the indictment be found within three years after the offence be committed; that no evidence be admitted of any overt act not expressly laid in the indictment; that they shall have like process to compel their witnesses to appear for them, as is usually granted to witnesses against them; and that they be allowed peremptorily to challenge thirty-five of the jury." Amongst those who rose in support of this bill was Lord Ashley, grandson of the great Earl of Shaftesbury, and pupil of the famous Locke; at a later period of his life universally known as the author of "The Characteristics." He had premeditated his speech; but it so happened, that, struck with the august presence and deep attention of his auditory, he was disconcerted and unable to proceed. Recovering from his embarrassment, he happily converted this incident into an argument in favour of the bill irresistibly powerful and impressive. "If I, Sir," observed he, addressing the Speaker, "who rise only to give my opinion on the bill now depending, and have no personal concern in the question, am so confounded that I am unable to find voice or words to express the least portion of that which I proposed to say; what must the condition of that man be, who without any assistance is pleading for his life, and suffering under the immediate apprehensions of being deprived of it?" This spontaneous appeal to the heart operated more powerfully than the most laboured eloquence; and the bill passed in a tumult of applause. It was immediately sent up to the Lords, who added to it a clause repeatedly rejected by the Commons: "That to the trial of a Peer all the Peers should be summoned." The Commons, however, rather than risque the bill, agreed to the amendment, and the act received the royal assent.

At this time, such was the depreciation of the current coin, in consequence of the practice of clipping, &c. that thirty shillings in the common course of exchange were equivalent only to one guinea. A resolution was therefore taken to call in and re-coin the whole of the silver currency: and though confident predictions were hazarded of the evils that would ensue from the temporary suspension of the usual medium of commerce, the whole project was carried into speedy and successful execution, under the management of Mr. Montague, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The Earl of Portland had lately solicited and obtained from the crown a grant, to him and his heirs for ever, of the Lordships of Denbigh, Bromfield, and Yale, in the county of Denbigh. This was no sooner made known to the gentlemen residing in that vicinity, than they determined to resist it; and whilst the warrant was pending, they petitioned the Lords of the Treasury for a hearing. Sir William Williams represented, "That these Lordships were part of the ancient demesnes of the Prince of Wales; and always considered by the Welsh nation as inalienable—that in the statute for granting of fee-farm rents, there was a particular exception of the Welsh rents—and it was added, that the salaries of the Welsh were payable out of the revenues in question." Lord Godolphin admitted, that the petitioners "Had offered weighty reasons for their opposition, and said he would not fail to represent them to his Majesty." The affair now lay several months dormant; but the grant not being revoked, the Denbighshire gentlemen resolved to petition Parliament against it. Mr. Price introduced the petition with a bold and energetic speech, which threw the House into a flame, and they instantly agreed upon an address to the King, in very decisive terms, to recall his grant to the Earl of Portland, which the King, with apparent reluctance, engaged to do. He declared, "That he had a kindness for the Earl of Portland which he had deserved by his long and faithful services—that he should not have given him those lands, if he had imagined the House of Commons could have been concerned—he would therefore recall the grant, and find some other way of shewing his favour to him." Accordingly, in the month of May succeeding, a fresh grant was made to the Earl of the manors of Grantham, Dracklow, Pevensey, East Greenwich, &c. of which the Parliament did not think proper to take farther cognizance. Their discontent, however, more conspicuously appeared in another affair. The recent establishment of the Scotch Commercial Company had excited in England both envy and apprehension. At a conference of the two Houses, an address to the throne was agreed upon, representing "That by reason of the great advantages granted to the Scotch East India Company, and the duties and difficulties to which that trade was subject in England, a great part of the stock and shipping of this nation would be carried thither. By this means Scotland might be made a free port for all East India commodities—and consequently those several places in Europe which were supplied from England would be furnished from Scotland much cheaper than could be done by the English.—And further, that when that nation should have settled themselves in plantations in America, the English commerce in tobacco, sugar, cotton, wool, skins, masts, &c. would be utterly lost, because the privileges of that nation granted to them by this act were such, that that kingdom must be the magazine for all commodities—and that by a clause in the said act, whereby his Majesty promised to interpose his authority to have reparation made for any damage done to the ships and merchandize of the said company, his Majesty did seem to engage to employ the shipping and strength at sea of this nation to support this new company, to the great detriment even of this kingdom." The King answered, "That he had been ill served in Scotland, but he hoped some remedies might be found to prevent the inconveniences which might arise from this act." In proof of his sincerity, the Marquis of Tweeddale, high commissioner, and the two secretaries of state, were indignantly dismissed, and the seals of secretary given to Lord Murray, son of the Marquis of Athol. The House of Commons next appointed a committee to examine by what methods this bill was obtained; and the committee having speedily made their report, and delivered a copy of an oath de fideli taken by the directors of the Scotch India company, it was resolved, "That the Directors of the Company of Scotland trading to Africa and the Indies, administering and taking here in this kingdom an oath de fideli, and, under colour of a Scotch act of Parliament, styling themselves a Company, were guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor: and that Lord Belhaven, William Paterson, David Nairne, and eighteen other persons named in the resolution, be impeached of the same."—When the Scotish nation was apprised that the King had disowned the act for the establishment of their Company, it is not easy to describe the indignation which was excited; and they resolved, in despite of the opposition of England, to persist in the prosecution of a plan which had now the sanction of law, and which the King, however he might disapprove, could neither alter, suspend, nor repeal.

An unsuccessful attempt was made in the course of the present session, to establish a council of trade. The House of Commons voted, Ist. That a council of trade should be established by act of Parliament, with powers for the more effectual preservation of the trade of this kingdom.

IIdly. That the commissioners constituting the said council be nominated by Parliament.

IIIdly. That none of the said commissioners should be of this House, &c.

A bill was ordered to be brought in, founded upon these resolutions. This project was warmly opposed by many, as inimical to the constitution; and the bill was ultimately lost.

A. D. 1696.] This year, on the 11th of February, one Captain Fisher waited on the Earl of Portland, informing him, that there was a design in agitation to seize the person of the King, which was to be followed by a general insurrection in England and Scotland, and an invasion from France. The ships, he said, were actually prepared, and a body of troops was ready to embark, with King James at their head. A commission, he added, had been brought over from James, authorising this attempt on the person of the Prince of Orange, in which more than forty persons were engaged. Saturday the 15th of February, he said, was the day fixed upon for its execution, and the attempt was to be made in a lane between Brentford and Turnham Green, on the King's return from hunting; and, in case of resistance, he was to be killed. Fisher refusing to specify the persons engaged in this plot, the King treated the affair as a fiction, and determined to hunt as usual. In the evening of the 14th, however, Lord Portland found a person of the name of Pendergrass at his apartments at Whitehall, who, being admitted to an audience, emphatically requested the Earl to persuade the King to stay at home the next day; as, should he go abroad to hunt, he would be assassinated. He further stated in substance what had been already said by Fisher. He acknowledged himself to be an Irishman and a Papist; but he declared, that when this business was proposed to him, he was struck with horror, and immediately resolved to discover it. He absolutely refused, however, to give up the names of any of the parties concerned. The Earl immediately repaired to Kensington; and, having obtained access to the King, who had retired to rest, informed him of what he had heard. The King, in consequence, altered his resolution of hunting the next day. This does not appear to have excited any alarm amongst the conspirators: it was attributed to accident; and the execution of the design was deferred till the following Saturday. A third witness, named De la Rue, came forward in the interval, and discovered not only the particulars of the conspiracy, but the names of Sir George Berkeley, Sir William Perkins, Charnock, Parker, Porter, &c. Fisher and Pendergrass now consented to come forward as witnesses. The conspirators were assembled at Porter's lodgings, Pendergrass and De la Rue being of the number, on the morning of the 22d. In the midst of their consultations they received intelligence that the King's hunting was a second time put off; upon which they fell into a consternation, and separated in great confusion. Several of them were apprehended in their beds, the following night.

Advices were at this time received from the Elector of Bavaria, that the French troops stationed on the coasts of Normandy and Picardy were in motion, and that ships of war and transports were assembling in different ports of the Channel. It was consequently resolved to communicate the whole of this extraordinary business to Parliament; and on Monday the 24th of February, the King, from the throne, apprised the two Houses that he had received several concurring informations of a design to assassinate him; and that the enemies of the kingdom were very forward in their preparations for a sudden invasion. The Parliament instantly voted a loyal and affectionate address, "expressing their detestation of so villainous and barbarous a design, and their resolution to revenge the same on his Majesty's enemies and their adherents." A bill was immediately ordered for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act; and the model of an association was drawn, to be signed by the members of the House, solemnly declaring that his present Majesty King William is rightful and lawful King of these realms. Upwards of four hundred members promptly signed this association; and an order was made, that they all should sign it, or declare their refusal, on or before the 16th of March. This was a procedure extremely obnoxious to the high Tories and concealed Jacobites. "The distinction of a King de facto and a King de jure," observes Ralph, "was revived on this occasion; and all the ability of the party was exhausted in their endeavours to shew, both from authority and argument, that they ought not to be pressed on this head; and that compliance or non-compliance ought not to be esteemed the test of a good subject." In the House of Lords, where the same association was proposed, the words rightful and lawful were strenuously attacked as not applicable to an elected sovereign; and the Earl of Rochester moved, that in their stead, should be inserted, "That his present Majesty King William hath a right by law to the crown of this realm; and that neither King James nor the pretended Prince of Wales, nor any other person, hath any right whatsoever to the same." This served as a salvo for the honour of the party; and it was adopted by the House, to conciliate the Tories, who, throughout the kingdom, signed the association of the Lords, while the Whigs adhered to that of the Commons. Towards the close of the session a bill was also introduced, for the better security of his Majesty's person and government, which enacted, that such as refused to take the oaths should be subject to the penalties of Popish recusants convict; that it should be penal to declare by writing or otherwise, that King William was not lawful and rightful King of these realms; that no person should be capable of any office of profit or trust, civil or military, that should not sign the association; or of sitting in that House after the determination of the present Parliament.

On the 27th of April, the King closed the session with a short but gracious speech.

Several of the conspirators had been brought to trial; De la Rue, Pendergrass, Porter, Goodman, Harris, &c. having been admitted as witnesses for the crown. The first who suffered was Robert Charnock, one of the two fellows of Magdalen college who in the reign of James had renounced the Protestant religion. Sir John Friend and Sir William Perkins were next tried and convicted. They both persisted in their ignorance of any assassination plot, but acknowledged that they had been present at meetings held for the purpose of conspiring against the government. At their execution, these state criminals were attended by three non-juring clergymen, who had the effrontery to give them solemn absolution in the view of all the people. For this insult to the government two of them were committed to custody, but discharged after a short confinement with only a reprimand. The third (the celebrated Collier, author of the view of the English stage) absconded. —The trials of Rookwood, Lowick, Cranbourne, &c. succeeded to those of Friend and Perkins; but afford no circumstances of particular interest. Upon the whole, it may be inferred, that the persons concerned in this dark and desperate affair at least imagined, that they were acting under the sanction of the court of St. Germains.

The most vigorous efforts were at this time made to counteract the machinations of enemies abroad. Admiral Russel, having collected a fleet of fifty ships of the line, stood over to the French coast, and discovered in the port of Calais between three and four hundred transports, drawn up close in shore, as also seventeen or eighteen men of war lying amongst the sands of Dunkirk, which were intended to cover the embarkation. Astonished at the sudden appearance of the English fleet, instead of continuing their preparations for a descent on the adverse coast, the French became anxious for the safety of their own. Admiral Russel, after detaching Sir Cloudesley Shovel, to bombard the town of Calais, returned in triumph to the Downs. James, on the other hand, returned disconsolate to St. Germains; and the troops assembled for the purpose of invasion were marched back into the interior of the country.

William embarked in May, to take upon him the command of the Allied army in Flanders. Prior to his arrival, a spirited attempt had been made, under the Earl of Athlone and General Coehorn, on an immense magazine of ammunition and military stores, which the French had collected at Givet, to enable them to make an early opening of the campaign. After a bombardment of a few hours the magazine was set on fire, and before the close of the day completely consumed, without loss to the assailants. Large armies were this year brought into the field without any apparent object; no offensive operations being attempted either by Marechal Villeroi or the King of England. The campaign on the Rhine resembled that in Flanders, and consisted wholly of unimportant movements. In Catalonia, M. de Vendome, who had superseded the Duc de Noailles, passing the Ter, attacked and forced the Spanish army under the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt encamped near the town of Ostalric. The Spaniards, however, made a good defence, and a regular retreat under the cannon of Ostalric; so that no farther advantage could be gained over them. The most important event of the present year was the defection of the Duke of Savoy, who, finding the leading powers of the alliance still reluctant to meet the advances of France, and at the same time, secretly apprised by the court of Versailles of the "infallible restoration" of King James, in consequence of the measures then concerted, provided for his own security by a separate treaty, signed early in the spring at Loretto, whither the Duke had repaired on a pretended pilgrimage. This treaty was avowed towards the close of the summer. One of its conditions went to establish a neutrality in Italy, and the consequent evacuation of that country by the confederate armies. To this the courts of Vienna and Madrid indignantly refused to accede; upon which, the Duke of Savoy, taking upon him the command of the combined forces of France and Piedmont, entered the Duchy of Milan, and invested the fortress of Valentia. After the trenches had been opened about a fortnight, dispatches arrived with the consent of his Catholic Majesty to the proposed neutrality; on which the Imperial and French troops retired; and Louis ordered a solemn Te Deum to be sung at Notre Dame for the termination of the war in Italy. In Hungary the imperial armies were again commanded by the Elector of Saxony; and a fierce but indecisive engagement took place in August, on a plain, bordering on the river Beque, after which a cessation of hostilities seemed to ensue. The attention of Europe was, however, forcibly drawn to this side of the Continent, in consequence of the sudden and successful attack made by Peter, Czar of Muscovy, on the Turkish dominions, and the surrender of the important city of Asoph, situated at the mouth of the Tanais, to the Russian arms. The Emperor Leopold was eager on this event to conclude a treaty of alliance with the Czar; and Europe for the first time began to entertain some faint idea of the greatness of that power, which was destined to make so distinguished a figure in the transactions of the succeeding century.*

The maritime powers, alarmed at the defection of the Duke of Savoy, seemed at length to lend a serious ear to the propositions of France; and on the 3d of September, the States General, with the approbation of the King of England, declared that, in consequence of the concessions of France to the imperial demands, matters were now brought to such a crisis, that in concert with their allies the mediation of Sweden might be accepted. Spain and the Emperor, however, signified their opinion, that the declarations of France were not yet sufficiently explicit. They insisted upon the re-establishment of the treaty of Westphalia in all its parts; and proposed, that the King of Sweden, as guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia, should join his forces to those of the allies, in case France should refuse to accede to the terms proposed.

William returned early in October to England. During his absence, a session of Parliament had been held in Scotland—Lord Murray, created Earl of Tullibardine, presiding as high commissioner. A spirit of loyalty seemed to pervade the whole of their proceedings; the supplies demanded by the court were granted without difficulty, and an association similar to that of England was unanimously adopted.

In Ireland, this year, a great public loss, was sustained by the death of the Lord Deputy Capel. Peace and order seemed, however, in a great measure restored. The government of that kingdom was transferred to Sir Charles Porter, Lord Chancellor, and the Earls of Montrath and Drogheda, as Lords Justices. A session of Parliament being held, the association of the English legislature was signed by all the members, excepting one, who, in consequence, was indignantly expelled.

On the 20th of October, the King, on opening the English session, acquainted the two Houses, that overtures for peace had been made on the part of the enemy; but he added, the only way of treating with France was with their swords in their hands. In reply, the Commons presented a very spirited and loyal address. The estimates of the necessary supplies being laid before the House, it appeared that nearly six millions were wanting for the current expences of the year; and upwards of five millions of floating debt, occasioned by the deficiency of former funds and taxes, were to be provided for. The Commons immediately resolved, that the supplies for the service of the year 1697, should be raised within the year; and this was effected by a land tax of three shillings in the pound, and a very heavy capitation tax, in addition to the previous burdens. The arrear of 5,160,000*l.* was provided for by loans and Exchequer bills, which till this time, from the delay and uncertainty of payment, had suffered an enormous depreciation. Now, however, the most vigorous and effectual measures were taken for the restoration of the public credit. An interest of 7*l.* 12*s.* per cent. was allowed upon these bills; they were taken by the government as money, in the payment of all duties excepting the land tax; and the commissioners of the treasury were authorised by Parliament to contract with such individuals or bodies corporate as they thought fit to exchange these bills or tallies for ready money at a certain premium; which was first fixed at ten per cent. but afterwards sunk to four; till, in a short time, to the astonishment of the public, who had so long seen them at twenty, thirty, or forty per cent. discount, they rose to par.†

Sir John Fenwick, deeply concerned in the late conspiracy, had been apprehended in the month of June at New Romney, in his way to France. He had been accompanied during part of his flight by one Webber, to whom he entrusted a letter to his lady, which was unfortunately intercepted. In this confidential effusion, he observed, "That nothing could save his life, but the endeavours of Lord Carlisle his brother, the family of the Howards, &c. or else the securing a jury." On his examination before the Lords of the Regency, he

* The talents of the young Czar, though obscured by the defects of a barbarous education, already appeared to bode extraordinary changes. His father Alexis, who died in 1675, left three sons, Theodore, Iwan, and Peter, and a daughter, Sophia. Theodore dying in 1682 constituted Iwan and Peter joint sovereigns; and, on account of the imbecility of Iwan and the tender years of Peter, Sophia was declared Regent of the empire. She was a woman of great courage, address, and ambition. Her administration was violent and bloody; and she harboured the design of seizing on the empire, to the exclusion of her brothers. But Peter, who had now attained to the age of seventeen, with equal sagacity and resolution attacked the Princess suddenly at Moscow, defeated her partisans, and, making her a prisoner, compelled her to retire within the walls of a monastery. Iwan dying in the present year, Peter now reigned sole Emperor, and soon gave indications of an ardent and aspiring mind, formed for vast and boundless enterprise.

† The Commons at this time condescended to notice a trifling paragraph in a periodical paper called The Flying Post, expressed in the following terms:—"We hear that when the Exchequer notes are given out upon the capitation fund, whosoever shall desire specie on them will have it, at five and a half per cent. of the society of gentlemen that have subscribed to advance some hundreds of thousands of pounds." Voting this passage to be "a malignant insinuation in order to destroy the credit and currency of the Exchequer bills," they ordered the printer, John Salisbury, to be taken into custody; and gave leave to bring in a bill to prevent the writing, printing, or publishing any news without license. When such a bill, however, was presented by Mr. Pulteney, it was thrown out before a second reading; because, though they saw the mischiefs of the liberty of the press, they knew not where to fix the power of restraint.

resolutely denied the charges brought against him: at length the letter was produced, the surprise of which so affected him, that he could not conceal his dismay and confusion, and no longer persisted in his protestations of innocence. On hearing that a bill was found against him by a grand jury, he petitioned for a delay of trial, and offered to discover all he knew, on condition he might have a pardon, and be excused from appearing as an evidence. This proposal was transmitted to the King, in Flanders, who refused to accede to it. Sir John, resolving to throw himself upon the King's mercy, sent him a paper, in which, after a slight and unsatisfactory account of the plots and projects of the Jacobites, he indiscreetly brought forward an accusation against the Earls of Shrewsbury, Marlborough, and Bath, the Lord Godolphin and Admiral Russel, for having made their peace with James, and engaged to act for his interest. He thus made the most powerful men in the kingdom his inveterate and determined enemies; and the King issued an order for bringing him to trial unless he made fuller and more material discoveries. Various delays, however, intervened; and Sir John Fenwick, perceiving how little chance he had of escape, thought it necessary to play a new game, and began to tamper with the witnesses who were to be produced against him. These were Porter and Goodman. The former, being the more considerable person, was offered 600 guineas to bear his charges to France, and an annuity of 300*l.* for life. Porter, instead of accepting these proposals, divulged them to the government; but Goodman proved more compliant; and when the time of the trial approached, it appeared that, one of the witnesses having absconded, no legal conviction could take place. The enemies of Fenwick, however, were too powerful to suffer him thus to reap the benefit of his artifices. On the 6th of November, Admiral Russel acquainted the House of Commons, that his Majesty had given leave to lay before them the several papers which had been given in by Sir John Fenwick, in the nature of informations against himself, and several other persons of quality; and he desired that those papers might be read, that so he might have an opportunity of justifying himself; or, if he did not, that he might fall under the censure of the House. The papers being read, Fenwick was ordered to the bar of the House, and interrogated by the Speaker as to his knowledge of the designs and practices of the enemies of government; being at the same time told, that to make a full and clear discovery was the best and only method he could take to deserve the favour of the House. To this he made a very weak and prevaricating reply; and a motion was made, and carried by a great majority, to bring in a bill to attaint him of high treason. The bill, however, in all its stages, through both Houses, encountered a most unexpected opposition. The Tories and concealed Jacobites in the House felt that they stood upon high and popular ground; and they artfully and ably improved their advantage. The first division on the motion for leave to bring in the bill was 179 voices to 61: and the bill was finally passed by 189 voices against 156. It was then transferred to the Lords, where it occasioned another vehement contest; and it was ultimately carried on a still closer division of 68 Lords against 61; forty-one of whom subscribed a strong protest against the bill. The impolicy of the Whigs was manifest in thus affording their antagonists an opportunity of appearing in the advantageous light of the advocates and defenders of the constitution; for, however romantic it may be to deny the abstract principle, that there are extraordinary cases which justify extraordinary deviations from established rules, the concluding observation of the Lords' protest cannot be justly controverted, "That Sir John Fenwick is so inconsiderable a man, as to the endangering the peace of the government, that there needs no necessity of proceeding against him in this extraordinary manner. The bill received the royal assent early in January 1697. Sir John, finding that there was no mercy in reserve for him, prepared with fortitude to meet his approaching fate; and, notwithstanding the proofs of weakness and pusillanimity which he had previously shewn, he resigned himself to the stroke of death with calmness and composure. On account of his rank and noble connection, his sentence was changed to decapitation, which he suffered on Tower-hill, January the 28th, leaving in the hands of the sheriff a paper containing, with a denial of some circumstances, a virtual confession of the substance of the charges adduced against him; and "praying God to bless his true and lawful sovereign King James; and to restore him and his posterity to the throne again, for the peace and prosperity of the nation."

Parliament closed its sittings on the 16th of April; the King declaring his intention to embark for the continent. Previously to his departure, he appointed the Earl of Sunderland to the office of Lord Chamberlain, vacant by the resignation of the Duke of Dorset. He was also sworn of the Privy Council, and constituted one of the Lords Justices during the King's absence. The Lord Keeper Somers was created a Peer, and advanced to the dignity of Chancellor of Great Britain; and Admiral Russel was made Earl of Oxford, and continued to occupy the post of first commissioner of the Admiralty.

A joint memorial was presented to the court of Vienna, by the ambassadors of England and Holland, early in the year, to entreat his imperial Majesty to accept the mediation of Sweden, and to name a place for holding the congress. The Emperor expressed, in cold and haughty terms, his acquiescence; and the ministers of the allied powers, with the exception of Spain, assembled at the Hague, in the month of February. M. de Callieres, in the name of Louis, offered to confirm and re-establish the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen, as the basis of a pacification; to restore the city of Strasburg to the Empire, and Luxemburg to Spain, or an equivalent for each; to restore Mons, Charleroy, and the places captured in Catalonia, to Spain, in the state in which they were taken, and the town and castle of Dinant to the Bishop of Liege; to annul all the decrees of re-union made since the conclusion of the peace of Nimeguen; to restore Lorraine according to the conditions of the said treaty; and to recognise the Prince of Orange as King of Great Britain. The Emperor, however, still appeared sullen and discontented; insisting, not only on the re-establishment of the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen, according to the explanation of Nuremburg, but on the unconditional restitution of Lorraine to the Duke, of the castle and Duchy of Bouillon to the Elector of Cologne; and with respect to Spain, to place all things on the basis of the treaty of the Pyrenees. In a subsequent memorial, delivered to the Swedish ambassador as mediator, stiled the ulterior of his Cæsarean Majesty, the same demands were renewed—with the addition of the declaration, "That his imperial Majesty would not have consented to accept the mediation at all, if the King of Sweden had not consented to guaranty the preceding declarations of France." The death of the Swedish sovereign, Charles XI. at this period, did not impede the progress of the negotiation; his successor inheriting the same inclinations and attachments. The Emperor and the King of Spain at length agreed to open the conferences in form; and the congress was transferred from the Hague to the village of Ryswick, where King William had a palace, which now became the seat and centre of discussion; many successive weeks and months passing away in unavailing altercation.

Whilst the allied sovereigns affected to give law to France in the cabinet, the armies of that power were making new acquisitions and conquests: and, on the arrival of William in Holland, he received the intelligence, that the town of Aeth was invested by the enemy, under M. Catinat; the Marechals Villeroi and Boufflers having the command of the covering army. The place was surrendered after a slight defence. King William, however, took upon him the command of the allied army, and prevented Catinat from gaining any farther advantage. The opposite armies lying near to each other, in the neighbourhood of Brussels, the attention of the public was attracted by the repeated interviews of the Earl of Portland and Marechal Boufflers, who learing their trains, were accustomed to meet by agreement in the plain of Halle, in the sight of the two camps. At the last of these conferences these two statesmen retired to a cottage, and signed the articles previously determined. It was then signified to the plenipotentiaries at Brussels, that the King of England had adjusted his separate concerns with France; and William immediately retired from the camp to his palace at Loo.

Burnet states, that the Earl of Portland told him, that it was stipulated at Halle, that the King of France should give King James no assistance, and the reigning monarch no disturbance upon his account; that James should retire to Avignon or Italy; and that the Queen's jointure of 50,000*l.* per annum should be paid as to a Dowager—James being considered as dead in law. James not retiring from France, the jointure was of course with-held.*

The chief effort of the French this campaign was made in Catalonia; for the court of Versailles, aware that the pride of Spain was the grand obstacle to peace, was resolved to convince them how unable they were to carry on the war, unsupported by other powers. Towards the end of May, the Duc de Vendome advanced at the head of a powerful army towards Barcelona. The Spaniards retiring at his approach, the city was invested on the 12th of June; and the coast being no longer defended by an English fleet, the Count D'Estrees, with a squadron of men of war and galleys, at the same time blockaded the port. The Prince of Hesse Darmstadt, governor of Barcelona, made an able and resolute defence; but the place, after a siege of nine months, was compelled to capitulate; and the court of Madrid, by a loss so great and unexpected, was thrown into the utmost consternation. Intelligence if possible still more alarming reached them nearly at the same moment. In the beginning of the year the French government had dispatched a squadron to the West Indies, to seize the Spanish Plate fleet. M. de Pointis the commander, finding on his arrival at St. Domingo that the galleons had already reached the Havanna, proceeded to Carthagena; of which, after a spirited resistance, he made himself master, and found in it an immense quantity of specie and merchandize, to the amount, as De Pointis says, of eight millions of crowns. The French evacuated the place after demolishing the principal fort, and stood to sea with their plunder. Shortly after they left Carthagena, they fell in with the English fleet, cruizing on those seas, near the streights of Bahama, and much superior in force; but by favour of the winds they had the good fortune to escape.

In consequence of these events, the Spanish court lowered its tone, and much facilitated the conclusion of the treaty.

The campaign in Hungary had this year been eminently glorious to the imperial arms. Prince Eugene of Savoy had been appointed commander in chief of the imperial armies on the Danube. The Grand Seignor took the field in person; and his first motions indicating a design of penetrating into Transylvania and Upper Hungary, Prince Eugene advanced by forced and rapid marches to cover the important fortress of Peterwaradin, apparently menaced by the Turks. The Grand Seignor, seeming to despise the youth and inexperience of Eugene, halted at Zenta, and threw a bridge over the Theysse, which he passed with his cavalry, leaving his infantry open and exposed to an attack on the other side. The Prince seized the advantage. Whilst the cavalry were still confusedly passing, and two hours of day-light only remained, the imperial troops came up, and charged the enemy with a spirit and vigour which sufficiently shewed the confidence they felt in their commander. All was now dismay on the part of the Turks; and signs of an absolute rout became visible. Retreat soon changed into flight; and, no quarter being given, the carnage was terrible. The bridge, which all endeavoured to gain, was choked up with dead bodies, and thousands threw themselves into the river to avoid the fury of the sword. Of the Turkish camp, all the tents, not excepting that of the Grand Seignor himself; all their stores, ammunition, and provisions, 130 pieces of cannon, several hundred pairs of colours, 6000 camels, 5000 horses, &c. Prince Eugene remained master. The Grand Seignor saved himself by flight; but the Grand Vizier was killed, and the seal of the empire was presented to the conqueror. The Aga of the Janizaries and twenty-seven Bashaws were found also among the dead, the number of whom was said to exceed 30,000, including those drowned in the Theysse; the loss of the Germans amounting to little more than 2000 men. The Emperor, on receiving this intelligence, dispatched a courier to the States General, with a letter in his own hand, acquainting them with the news of this decisive action, which he hoped would induce them to retard, perhaps to break off, the negotiation. The measures of their high mightinesses, however, were unalterably fixed; and they received the news of this great victory with cold indifference, if not with secret chagrin.

One of the most signal events of the preceding year was the death of the celebrated John Sobieski, King of Poland. On his demise the kingdom was distracted by the rage of opposing factions. The Duke of Lorraine, the Princes of Baden and Neuberg, and Don Livio Odeschalchi, nephew to the late Pope Alexander VIII. were amongst the earliest competitors for the crown; but, finding their weakness, they soon withdrew their pretensions; and the contest was then confined to Prince James, eldest son of the late King, the Prince of Conti, and Augustus, the Elector of Saxony. The Abbe Polignac, ambassador of France at Warsaw, had, by great address, and by lavishing vast sums of money, secured, as was thought, a decided majority of votes in favour of the Prince of Conti; but Prince James, perceiving the prospect of success hopeless as to himself, was prevailed upon to throw his interest into the scale of the Elector of Saxony, who thus greatly outnumbered the Prince of Conti. The Archbishop of Gnesna, Primate of Poland, whose office it was to declare the election, being in the interest of France, protested against the compromise as a collusion, and proclaimed the Prince of Conti. Repairing to the cathedral, he caused Te Deum to be sung for an act which threatened to involve the kingdom in a civil war. The

* On the other hand, M. Boufflers, as M. de Torcy states, insisted that a general act of grace should be granted to the English who had followed the fortunes of James, and that they should be restored to the possession of their estates—also, that none of the subjects of the French King should be allowed to enter, or to settle in, the city of Orange; because his Majesty foresaw that the new converts, still attached to their former errors, would flock to the provinces bordering upon Orange, and, if leave were given them, would settle there. It farther appears from the memoirs of King James, that Louis proposed to William to obtain a Parliamentary settlement of the crown after his decease upon the nominal Prince of Wales, a child not as yet nine years of age; and that William did not indicate any aversion to restore the Prince to that inheritance of which he had been deprived, by the extreme, and, in relation to him, unmerited rigour of fortune. On the communication of this project to James he opposed it with great vehemence; observing, that "He could not support the thoughts of making his own child an accomplice to his unjust dethronement: he could suffer with Christian patience the usurpation of the Prince of Orange, but not that of his own son." "Should even the Prince of Orange," said James, in a letter addressed to Louis, "induce the Parliament of England to repeal the Act of Settlement, it would be always on condition of having the Prince of Wales placed in their hands, without their being able to give any security either for his person or his conscience." Of course King William could not for a moment entertain the idea of reinstating the Prince, but on the condition of his residence in England for the purpose of education; a concession which he could scarcely expect from the bigotry of James. The Duke of Berwick, in the Memoirs of his life, relates, that on the proposition in question being made by the King of France, the Queen, being present at the conversation, would not allow her husband time to answer, but passionately declared, "that she would rather see her son dead than in possession of the crown to the prejudice of his father." The idea of his being educated a Protestant, filled them with horror: and, persuaded that the acquisition of a temporal must be attended with the loss of a celestial crown, they declined without hesitation an offer which appeared to them so extremely disadvantageous.

Bishop

Bishop of Cujavia proclaimed the Elector King of Poland, and sung Te Deum on the spot; and the new King afterwards made his entry in triumph into Warsaw. The Prince of Conti, on his subsequent arrival, found his opponent already in possession of the kingdom; and after a short and ineffectual struggle he was compelled to return full of chagrin and resentment to France. The Elector of Saxony was under the disgraceful necessity of changing his religion, to qualify himself to fill the throne of Poland; and from this æra the house of Brandenburg acquired the high political advantage of being regarded as the head of the Protestant interest in Germany, while the strength and riches of Saxony were exhausted, to enable the Elector King to maintain possession of his crown.

Whilst the negotiations were going forward at Ryswick, the court of St. Germains amused itself by publishing a succession of manifestoes, of which no one condescended to take the slightest notice. On the 20th of July, the ambassadors of France delivered in the ultimatum of that court; and, animated by the recent success of their arms, a declaration was made, that it was to be accepted by the last day of August; or, if not, France should hold herself as much at liberty to recede, as the allies to refuse. The Count de Kaunitz, the imperial ambassador, protested that he would pay no regard to that limitation; but, on the 30th of August, he delivered to the mediator a paper, signifying the concurrence of his court in the terms proposed, but refusing the equivalent offered for Strasburg. The French ambassador declared, that, the term prescribed for the acceptance of the ultimatum being now expired, all his offers were vacated—that therefore the King of France would reserve Strasburg, and unite it, with all its dependencies on this side the Rhine, to his crown for ever—that in other respects he would adhere to the projét, and restore Barcelona to the crown of Spain; but that these terms must be accepted in twenty days, otherwise he should think himself at liberty to refuse. In consequence of this peremptory declaration, on the 20th of September, at midnight, the articles were signed by the English, Dutch, Spanish, and French ministers, notwithstanding all the arguments and remonstrances of the imperial ambassador against it; and on almost precisely the same conditions which had been offered by France eight months before. On the 30th of October following, the Emperor consented to the treaty.

King William returned from the continent in the month of November; and the Parliament met on the 3d of December. The King expressed his satisfaction that the war into which he had entered by the advice of his people, was at length terminated by an honourable peace; but, in the course of his speech he pronounced the circumstances of affairs abroad to be such as to oblige him to declare his opinion, that, for the present, England could not be safe without a land force. This expression threw the Parliament and the nation into the highest ferment. The revival of this project was universally ascribed to the Earl of Sunderland. In their address, which was framed in high terms of respect, the Commons congratulated his Majesty as having by the late honourable and advantageous peace completed the glorious work of national deliverance, but preserved a profound silence on this topic; and when the question came to be debated in the House, the patriots and anti-courtiers carried, on a division of 185 members against 148, of whom 116 were place-men, a resolution, importing that all the forces raised since the year 1680 should be disbanded. By this vote, the whole number of troops to be maintained did not exceed 8000 men. A standing army was affirmed to be inconsistent with a free government, and absolutely destructive of the English constitution.

The credit of the ministers suffered greatly by this unsuccessful attempt; and the most severe and bitter reflections were thrown out against Lord Sunderland. Dreading the disgrace, and, what was to him far worse, the danger of Parliamentary censure, that nobleman resolved upon a resignation of his office of Lord Chamberlain, to the infinite chagrin of the King.*

Forcible and acute as William's feelings were upon his disappointment, he abstained from all public indications of spleen or discontent; and the Commons, to soften the unavoidable harshness of a resolute non-compliance in a matter of so great moment, now granted him a revenue for life, and raised the civil list to the sum of 700,000*l.* per annum.

Early in 1698, the contest between the East India Company and the associated merchants was revived with undiminished animosity. It had been intimated to the company, by persons supposed to be in the confidence of ministers, that, in consideration of a loan to be advanced by them to government at a low interest, their charter might now be renewed. Believing all opposition at an end, they received this proposition with unexpected coolness; on which Mr. Montague, Chancellor of the Exchequer, set on foot a negotiation with their antagonists. No sooner was this intelligence conveyed to them, than they made an offer of the sum of 700,000*l.* at the low interest of four per cent. But the opposite party had previously closed with the terms of Mr. Montague, and agreed to advance the sum of two millions at eight per cent. to government, in consideration of a new charter securing to them an exclusive trade to India; and in the month of May a bill was ordered to be brought into the House conformably to these conditions. From the commencement of this intricate investigation the Tory interest greatly predominated amongst the members of the old company, and the associated merchants were chiefly or entirely Whigs; so that this was a political as much or more than it was a commercial contest. At this period the Whigs possessed the chief share of power and influence: and in the business of finance, in particular, Montague, though only Chancellor of the Exchequer, was much more regarded than Lord Godolphin, a Tory, who filled the post of first Lord of the Treasury. Under the powerful patronage of Montague, therefore, the bill for the establishment of the new company finally passed the House of Commons, and was sent up to the Lords. The question for the second reading of the bill was carried by 65 voices against 48: twenty-one of whom, with Lord Godolphin at their head, signed a vigorous protest against it. The opposition had now exerted their utmost strength, and the bill, after passing through the usual forms, received the royal assent. In three days after opening the subscription books, the whole sum of two millions was subscribed, contrary to the prediction hazarded by the Protesters. Many individuals, however, of clear discernment, rising superior to the violence and to the prejudice of party, maintained that it was highly irrational to establish by law any corporation of commercial monopolists either foreign or domestic.

In the course of the present session, complaint was made of a book written by William Molyneux, Esq. of Dublin, intituled, "The case of Ireland's being bound by acts of Parliament in England;" in which the dependence of that kingdom on the authority of the Parliament of England was peremptorily denied. On the report of the committee, appointed to examine the same, it was unanimously resolved, "that the said book was of dangerous consequence to the crown and the people of England, &c."—and an address was presented to the King, upon the subject. Such was at this time the political depression of Ireland, that this procedure of the English Parliament excited no visible resentment on the part of the Irish legislature. A second address, no less extraordinary, was soon after presented to the King, with a view of discouraging the exportation and manufacture of wool in Ireland.

This year was distinguished by a vehement controversy between two Divines of profound erudition, Sherlock and South, respecting the mystery of the Trinity; which ultimately induced the Parliament to enact,

* The post of Chamberlain was kept vacant near two years, in the hope doubtless of his re-acceptance; during which interval it was supposed he received the emoluments of the office: but the succeeding events of the reign were not such as would incite him to resume it.

"that if any person educated in the Christian religion shall deny the same to be true, or the Holy Scriptures to be of divine authority, or impugn the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, he shall be incapable of holding any office or place of trust, and for the second offence be disabled from bringing any action, or from acting as guardian, executor, legatee, or purchaser of lands, and shall suffer three years' imprisonment without bail."

On the 5th of July, the Parliament was prorogued, and in two days after dissolved, having sat its full period three years. The chief alteration discernible in the state of things at court, at this time, was the Earl of Portland's decline of favour with the King, and the rapid rise of the Earl of Albemarle, son of M. Pellant Lord of Keppel in Guelderland—a young man of an agreeable person and address, and endowed with all the arts and accomplishments of a complete courtier. The Earl of Portland saw his rivalship with extreme uneasiness; but his remonstrances served only to excite dislike and displeasure. The King, however, whose esteem survived his affection, sent this nobleman, at the conclusion of the war, on an honourable embassy to Paris, where he displayed, and was in return entertained with, unusual splendour and magnificence.* On his return, finding his influence over the King in a manner extinguished, he resigned the places he had held for near ten years in the royal household.

The Duke of Gloucester, only son of the Prince and Princess of Denmark, having now reached the tenth year of his age, the King allotted him a separate establishment, appointing the Bishop of Salisbury his preceptor, and for governor the Earl of Marlborough.†

In the summer, a session of Parliament was held in Scotland. That kingdom was in a state of general inflamation, in consequence of the famous commercial bill passed in the former session. At an early period of their meeting, an animated representation was presented to Parliament by the Company, stating "the loss and disappointment they had suffered from the withdrawment of the English subscriptions; in lieu of which, they had published similar proposals in the city of Hamburgh, which had met with extraordinary success, 200,000*l.* being subscribed by the merchants there in a very short time. But, to their great surprize, a stop was put to the business, by a memorial delivered to the Senate by special warrant from his Majesty, not only disowning the authority under which they acted, but threatening both Senate and inhabitants with the King's utmost displeasure, if they should countenance or join with them in any treaty of trade or commerce." The Parliament voted immediately a petition to the King, in favour of the privileges of the said company; but as his Majesty was abroad, no answer could be returned before the termination of the session.

The Parliament of Ireland had also assembled at Dublin; but the session passed without any memorable occurrence.

Towards the close of July, the King embarked for the Continent, vesting the government of the kingdom, in a Regency. Previously to his departure, he left sealed orders with the Regents, conformably to which 16,000 troops were to be kept up, though, by a vote of the House of Commons, the number was limited to 10,000. But the King gave as a reason, that no determinate number was mentioned in the act, and that the illness of the King of Spain, and the near prospect of his dissolution, made it advisable not farther to reduce the standing military force of the kingdom.

William's grand object, after all the toils and dangers he had undergone, was now by fixing the balance of power in Europe to establish and, if possible, perpetuate its tranquillity. The health of the King of Spain was such, that he could not be expected long to survive: and upon whom the succession of that monarchy and its appendages should devolve, became a matter of serious consideration. The Emperor claimed the whole as his indubitable right in the capacity of heir general of the House of Austria, and nearest in blood in the male line descended from Philip and Joanna, King and Queen of Spain: and by one of the articles of the league of Augsburg the maritime powers engaged to assist the Emperor with all their forces, in the event of the King of Spain's demise, in taking possession of the same. The other great claimant was the King of France, in right of his wife Maria Theresa, eldest daughter of Philip IV. who had indeed, on her marriage, renounced all pretensions to the succession of Spain. But this renunciation was held by the majority of the Castilians to be null and void in itself, as contrary to the rights of nature, and to the fundamental laws of the Spanish monarchy, which maintained the lineal order of succession without distinction of male or female.

King William was much displeased with the Emperor for his haughty and pertinacious refusal to concur in the late treaty. The Earl of Portland, on his late embassy to Paris, had instructions to communicate to Louis XIV. the project of an eventual Treaty of Partition relative to the Spanish monarchy, devised by the King of England for the purpose of preventing of those bloody and furious contentions which had been so recently and happily terminated; and to ensure to Europe the blessings of a general and lasting peace. These overtures were favourably received; and on the arrival of King William at Loo, the plan was finally digested and arranged, in concert with the French Ambassador. The terms of the treaty were extremely unfavourable to the House of Austria, to whom the duchy of Milan only was allotted as an appanage for the Archduke Charles, younger son of the Emperor. The Sicilies, Sardinia, and all that Spain possessed to the north-eastward of the Pyrenees, comprehending the towns of Fontarabia and St. Sebastian, were to be annexed for ever to the monarchy of France. And Spain and the Indies, with the Low-Countries, were given to the Electoral Prince of Bavaria, an infant scarcely seven years of age, descended from the Emperor Leopold by his first Empress, Margaret Theresa youngest daughter of Philip IV. King William now wrote a letter from Loo to Lord Somers, dated August the 15th, 1696, as follows:—"I imparted to you before I left England, that in France there was expressed to my Lord Portland some inclination to come to an agreement with us concerning the succession of the King of Spain; since which Count Tallard has mentioned it to me, and has made such propositions, the particulars of which my Lord Portland will write to Vernon, to whom I have given orders not to communicate them to any other besides yourself, and to leave to your judgment to whom else you would think proper to impart them; to the end that I might know your opinion upon so important an affair, and which requires the greatest secrecy. If it be fit this negotiation should be carried on, there is no time to be lost; and you will send me the full powers under the Great Seal, with the names in blank, to treat with Count Tallard." In reply, the Chancellor wrote to the King, saying, "that Lord Orford, Mr. Montague, and the Duke of Shrewsbury had been made acquainted with the subject of his Majesty's le ter, and stating, though in faint and feeble terms, the various objections which occurred to them on the perusal of the papers transmitted by the Earl of Portland."—"As to what would be the future condition of Europe if the proposal took place, we thought ourselves," says the Chancellor, "little capable of judging. But it seemed that if Sicily was in the French hands, they will be entirely masters of the Levant trade; that if they were possessed of Finale and those other sea-ports on that side, whereby Milan would

* The Secretary of the embassy was the celebrated Prior; who passing through the grand apartments of Versailles, and being shewn those fine pieces of Le Brun which represent the victories of Lewis XIV. was asked by the officer who attended, "Whether King William's actions were also depictured in his palace?" "No, sir," replied the Englishman, "the monument of my master's actions are to be seen every where but in his own house."

† Peter, Czar of Muscovy, passed several months of the preceding winter in England; but no indications were visible, except to the discerning few, of those great talents which, in the sequel, rendered his name so illustrious.

would be entirely shut out from relief by sea, or any other commerce, that duchy would be of little signification in the hands of any Prince. And that, if the King of France had possession of that part of Guipuscoa which is mentioned in the proposal, besides the ports he would have in the ocean, it does seem, he would have as easy a way of invading Spain on that side as he now has on the side o Catalonia." Thus Lord Somers conceded in the King's favour the grand points, that England was not disposed to enter into a new war; that France could not be expected to relinquish so rich a succession without considerable advantages; and that the King would no doubt reduce the terms as low as could be done; and he concluded with sending the blank commissions under the Great Seal, as required. These commissions had no sooner arrived at their destination, than the treaty was formally signed by the Earl of Portland and Sir Joseph Williamson, Ambassador at the Hague, on the part of the King of England, and on that of the King of France by M. Tallard, in the preamble of whose powers it is said, "that the desire of maintaining the peace of Europe, together with the esteem and friendship which Louis King of France and Navarre had conceived for his most dear and most beloved brother King of Great Britain, had induced him to enter into closer engagements with his said brother, and to concert with him the necessary measures for preventing such emergencies as might occasion a new war, &c.". The treaty of Partition was succeeded by a triple league between England, Holland, and Sweden; not only importing perpetual amity and reciprocal assistance in case of invasion or attack, but professing to guaranty the peace of Europe against all aggressors. The mediation of the maritime powers was at length accepted in form by the Imperial and Ottoman courts, and a general pacification, after a negotiation of several months, was concluded January 1699, at Carlowitz; by the terms of which the Emperor was allowed to retain all his recent acquisitions and conquests. Russia, Poland, and Venice, the other belligerent powers, successively acceded to the treaty; the former was gratified by the cession of Asoph, Caminick was restored to Poland, and the Morea, with several fortresses in Dalmatia, yielded to the Venetians. Europe was therefore once more permitted to enjoy throughout the wide extent of her kingdoms and empires an universal, but precarious peace.

King William did not arrive in England till the month of December, and the nation seemed not well pleased that their sovereign, now the war was terminated, should continue to pass six months of the year on the Continent—the greater part of it spent, as was well known, in indolent retirement at Loo. The new Parliament, originally convened for the 27th of September, met December the 6th. The King in his speech strongly pressed the consideration of the force which ought to be maintained at sea and land this year. "To preserve," said he, "to England the weight and influence it has at present on the councils and affairs abroad, it will be requisite Europe should see you will not be wanting to yourselves." The indiscreet conduct of the King in retaining a military force so much larger than the last Parliament had voted or provided for, elicited the resentment of the Commons, in a very unusual manner; and, omitting to return any address whatever, they proceeded to pass a resolution, "that all the land-forces in English pay, exceeding 7000 men, and those consisting of his Majesty's natural-born subjects, be forthwith disbanded." The ministers perceiving the temper of the House, allowed the bill founded upon the resolution to pass almost without debate. The mortification and chagrin manifested by the King upon this occasion were so great, that it was said he harboured serious thoughts of abandoning the government to a Regency, and fixing his residence in Holland. There is even extant a speech, which it is pretended he had resolved to make to the two Houses on announcing to them his intention.*

However, on the 1st of February, 1699, the King went to the House of Lords, and gave his royal assent to the bill; expressing his opinion, that there was great hazard in breaking such a number of troops, and his chagrin at the removal of those guards which had come over with him to their assistance, and who had constantly attended him in all the actions wherein he had been engaged. But as nothing could be so fatal as any distrust or jealousy between him and his people, he had been induced to pass the bill; of which he desired not to be considered as responsible for the consequences. The House of Commons now declared that they would on all occasions stand by and assist him in the preservation of his sacred person and support of his government, against all his enemies whatsoever. The King made an ultimate effort to soften the most rigid and painful clause of the act, by a royal message, as follows: "His Majesty is pleased to let the House know, that the necessary preparations are made for transporting the guards who came with him to England; and that he intends to send them away immediately, unless, out of consideration to him, the House be disposed to find a way for continuing them longer in his service, which his Majesty would take very kindly." Instead of complying with the King's request, the Commons instantly resolved upon an address to the King, on a division of 175 to 156, declaring "their unspeakable grief that his Majesty should be advised to propose any thing to which they could not consent with due regard to that constitution which his Majesty came over to restore, and so often exposed his royal person to preserve—and did in his gracious declaration promise, that all those foreign forces which came over with him should be sent back." —To this intemperate address the King made a cool and judicious reply, "expressing his entire confidence in the affections of his people, and repelling with firmness the insinuation that his wish to retain his native guards arose from any distrust of the attachment of his English subjects.† The Tories, finding their strength, now proceeded to exhibit other proofs of their discontent and dissatisfaction. With a view to cast a reflexion on the tolerant spirit of the present Whig ministry, an address was presented to the King, complaining of the boldness with which, from his Majesty's unexampled clemency, the papists had of late frequented the metropolis and all places of public resort; and beseeching his Majesty to issue his royal proclamation against them: to which the King promised to assent. The old East-India Company were now encouraged to present a petition to the Commons, praying, "that their case might be taken into consideration; and that the House would make some provision that their corporation might subsist for the residue of the term of twenty-one years granted by his Majesty's charter: and that such farther considerations might be had for the petitioners' relief, and for the preservation of the East-India trade to England, as should be thought meet." This petition was favourably received, and a bill ordered by the House to be brought in thereupon; but it was not suffered to proceed to a second reading.

It had transpired, that the auditors of the imprests had declined passing his, Lord Orford's accounts, for want of sufficient vouchers; and it was also affirmed, that his lordship had unnecessarily retained a large sum of money in his hands, to the prejudice of the seamen and to his own private advantage. The Commons therefore called for the said accounts; from which it appeared that there remained a balance in the Earl of Orford, as treasurer of the navy, of 460,000*l.* of which the Earl declared that 380,000*l.* was then in a course of payment. The House, however, presented a violent

* Lord Sunderland, on being informed that the King threatened to throw up the crown, exclaimed with sarcastic contempt: "Does he so? There is Tom Pembroke"—meaning the Earl of Pembroke—"who is as good a block of wood as a King can be cut out of; we will send for him! and make him our King."

† In a confidential letter written by him at this period to Rouvigny, Earl of Galway, he says, "I see you are uneasy at the proceedings of the Parliament here—I think you have too much cause to be so—It is not to be conceived how people here are set against foreigners.—You will easily judge on whom this reflects. My measures must be regulated according as things go in the Parliament, of which there is no being sure till the session is over.—There is a spirit of ignorance and malice prevails here beyond conception."

address to the throne, "complaining of mismanagement of the public service—of misapplication of the public money—of the introduction of new and unnecessary charges—of the want of regular vouchers—and finally declaring, that the offices of first commissioner of the admiralty and treasurer of the navy were inconsistent, and ought not to be executed by the same person." In consequence of this address, the Earl of Oxford resigned his employments, and was succeeded in the admiralty by the Earl of Bridgewater, a nobleman wholly unacquainted with sea affairs.

By a bill sent up from the Commons to the Lords some years ago, attainting the Irish who had been in arms against the government, their estates by law confiscated to the crown were applied to the payment of the public debts, leaving only a power to the King to dispose of the third part of them. This bill met with much opposition; and the King, impatient to embark for the Continent, engaged that nothing should be done by him in prejudice thereof, till the Parliament should have an opportunity of settling the business. The next session, however, and several others, passing over without any bill, the King made grants of the whole of the forfeited estates. But the Commons, determined that the matter should not so rest, annexed a clause to the land-tax bill, appointing seven commissioners to take an account of the estates forfeited in Ireland, in order to their being applied in aid of the public service. When the bill was transmitted to the Lords, they found themselves precluded from entering into the merits of this provision, being compelled to pass the clause without alteration as constituting part of a money bill. A protest was, however, entered upon the journals, expressive of their lordships' disapprobation of this procedure. The bill having at length passed the Lords, received from the King a reluctant assent; and on the 4th of May, the Parliament was prorogued.

The Duke of Leeds, who had sunk into insignificance and contempt since the discovery of his India peculations, was now dismissed from his post of president of the council, which was given to the Earl of Pembroke; and the Privy-Seal, relinquished by this nobleman, was consigned to Lord Lonsdale. The Duke of Shrewsbury, who disliked the fatigues, and was indifferent to the emoluments of office, resigned without reluctance the seals of Secretary of State to the Earl of Jersey: but toward the close of the year he accepted the place of Lord Chamberlain.*

Such was the reluctance of the Scotch to be awakened from their airy dreams, that they had in the course of the preceding year sent to sea two large ships out of four which they had caused to be built at Hamburgh, and several smaller vessels freighted with divers commodities, the growth or manufacture of Scotland; and about 1200 adventurers on board, furnished with all things necessary for the establishment of a colony. The spot fixed upon for this settlement was the Isthmus of Darien, a territory situated in the heart of the Spanish empire in America; and which the Scotch projectors might have been sensible the court of Madrid would resent and repel. In October, 1698, they arrived at Golden Island on the coast of Darien; but the difficulties and dangers, which they had to encounter, soon disposed them to think more of a deliverance than of an establishment. By the orders of the King, Sir William Beeston, governor of Jamaica, issued a proclamation early in April 1699, importing that his Majesty was not informed of the designs of the Scots in relation to Darien; which being contrary to the treaties subsisting between his Majesty and his allies, he strictly charged and commanded all his Majesty's subjects, that upon no pretence whatever they should hold any correspondence with the Scots, or give them any assistance, under pain of suffering the effects of his Majesty's severest displeasure. This measure proved very seasonable and necessary; for, in May following, the Marquis de Canales, minister residentiary of Spain, presented to the court of London a memorial, remonstrating in the most resentful terms against the Darien settlement. To this memorial the orders already sent to the governor of Jamaica furnished a satisfactory answer. The English Parliament, perceiving the approaching ruin of the Scottish colony, had not deigned, during the last session, to notice it. Misfortune had from the first attended this project. One of the ships sent out with stores and reinforcements, took fire by accident; a second was wrecked near Carthagena, the cargo confiscated, and the crew sent to prison; and the adventurers which reached the destined shore, finding their expectations blasted, were utterly disqualified from adopting any rational means of subsistence or defence. Seeing their inability to resist the force which the Spaniards were preparing to bring against them, they signed a capitulation, entirely to evacuate the Spanish coast.

Though the court of France had appeared to concur in the treaty of partition, she employed all the arts of her insidious policy to induce the court of Madrid to pronounce an ultimate decision in her favour. The Queen of Spain, on the other hand, was strongly in the interest of the House of Austria, and exerted her influence with no inconsiderable effect to counteract the machinations of France, who had ordered an army of 60,000 men to assemble on the frontier of Catalonia. Such was the state of things, when the Spanish court was apprised of the treaty of partition about to be concluded at Loo. The King of Spain was instantly incited by the impulse of passion to adopt a resolution which wisdom had so long unavailingly dictated, viz. to make a testamentary disposition of his dominions, which he left, June 1698, without reserve, to the electoral Prince of Bavaria, now solemnly constituted sole heir of this vast inheritance. This resolution was taken in full council, with the secret approbation of the Queen, who was flattered with the hopes of the regency. A memorial was subsequently presented at the court of Madrid, by M. d'Harcourt, which, under colour of complaining of the injury done to France, contains a virtual acquiescence in this disposition. The answer of the Spanish court was vague and complimentary. It is probable that the two great rival powers of Bourbon and Austria would have ultimately acquiesced in a testamentary disposition so conformable to the interests of Spain and the inclinations of all Europe, had not the unfortunate death of the electoral prince in a few months (February the 16th, 1699,) entirely altered the face of things, and thrown the whole political world into confusion. Notwithstanding the pretended recovery of the King of Spain, it was well known that he could not long survive: and the attention of the King of England was again engaged in new schemes for the preservation of the peace of Europe. Soon after the arrival of the King at Loo, M. de Tallard was again deputed to negotiate with his Majesty a second partition treaty, to which the court of Vienna was invited to concur. Various obstacles, however, retarded the conclusion of this treaty, of which the objections severally suggested by the Emperor and the States General appear to have been the chief. M. de Tallard following the King into England, the treaty was at length signed, March the 3d, 1700, by the Ambassador Tallard on the part of the King his master, and on that of the King of Great Britain by the Earls of Jersey and Portland, and on the 25th of the same month by the plenipotentiaries of the States General at the Hague.† The court of Madrid,

* This nobleman was so distinguished by the generosity of his disposition and the fascination of his manners, that he was generally known by the appellation of "King of Hearts." He was said by the King to be the only man of whom both Whigs and Tories agreed to speak well. Though personally disinterested, his applications for his friends were so numerous, that the King one day, either in the spirit of peevishness or pleasantry, told him, "to set down all his demands at once, that he might see whether the whole kingdom would satisfy them."

† By this treaty, Spain and the Indies, with the Low-Countries and Sardinia, were, on the death of the King of Spain without issue, to devolve on the Archduke Charles. The Sicilies, Finale, and the other possessions of Spain in Italy, Milan excepted, with the province of Guipuscoa, &c. as settled in the former treaty, were to be ceded drid, on the first intimation of the negotiations recommenced at Loo, discovered the most passionate resentment. A memorial, couched in energetic language, and in a style bordering upon insolence, was soon after presented by the Marquis de Canales to the Lords Justices of England, in the absence of the King,—stating, "that if these proceedings, these machinations and projects, are not quickly put a stop to, we shall without doubt see a dire and universal war over all Europe, difficult to stop when we are willing, and most sensible and prejudicial to the English nation, which has newly tried and felt what novelties and the last war have cost them;" and declaring, "that the ambassador extraordinary of Spain will manifest to the Parliament, when it shall be assembled, the just resentment which he now expresses" This paper having been transmitted to King William at Loo, the ambassador was informed, that his Majesty found the contents so insolent and seditious, that, in resentment of so extraordinary a procedure, he ordered the ambassador to quit his dominions in eighteen days, and that no writing be any more received from him or any of his domestics. In return, Mr. Stanhope was ordered to quit the Spanish territories. The negotiations at Loo seemed to excite almost as great a ferment at Vienna as at Madrid; but, circumstanced as the Emperor now was, he appeared inclined to accede to the principal terms of the treaty. Various concessions were made by the court of Versailles, to render it more palatable and calculated to ensure the succession of Spain to the archduke; in particular, that this prince should be at liberty to reside in that kingdom during the life of the King. It was also agreed that the succession of the Sicilies should be limited to the descendants of the Queen Maria Theresa. When the imperial court, however, proceeded to propose that the Indies should be ceded to France in lieu of the Sicilies, and the island of Sardinia and the duchy of Luxemburgh as an equivalent for Lorraine and Bar, the proposition was rejected as extravagant and inadmissible. In the mean time the Emperor carried on his negotiations in Spain with such success, that his Catholic Majesty, in June, 1700, was prevailed upon to sign a will, declaring the archduke sole heir of the Spanish dominions. This was immediately transmitted to Vienna; and M. de Villars was then informed, "that his imperial Majesty, considering the good state of the King of Spain's health, declined acceding to the treaty of partition; but that in failure of male heirs the Emperor considered the succession as justly belonging to him."

King William had arrived at his palace of Kensington from the Continent in the month of October, 1699; and, on the 16th of November, the session opened with a speech, in which every expression that could give just cause of offence seems to have been cautiously avoided. Such, however, was the perverse conduct of the House as to manifest a pre-determination not to be satisfied.

Complaints having been made, during the late war, of piratical depredations on the American coast, a scheme was suggested by the Earl of Bellamont, Governor of New York, to fit out a ship of war by private subscription. The King countenanced the scheme; and the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Shrewsbury, the Lords Romney, Orford, &c. also contributed their assistance. Kydd, a native of New York, who had the reputation of being bold and honest, was appointed captain of the ship, which mounted thirty guns. This vessel was furnished, besides the usual commission to privateers, with a power under the Great Seal, authorising the commander to make war upon and destroy the pirates infesting the American and other seas. The choice however of the captain proved very unfortunate; for, instead of making war upon the pirates, he turned pirate himself; and, commanding a ship of great force, he became for a time the terror of the seas. At length being apprehended by the vigilance of Lord Bellamont, he was sent to England for trial. This affair being eagerly and abruptly brought into the House of Commons, a motion was made, December 6, "that the letters patent granted to the Earl of Bellamont, and others, of pirates' goods, were dishonourable to the King, against the law of nations, contrary to the laws and statutes of this realm, invasive of property, and destructive of trade and commerce." In the consequent debate, the most malignant imputations were cast upon the noblemen engaged in this undertaking; and the Lord Chancellor, Somers, was the peculiar object of invective and reproach, as a magistrate placed at the head of the highest department of justice, which he had "disgraced by his participation in an enterprise so scandalous; and which was said to be framed on a mere pretence of public service, but in truth for the sake of spoil—those who were too tender-conscienced to commence pirates in the first instance, finding no repugnance to sharing among themselves that which had been unjustly taken from others." The motion was, on a division, negatived by a great majority; but, the Commons presented an address to the King, praying "that Kydd might not be pardoned, tried, or discharged, till the next session of Parliament;" to which the King promised compliance. Kydd, being many months after brought to the bar of the House, declared, "that he had never in his life spoken to Lord Somers; and that he had no order from those concerned in the ship, but to prosecute his voyage against the pirates in the high seas." The House left him to his fate; and he was in a short time afterwards hanged, with several of his accomplices.

Still enraged against the Chancellor, his opponents now brought forward another charge against him, for having made a partial and undue distribution of commissions of the peace, and for individiously striking out the names of many persons of great property and responsibility. On enquiry it appeared, that at the period of the assassination plot, it was deemed expedient to exclude those from the commission who refused to sign the national association. But this was so far from being the personal act of the Chancellor, that the gentlemen in question were turned out in consequence of the express order of council, grounded on the representations of the Lords Lieutenants of the several counties. The House contented itself, therefore, with presenting an address to the King, importing, "that it would much conduce to the service of his Majesty and the good of this kingdom, that gentlemen of quality and good estates be restored and put into the commissions of the peace and Lieutenancy, and that men of small estates be neither continued nor put into the said commissions."

Similar ill-humour displayed itself in the motion made for an address to the King to displace Bishop Burnet, from his office of Preceptor to the Duke of Gloucester; but it was overruled by a considerable majority.

In the last session, an address had been presented to the throne to put the laws in force against popish recusants, &c. and a severe bill was now brought in, by which a sentence of banishment was inflicted upon all popish priests and schoolmasters, on pain of perpetual imprisonment, in case of their return; and a reward of 1000l. offered for their apprehension. It also enacted, that no papist born after the 25th of March, 1700, be capable of inheriting either title or estate; or of purchasing lands, &c. either in his own name or in trust for another, within the realm. The bill also required, that all papists possessing estates in land should take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and the test, when they attained to the age of eighteen; and till the oaths were taken in conformity to the act, the estate was from that period to devolve to the next of kin that was a Protestant. This bill, which a more enlightened legislature afterwards repealed, passed with general approbation.

ceded in full right to the Dauphin—as also the duchies of Lorraine and Bar, of more intrinsic value to France than all the rest of her acquisitions. To the Duke of Lorraine, in lieu of his duchy, was assigned the dukedom of Milan. To this treaty the Emperor was allowed three months to accede; and in case of refusal, the allotment of the archduke was to be disposed of to a prince who should be named by the two Kings of France and Great Britain, in conjunction with the States General: and in a separate article the Emperor was, by a farther indulgence, admitted to subscribe within two months after the death of the King of Spain.

The House of Commons would not venture on a measure so dangerous as the revocation of the charter granted by the last Parliament to the new East-India Company; but their competitors of the old establishment were encouraged to represent their case to the legislature, and to petition for an act to prolong their existence to the end of the term of twenty-one years specified in their present charter. The new company issued a counter-representation; but their invectives were fatal to their arguments; and their opposition only contributed to facilitate the passing of the bill, which ultimately received the royal assent. The court were anxious to obtain a vote of approbation for the measures taken to gratify the commercial jealousy of the English nation in opposition to the Scottish settlement of Darien; but in this they could not succeed; for the Commons, says Burnet, "resolved to do nothing that should take any part of the blame and general discontent, that soured the Scottish nation, off from the King. It was given out, to raise the national distrust yet higher, that the opposition the King gave the Scotch colony flowed neither from a regard to the interests of England nor to the treaties with Spain, but from a care of the Dutch, who, from Curaçoa, drove a coasting trade among the Spanish plantations with great advantage." William, however, expressed great concern and tenderness for his kingdom of Scotland; and embraced anew the opportunity of inculcating the propriety and necessity of an union of the two kingdoms. The Lords, in consequence, sent down a bill to the Commons, appointing certain commissioners of the realm of England to treat with commissioners of Scotland for the weal of both kingdoms; but the Commons could not be prevailed upon to assent.

The Parliamentary commissioners appointed to inquire into the Irish forfeitures, with a view to a general resumption, were seven in number. Of these four were disposed to inflame the report, and three were inclined to soften and conciliate. In consequence of this difference of sentiment, the report of the commissioners was signed only by the former.* The Commons in a violent ferment immediately resolved, "that a bill be brought in to apply all the forfeited estates and interests in Ireland, and all grants thereof, and of the rents and revenues belonging to the crown within that kingdom, since the 13th of February, 1689, to the use of the public." After a long and tedious investigation, the courtiers ventured to move, that a certain proportion of the forfeitures be reserved to the disposal of his Majesty. To this, the Commons not only refused to assent, but adopted the two following additional resolutions:

"1st, That the advising, procuring, and passing the grants of the forfeited and other estates in Ireland, had been the occasion of contracting great debts upon the nation, and levying heavy taxes on the people.

"2ndly, That the advising and passing the said grants was highly reflecting on the King's honour: and the officers and instruments concerned in the procuring and passing the said grants had highly failed in the performance of their trust and duty."

One point only the courtiers were able to carry; and that was the obtaining of an order for bringing in a bill to resume the grants of all lands and revenues of the crown, and all pensions granted by the crown since the 6th of February, 1685, (the day of King James's accession) and for applying the same to the use of the public. An address founded upon the resolutions mentioned above was presented to the King, January the 21st, to which his Majesty gave the following answer: "Gentlemen, I was not only led by inclination, but thought myself obliged in justice, to reward those who had served well, and particularly in the reduction of Ireland, out of the estates forfeited to me by the rebellion there. The long war in which we were engaged did occasion great taxes, and has left the nation much in debt; and the taking just and effectual ways for lessening that debt, and supporting public credit, is what in my opinion will best contribute to the honour, interest, and safety of this kingdom." After a vehement debate, the Commons resolved—"that whoever advised his Majesty's answer to the address of the House has used his utmost endeavour to create a misunderstanding and jealousy between the King and his people."—This bill of resumption, stiled a bill of supply, and appropriated to the discharge of certain specific debts, &c. was consolidated with the land-tax bill, and thus carried up to the Lords, who, taking great umbrage at the measure, made several alterations in the bill, not affecting the money clauses. These, however, were unanimously rejected by the Commons, who assigned, in a paper delivered to their lordships, their reasons for rejection. The Peers produced counter-reasons in support of their amendments; and violent altercations ensued; but the bill was finally passed, by 59 against 34, accompanied by an indignant protest from the Lords.

Conceiving the opposition of the Lords to derive its chief weight from the Chancellor, an address was moved to his Majesty for the removal of John Lord Somers from his presence and councils for ever. This was negatived by a great majority; but a resolution still more offensive passed at the same time, to address the King, that no person, not a native of his dominions, the Prince of Denmark excepted, should be admitted to his Majesty's councils in England or Ireland. Before this address, however, could be presented, the King came to the House of Peers, April the 11th; and, having passed the bills in readiness, commanded the Earl of Bridgewater, in the absence of the Chancellor, to prorogue the Parliament, which was accordingly done without a speech.†

His Majesty resolving to effect an accommodation with the Tories, now informed Lord Somers, that it seemed necessary he should part with the Great Seal; and he wished he would make it his own act. This the Lord Chancellor declined, observing that, in his circumstances, a resignation must be supposed to indicate fear or guilt. An order was therefore formally sent to him by Lord Jersey, and the Great Seal was delivered up, April 17. The Chief Justice Holt and the Attorney-General Trevor both declining the acceptance of it, Sir Nathan Wright, a man in no respect equal to the illustrious personage whom he succeeded, was appointed Lord Keeper. The resignation of the Duke of Shrewsbury immediately followed; the Earl of Jersey taking the key of Chamberlain, and Mr. Vernon officiating pro tempore as Secretary of State for both departments.

On the 21st of May, the Scotch Parliament was opened by the Duke of Queensbury, Lord High Commissioner, with a most gracious letter from the King, declaring his royal intention to have held the session in person, had the state of affairs abroad permitted; ex-

* This report stated, that the number of persons outlawed on account of the late rebellion in Ireland amounted to 3921—that the lands belonging to the forfeited estates contained 1,650,792 acres—that some of these lands had been restored to the old proprietors by virtue of the articles of Limerick and Galway—by reversal of outlawries and royal pardons, obtained chiefly by those who had abused his Majesty's compassion. Besides these restitutions, there were seventy-six grants and custodia under the great seal of Ireland, of which they made a recital. Amongst the number was a grant to Lord Romney of 49,517 acres; Lord Albemarle 108,633; William Bentinck, Esq. Lord Woodstock 135,820; the Earl of Athlone 26,480; the Earl of Galway 36,148, &c. &c. The commissioners acknowledge—that the estates in question did not yield so much to the guarantees as they were estimated at; for, as they had imposed upon his Majesty, so their agents had imposed upon them, and sold or let the lands at a rate much below their real value. After all deductions, and allowances, there yet remained 1,699,343*l.* 14*s.* which they laid before the Commons as the gross amount of the estates forfeited since the 13th day of February, 1689, and not restored. The committee concluded their report by the statement of a grant, made under the great seal of Ireland, May 30, 1695, to Mrs. Elizabeth Villiers, now countess of Orkney, of all the private estates of the late King James, containing 95,649 acres, estimated, at the expiration of the present leases in 1701, at 25,995*l.* 18*s.* per annum.

† The King, in his private dispatches to Lord Galway, written shortly after the rising of Parliament, says: "You may judge what vexation all their extraordinary proceedings gave me: and I assure you, your being deprived of what I gave you with so much pleasure, is not the least of my griefs.——There have been so many intrigues in this last session, that, without having been on the spot and well informed of every thing, it cannot be conceived.——I never had more occasion than at present for persons of your capacity and fidelity. I hope I shall find opportunities to give you marks of my esteem and friendship."

pressing his great concern at the misfortunes and losses the nation had sustained in their trade; and promising to concur in any measure calculated to promote and encourage it. These soothing declarations produced little effect; as, in a short time, a strong and inflammatory remonstrance was presented from the Darien company, reciting all the losses, disappointments, and hardships they had sustained. This was followed by similar petitions and addresses from all parts of the kingdom; and, a resolution having been moved, "that the colony of Caledonia in Darien was a legal and rightful settlement, in the terms of the act of Parliament of 1695; and that the Parliament would maintain and support the same;" the commissioner, to avoid the consequence of such a vote, adjourned the Parliament for three days.

All his endeavours to extinguish, or even to moderate, the flame which raged so fiercely, were however, ineffectual. The Parliament met again with the same disposition; and his Grace was compelled, by an invidious exercise of the prerogative, to adjourn them for twenty days more. The majority of the members met that evening, and framed an address to the King, demanding that Parliament should meet on the day to which it was then adjourned, and to sit as long as might be necessary for redressing the grievances of the nation. This was presented to the King by Lord Ross, June 11th, at the head of a deputation appointed for that purpose, which received for answer, "that they should know his intentions in Scotland." In the interval, the Parliament had been again adjourned by proclamation, on which great tumults had ensued in Edinburgh; and the mal-content members talked of sitting by force. Alarmed at this aspect of affairs, the King at last wrote (July 26) to the Lord Commissioner a conciliatory letter, which produced a sensible effect upon the minds of all who were capable of reflection; and though a second violent national address was signed and presented, the Parliament had met before that period, and the King wisely referred it to their consideration. The storm now began visibly to abate; the indignant humour of the Parliament and even of the nation gradually subsided; and when the great question of supplies came under discussion (January 21, 1701,) a loyal and cheerful vote passed, "that, in consideration of their great deliverance by his Majesty, and that, next under God, their safety and happiness depended wholly on the preservation of his Majesty's person and the security of his government, they would stand by and support both his Majesty and his government to the utmost of their power; and maintain such forces as should be requisite for those ends." This turbulent session had a peaceful close; and the Lord Commissioner was honoured with the Order of the Garter, and the Earl of Argyle with a dukedom.

Christiern V. King of Denmark, having departed this life about the close of the preceding summer, 1699, had been succeeded by his son Frederic IV. who was impatient to carry into execution, great and extensive views of aggrandisement. A grand confederacy was immediately formed (of which the Czar of Muscovy, the Kings of Poland and Denmark, and the Elector of Brandenburgh, were the parties) having for its object a joint and general attack upon the kingdom of Sweden, then under the government of Charles XII. a youth of eighteen years of age. According to the plan concerted by the confederate powers, Sweden was to be assailed, at one and the same time, in Holstein by the King of Denmark, in Western Pomerania by the Elector of Brandenburgh, in Livonia by the King of Poland, and in Ingria and the provinces lying eastward of the gulph of Finland by the Czar of Muscovy. Holstein was not indeed a province of Sweden, but the Duke of Holstein had married the elder sister of the King of Sweden, and was united in the closest bonds of alliance and friendship with that monarch. Charles had not been inattentive to the dangers which threatened him. In the month of January this year, 1700, he had concluded a treaty with the maritime powers, in which the contracting parties engaged for the reciprocal guarantee of each other's dominions: and King William resolved to maintain the dignity of his character, as the guardian and mediator of Europe. The King of Denmark, aware of the situation of affairs in Britain, publicly observed, "that while the King of England was at variance with his Parliament, he would be able to do but little in Europe." William, in return, observed to the Marquis de Foret, a Saxon nobleman attached to the Danish court—"that he would make Denmark know he was still able to do something in Europe." A formidable fleet was immediately equipped both in the English and Dutch ports; and, in July, 1700, Sir George Rooke, who was appointed to the command, arrived in the Sound, and was soon after joined by the Swedes, the combined squadrons then consisting of no less than fifty-two ships of the line. The Danish fleet, unable to resist so great a force, retired within the harbour of Copenhagen, and that metropolis was subjected to the insult of a slight bombardment. The Prince of Lunenburgh, at the same time passed the Elbe with a large body of troops, and, joining the Swedish and ducal army, obliged the Danes to raise the siege of Toningen. The King of Denmark now declared his willingness to accept the mediation of the maritime powers in conjunction with France, and requested the English Admiral to desist from all farther hostile operations. Sir George Rooke replied, that he had no power to agree to any temporary cessation. In the beginning of August the King of Sweden landed in person on the isle of Zealand, and preparations began to be seriously made for the siege of Copenhagen. The English Admiral not displaying all the alacrity which the impatience of the King of Sweden thought the occasion called for, some warm expostulations fell from him: to which Sir George Rooke coolly replied, "I was sent here to serve your Majesty, not to ruin the King of Denmark." His Danish Majesty was now sufficiently humbled to accept the mediation of the maritime powers without the concurrence of France; and a treaty of peace was signed under their guarantee, at a house of the Duke of Holstein, called Travendahl, in the neighbourhood of both camps, August 18th, 1700, on the principle of mutual restitution—the King of Denmark paying to the Duke of Holstein 269,000 rix-dollars for the charge of the war. The hostile fleets did not leave the Baltic till the Swedish armies had reached their native shores. They then returned in triumph from this expedition which justly entitled the King of England to the appellations of pacificator and arbiter of the north.

The Duke of Gloucester, only son of the Prince and Princess of Denmark, a youth of much promise, had completed his eleventh year on the 24th of July, on which occasion a gala had been given at Windsor. In consequence it was thought of being over-heated with dancing, he was seized the next day with a malignant fever; and, on the 30th of the same month, he expired, to the inexpressible grief of his parents, being the only surviving child of a large family. In consequence of this melancholy event, the eyes of the nation were turned to Sophia, electress dowager of Hanover, youngest daughter to the Queen of Bohemia, and grand-daughter of King James I. This Princess immediately repaired to the Hague, to confer with the King on the measures necessary for the present security, and eventual establishment of the Protestant succession.

The second treaty of partition was by this time generally known, and almost as generally condemned; and the almost extinguished hopes of the Jacobites revived at the political discontents of the nation, taken in connection with the death of the Duke of Gloucester. Mr. Graham, brother to Lord Preston, was dispatched to St. Germains with a proposal to settle the crown by act of Parliament on the pretended Prince of Wales; and with an assurance that William would not be supported in the execution of the partition treaty. The court of St. Germains, however, refused to listen to any proposition respecting a change of religion in the Prince;—the King and Queen having declared that they would rather see him dead.

The conduct of the French court, since the conclusion of the second treaty of partition, had been extremely artful and insidious; whilst that of the imperial court had been equally weak and irresolute. The Emperor persisted in refusing to accede to the treaty of Loo, though no vigorous or effectual steps were taken to ensure the succession to the Archduke, against the combination of France and the maritime powers. The Marquis of Harcourt, at Madrid, had entirely gained over to the interest of France the major part of the Spanish nobles; and the Queen of Spain, who had hitherto been most zealous in the cause of the house of Austria, began to perceive that she was striving in vain against the current. The King of Spain was rapidly drawing to the close of his miserable life; and Cardinal Porto Carrero, for the repose of the King's conscience, advised him to consult the Pope on this momentous point of regulating the succession. Innocent XII. firmly attached to France, determined against the validity of Queen Maria Theresa's renunciation, as being "Founded on compulsion, and contrary to the fundamental laws of the Spanish monarchy; and exhorted his Catholic Majesty to make his will in favour of one of the French King's grandsons, by which he would effectually contribute to the propagation of the faith and the repose of Christendom." A new testamentary arrangement consequently took place, dated October 2d, 1700; by which the monarchy of Spain, with all its dependencies in the four quarters of the globe, were left to the Duke of Anjou, second son of the Dauphin; and in default of issue to his brother the Duke of Berri, and next to the Archduke Charles. The King lingered a few weeks after signing this new will; and breathed his last on the 1st of November, 1700. An express being dispatched to the court of France with the intelligence of this important event, a council was immediately held, at which the King affected irresolution as to the acceptance of the will, but at length yielded; and sending for the Duke of Anjou, said to him in the presence of the Marquis des Rios, "Sir, the King of Spain has made you King. The grandees demand you, the people wish for you, and I give my consent. Render yourself worthy of the throne you are going to mount." The new sovereign set out early in December (1700) accompanied by his two brothers, to take possession of the kingdom. This affair was the source of infinite chagrin to King William.

On his return to England in the month of October, his Majesty made arrangements to establish the ascendency of the Tories in the administration. Lord Godolphin was restored to his former post in the Treasury; Lord Tankerville made privy seal in the room of Lord Lonsdale deceased; the Earl of Rochester appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; Sir Charles Hedges constituted Secretary of State; and Mr. Montague created a Peer by the title of Baron Halifax. A dissolution immediately took place; and a new Parliament was summoned for the 6th February, 1701.

The King of France's highest ambition was gratified in settling his grandson on the throne of Spain with the unanimous approbation of the Spanish nation; and, as he well knew that the point of honour with them consisted in preserving the unity of the monarchy, he resolved not to listen to any proposal of dismemberment. The silence of King William was calculated to excite the most serious apprehensions of the court of France, which seemed to regard the menaces of the Emperor with contempt. Holland however required all the arts and refinements of management. At this period died Pope Innocent XII. and Cardinal Albani was, at fifty-three years of age, unexpectedly raised to the pontificate, by the name of Clement XI. Though not accounted one of the French faction, the court of Versailles entirely gained him over to their interests. The Emperor, astonished at the fatal turn things had taken, issued his imperial mandate to the inhabitants of the Milanese, reclaiming that Duchy as a fief of the empire, and commanding all persons to yield obedience to the same as feodatories, on pain of being treated as rebels. At the end of December, Count Wrattislau arrived in London as ambassador extraordinary from the Emperor. He did not at first meet with a very flattering reception; but the negotiation carried on at Paris and Madrid demonstrating that no material concession was to be expected from France; and, the Dutch garrisons being by a vigorous and unexpected stroke suddenly superseded throughout the whole line of barrier fortresses, and French troops introduced;* the English court began in earnest to listen to the propositions from Vienna.

The new Parliament met at Westminster on the 10th of February, 1701. The choice of a Speaker fell on Mr. Harley. In his opening speech, the King took notice of the necessity of a farther provision for the succession to the crown in the Protestant line. "The death of the late King of Spain," said he, "with the declaration of his successor to that monarchy, has made so great an alteration in the affairs abroad, that I must desire you very maturely to consider their present state. And I make no doubt but your resolutions thereupon will be such as shall be most conducive to the interest and safety of England, the preservation of the Protestant religion in general, and the peace of all Europe." A resolution passed the Commons, "That the House would stand by and support his Majesty and his government, and take such effectual measures as might best conduce to the interest and safety of England, the preservation of the Protestant religion, and the peace of Europe."

The States General having been repeatedly pressed upon the subject by France, recognised in form the new King of Spain; of which they apprised the court of London in a memorial, which the King ordered to be laid before the Parliament.† With the Dutch memorial was presented to the House an intercepted paper, purporting to be a letter from the Earl of Melfort, the discarded secretary at the court of St. Germains, to his brother the Earl of Perth, governor of the young Prince, full of wild and incoherent projects, endeavouring to shew how favourable an aspect the affairs of the King then wore, and urging the propriety of some, "Great and vigorous attempt against England." —The Commons do not appear to have thought it worthy of specific notice; but the Lords presented an address of thanks to his Majesty, for communicating to them the Earl of Melfort's letter; and desiring that Popish recusants should be removed from London, &c. The French court were highly offended at the use made of this letter, which M. de Torcy said "was intended to incense the nation, and shewed a desire of breaking with France." Lord Melfort, however, was banished by a lettre de cachet to Angers.

Favoured by the late address of the Commons, followed by a vote for 30,000 seamen, the English and Dutch courts assumed a very lofty tone; and instruc-

* The King of France, in his dispatch of December the 24th, 1700, to Monsieur Briord, says, "Means must be used to dislodge the Hollanders, and to leave the Spaniards in the sole possession of their own towns." On the 6th of February, 1701, a number of French troops were introduced into all the barrier towns, from Luxemburg to Ostend and Nieuport, with so much secrecy that the Dutch officers in those places had not the least previous suspicion of the design; and the next day an apologetic memorial, most ably drawn, was presented to the States General, stating the reasons for this measure, and declaring it was no longer possible to leave the troops of their high mightinesses in the fortresses of a King whom they did not own.

† In this paper their high mightinesses declare, "that, notwithstanding the recognition made by them, they had reserved to themselves the liberty of stipulating in the negotiation about to commence, for such conditions as were necessary to secure the peace of Europe—that in this negotiation they had firmly resolved to do nothing without the consent of his Majesty and the other powers interested in the maintenance of the peace; as they had declared to the ambassador of France. And finally, being apprehensive of a sudden attack, they made a requisition of the succours due to them by the existing treaties." The Commons on this communication voted, without hesitation, an address to the King, "that he would be pleased to enter into such negotiations, in concert with the States General and other potentates, as might most effectually conduce to the general safety; and giving him assurances of support and assistance in the performance of his engagements." It having been suggested in the discussion, that it might be no less proper for England than Holland to own the title of the King of Spain; Mr. Monkton, a zealous Whig, with great heat replied, "that if such a vote was carried, he should expect that the next vote would be for owning the pretended Prince of Wales."

tions were transmitted to Mr. Stanhope, resident in Holland, to enter into an immediate negotiation with the ministers of France and Spain, upon conditions importing, not only that the French troops shall evacuate the Spanish fortresses, but that Nieuport and Ostend shall be put immediately into the hands of the English as cautionary towns; and that Luxemburg, Namur, and Mons, to which the States General thought proper to add Venlo, Ruremonde, Stevenswaert, Charleroi, Dendermonde, Damme, and St. Donat, with their appurtenances, be consigned to their high mightinesses during such time as shall be agreed upon—with various other demands, which, when communicated to M. d'Avaux, appeared so extravagant, that he declared they could not have been higher if his master had lost four successive battles.

Louis, perceiving no prospect of peace on moderate terms while harmony subsisted between the King and Parliament of England, is charged with using corrupt and clandestine means to involve the English in domestic broils, in order to embarrass the measures of the court. The prodigious influx of louis-d'ors and pistoles at this period is a fact admitted by all; and the mercantile solution, founded on the pretended favourable course of exchange, is scarcely sufficient to obviate the jealous apprehensions of the politician. It is certain, too, that at this period the temper and disposition of the House of Commons sustained a sudden and unexpected change; though it must be admitted, that there existed internal and political causes apparently not inadequate to the effects produced.

On the 10th of March, a motion was made in the House of Lords, to take into consideration certain papers previously laid before their Lordships, relative to the negotiations carried on under the late Whig administration; and a committee was nominated to make a report of the contents. This committee, of which the Earl of Nottingham was chairman, and the most active members of which consisted of determined Tories or discontented Whigs, brought forward a number of resolutions, as the basis of an address to the King, strongly condemning the partition treaty. The Earl of Rochester and the other ministers present concurring in this address, the Whig Lords in connection with the court acquiesced, seeing that the address was so worded as to avoid all personal attack upon the late ministers, but rather containing an exculpation of them, as not having been admitted to a participation of the counsels which produced it.* Very few of the Peers attended the Lord Keeper on the presentation of this address to the King, who replied, "That it contained matter of great moment, and that he would always take care that the treaties made by him should be for the honour and safety of England."

In the Commons, on the 21st of March, an address was voted, "To thank the King for his communications respecting the state of the negotiation;" and the Whigs proposing to add, "and for his Majesty's care of these nations and the peace of Europe," one of the most violent debates ever known took place, in which the political system of the court was attacked with the utmost severity, and the partition treaty reprobated in terms of extreme virulence. It was stiled by Mr. Howe "A felonious treaty,"†—and it was said to be not more iniquitous than impolitic. The question, on a division, was negatived by 193 to 187 voices. The leaders of the opposition next moved, instead of the clause rejected, to lay before his Majesty "the ill consequences of the treaty of partition to this kingdom and the peace of Europe." This being agreed to without a division, a committee was appointed to draw up an address conformably thereto; in which, after returning thanks to the King for acquainting the House with the state and progress of the negotiations now pending, they go on to say, "which method had your Majesty been advised to take before the treaty of partition was perfected, which was passed under the great seal of England during the sitting of Parliament, and without advice of the same, we had been prevented from laying before your Majesty what we are now bound in duty, though with grief, to do—to which treaty may justly be ascribed the dangers which now threaten both this kingdom and the peace of Europe." William felt a resentment on this occasion which his discretion prevented him from expressing, and he contented himself with a vague answer, as to the "Manifold benefits which would arise from the concurrence of Parliament in all his negotiations for the happiness of his people and the peace of Europe." On the last day of March, the King informed the House, by message, "That the negotiation already seemed to be at an end; by the refusal of the French ambassador to give any other answer to the demands made in his name and that of the States General, than an offer to renew and confirm the treaty of Ryswic; and that the States had made a formal requisition of the succours due to them by treaty, viz. 10,000 troops and twenty ships of the line. And his Majesty desires the Commons will give him such advice thereupon as may be for our own security, and that of the States General and the peace of Europe." In return, the Commons advised to carry on the negotiations in concert with the States, and assured his Majesty, "that they would enable him to fulfil the conditions of the existing treaty."

The King of Spain now thought fit, by a letter in his own hand, to notify his accession to the King of England.—It was answered by a letter from the King of England expressed in gracious and complimentary terms.

The consideration of the partition treaty was now resumed with great violence by the House of Commons; and, as the ultimate result, it was resolved by the House, "That the Earls of Portland and Orford, and the Lords Somers and Halifax, be impeached at the bar of the House of Lords of high crimes and misdemeanors."‡

A motion was next made, and carried, to which all the previous proceedings had reference, "To present an address to his Majesty to remove the Lords Somers, Orford, Portland, and Halifax, from his presence and councils for ever."

The House of Peers, now roused to exertion, voted an address to the King, praying, "That the Lords impeached at the bar of their House may not have any

* Their Lordships declared that, having considered the treaty of the 15th of March, 1700, they did most humbly represent to his Majesty, that to their great sorrow they found the matters thereof to have been of very ill consequence to the peace and safety of Europe—that, by all the informations of that fatal treaty, they could not find that the draft of it had ever been laid before his Majesty at any meeting of his council—wherefore, in duty to his Majesty, and in justice to their country, they most humbly beseech him, that in future he would be pleased to require and admit, in all matters of importance, the advice of his natural-born subjects, whose known probity and fortunes might give him and his people a just assurance of their fidelity to his service.

† This expression gave more offence to King William than any ever used in the unbounded licence of Parliamentary debate. He passionately declared that, had his rank permitted, he would have demanded satisfaction of its author.

‡ During the debates, and previously to passing the vote of impeachment, Lord Somers desired to be heard in his own defence—and a chair being placed for him, he first sat down covered, according to the ceremonial used on such occasions; and afterwards rising and remaining uncovered, he entered into so masterly and eloquent a vindication of his conduct, that, had the question been immediately put, it was believed he would have been acquitted by a great majority. He admitted "that the King had asked the advice of his confidential servants upon this occasion; and that his Majesty had even informed him, that if he and his other ministers thought that a treaty ought not to be made upon such a project, then the whole matter must be let fall, for he could not bring the French to better terms. His Lordship pleaded, that it would have been taking too much upon himself if he should have put a stop to a treaty of such consequence—Had the King of Spain died before it was finished, and the blame been cast upon him for not sending the necessary powers, he could not have justified himself, since the King's letter was a warrant. At the same time he wrote his own opinion very fully to his Majesty, objecting to many particulars, and proposing several things for the advantage and interest of England. Soon after the powers were transmitted by him, the treaty was concluded; to which he affixed the Great Seal, as he thought himself bound to do.—Thus as a Privy-Counsellor he offered to the King his best advice, and as Chancellor he had discharged his acknowledged and official duty. The King's letter was not indeed a formal, though a real warrant—but he did not think it became him to endanger the public by laying any stress on a point of form, at so critical a time, and when the greatest dispatch was requisite."

censure passed upon them until they are tried upon the said impeachments, and judgment be given according to the usage of Parliament and the law of the land." This address the King received in profound silence, but the address of the Commons was received with apparent complacency; his Majesty assuring them, "He would employ none in his service but such as shall be thought most likely to improve mutual trust and confidence, which were so necessary in the present juncture."

The House of Commons, in a grand committee, next taking into consideration the state of the civil list, and the savings made by the non-payment of the 50,000*l.* per annum allotted as a dower to James's Queen; of 20,000*l.* per annum fallen in by the recent death of the Duke of Gloucester, with other reductions, came to a resolution to apply 100,000*l.* per annum of the royal revenue to the current service. On the report, this resolution was combated by the whole strength of the whig party; but it was carried by 214 against 169.

The King having recommended a farther provision for the succession of the crown in the Protestant line, the House unanimously resolved:

"1st. That it is absolutely necessary a farther declaration and limitation be made of the succession to the crown.

"2ndly. That farther provision be first made for the security of the rights and liberties of the people—and

"Lastly, That the Princess Sophia, Duchess Dowager of Hanover, be declared the next in succession to the crown of England."

A bill was immediately introduced in conformity to these resolutions; and numerous limitations and restrictions imposed upon the future inheritors of the crown.* The bill passed with national applause; but it had to encounter an opposition of a singular nature, originating in a remote quarter. Anne of Orleans, Duchess of Savoy, of the blood-royal of England by Henrietta her mother, youngest daughter of Charles I. according to the law of hereditary succession, was heiress of the crown of England, on the exclusion of James and his immediate descendants. The Ambassador of Savoy delivered a paper to the Speaker of the House of Commons, in which his mistress declared, that she gladly embraced the occasion which offered, to display to the people of England the pride she took in the right she derived from her descent, to that august throne; and, after stating her incontestible pretensions, she concluded with protesting against every deliberation and decision which shall be contrary thereto. This protest, however, was deemed too insignificant for notice; and the Earl of Macclesfield was deputed by the King to carry the intelligence, with the insignia of the Order of the Garter for the Elector, to the court of Herenhausen.

The Lords now reminded the Commons, that articles had not yet been exhibited against the Peers' impeachment. The Commons replied, that articles were preparing; and in a short time they were presented. The accused Peers in a few days made their answer; and, on the 21st of May, another message came from the Lords, pressing the Commons to give in their replication, and proceed to trial; and representing the hardships of delay to the persons accused. The Commons informed their Lordships that they had prepared a replication to Lord Oxford, but chose to defer the carrying it up, because, from the nature of the evidence, they chose to proceed with the trial of Lord Somers first—affirming their right, as prosecutors, to be the proper judges of the time of conducting their own prosecution. The same day the replication to Lord Somers was reported, and ordered to be engrossed. In the interim, the Lords apprised them by message, that they had appointed the 9th of June for the trial of Lord Oxford; asserting, that the right of limiting a time for avoiding delays in justice was lodged in them. Repeated conferences ensued, till the Commons complained, "that they had been obliged to spend that time in answering their Lordships' messages, which would have been otherwise employed in preparing for the trials, so that the delay must be charged to those who gave occasion for it." Lord Haversham having expressed his opinion "that the Commons were chargeable with gross partiality in the business of the impeachments, and that the plea of justice was only a mask to cover their real design," the managers on the part of the Commons insisted on breaking up the conference; and the House, on their report, voted, "that John Lord Haversham had uttered most scandalous reproaches and false expressions, highly reflecting on the honour and justice of the House of Commons:" when invited by the Lords to renew the conference, they returned for answer, "that this was not consistent with their honour, till they had received reparation for the indignity offered by Lord Haversham." Notice having been sent from the Lords, that the trial of Lord Somers, now, according to the desire of the Commons, first in the order of precedence, was fixed for the 17th of June, the Commons refused to attend; assigning as their reasons:

1st. The unprecedented refusal of their Lordships to consent to the appointment of a committee of both Houses for the settling the necessary preliminaries.

2dly. The want of a satisfactory assurance, that Lords impeached of the same crimes shall not sit in judgment upon each other.

3dly. Because they have received no reparation for the great indignity offered to them at the last conference by Lord Haversham. A resolution also passed the House, that no member do presume to appear at the place erected for the pretended trial of Lord Somers. No accusers, therefore, standing forward to support the charge, it was moved, and carried on a division of 56 against 31, that John Lord Somers be acquitted of the articles exhibited against him, and that the impeachment be dismissed. The Lords Portland, Orford, and Halifax, were in a similar manner acquitted and discharged; and, recollecting the impeachment exhibited against the Duke of Leeds in the year 1695, which had since lain dormant, they extended the indulgence of the House to him; and his Grace was by a verdict of acquittal exonerated from the burden, though not from the reproach, of the impeachment. The Commons retorted upon the Upper House, by passing resolutions importing, "that the Lords had refused justice upon the impeachment of John Lord Somers, and that, by the pretended trial of the said Lord Somers, they have endeavoured to subvert the right of impeachment."

During these proceedings, an extraordinary petition was presented from the justices of the peace, grand jurors, and freeholders, of the county of Kent, urging the House, in bold and insolent language, to come to speedy and decisive resolutions in support of the measures recommended from the throne. "We most humbly implore this honourable House," say the petitioners, in conclusion, "to have regard to the voice of the people, that our religion and safety may be effectually provided for—that your loyal addresses may be turned into bills of supply, and that his most sacred Majesty, whose propitious and unblemished reign over us we pray God long to continue, may be enabled powerfully to assist his allies before it is too late." The House voted this paper to be "scandalous, insolent, and seditious;" and the persons, five in number, who had been delegated to deliver it into the hands of Sir Thomas Hales, member for the county of Kent, were committed prisoners to the Gatehouse, where they lay to the end of the session, visited by numbers of persons, and loudly applauded by the Whigs, as meritoriously suffering for their public spirit and patriotism the most odious and barbarous oppression. On their liberation, and return into their own county, they were met by a cavalcade of 500 horse at Blackheath, and near their entrance into the town of Maidstone by vast crowds of persons strewing the way before them with garlands and flowers.*

* The chief were, "that no foreigner, although he be naturalized or made denizen, shall be capable of enjoying any office or trust civil or military; or of holding any grant or lands from the crown; that the nation be not obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories not belonging to the crown of England; that all things properly cognizable in the Privy Council by the laws and customs of this realm shall be transacted there, and all resolutions taken thereupon shall be signed by such of the Privy-Council as shall advise and consent to the same; that no person hereafter possessing the crown of England shall go out of the realm without consent of Parliament; that no person holding an office under the King, or receiving a pension from the crown, shall be capable of sitting in the House of Commons; that all future possessors of the crown shall join in communion with the church of England; that no pardon be pleadable in bar of an impeachment; and that the Judges' commissions be made quamdiu se bene gesserint."

About this time, a pathetic letter from the States General to the King was laid before Parliament, in which they describe the extreme danger and difficulty of their situation, and the absolute need in which they stood of immediate and effectual assistance.†

The Commons, in consequence, warmly assured his Majesty, "that they would effectually assist him to support his allies in maintaining the liberty of Europe." The disposition of the House, however, was still apparent, to engage in the war as auxiliaries only. The Lords presented an address of a different complexion, requesting his Majesty "not only to make good all the articles of any former treaty to the States General, but that he will enter into a strict league, offensive and defensive, with them, for our common preservation, and invite into it all other princes and states who are concerned in the present visible danger arising from the union of France and Spain." Towards the close of the session, the Commons were also more compliant.—On the 24th of June, Parliament was prorogued.

On the 3d of July, King William arrived in Holland; and, the next day he took his seat in the assembly of the States General, where he was received with the most cordial congratulations, as the protector, friend, and father of his country. The command of the troops, destined for the relief of Holland, was confided to the Earl of Marlborough, who was at the same time appointed plenipotentiary to the States. On the departure of the King to visit the frontier of the garrisons, M. d'Avaux delivered to the States General a letter from his Most Christian Majesty, notifying the recall of his Ambassador, who, accordingly, left the Hague, (August 13) without noticing the King of England or any of his court.

On the 7th of September, a new treaty of alliance was signed between the Emperor and maritime powers, to which all Kings, Princes, and States were invited to accede, for procuring satisfaction to the House of Austria in respect to the Spanish succession, and for recovering the Spanish Netherlands, to be a barrier between Holland and France, &c. and it was expressly stipulated, that the war once begun should not be concluded but with the consent and concurrence of the allied powers.

Previously to the conclusion of this treaty, hostilities had commenced on the part of the Emperor with a spirit and success wholly unexpected. A numerous army had been assembled early in the summer on the Italian frontier, the command of which was conferred upon Prince Eugene of Savoy. Entering Italy by the route of Vicenza, he made a feint of passing the Po near Ferrara; and while the enemy were thus amused, he crossed the Adige and attacked and totally defeated a large body of troops posted at Carpi. The French and Piedmontese army, commanded by Maréchal de Catinat and the Duke of Savoy in person, retiring beyond the Mincio, Prince Eugene passed that river also in pursuit of them: and M. de Catinat, who acted under the restraint of a defensive system, making dispositions to cover the Milanese, was astonished to find that the imperialists had, by a rapid movement on the opposite side, suddenly over-run the Mantuan, reduced the fortress of Castiglione, and laid the country under contribution. The French court, not comprehending the cause of these disasters, determined to supersede M. de Catinat, and to appoint as his successor M. de Villeroy. The rashness, vanity, and ignorance of the new general quickly produced the consequences which might be expected. M. Catinat, who still remained in the army, received M. Villeroy's orders on the 29th August, to commence an attack on the imperialists, then encamped in an impregnable position at Chiari on the Oglio. During the fight the Duke of Savoy, whose fidelity was somewhat suspected, displayed heroic bravery, and M. Catinat, who saw that success was impossible, seemed prodigal of life. The French were repulsed with prodigious slaughter, and M. Villeroy, destitute of resources, made no effort to save the wreck of his troops. M. Catinat at length, though wounded, gave the necessary orders for a retreat. Immediately after this engagement he resigned his commission, and repaired to Paris to vindicate his character. Prince Eugene kept his troops in almost constant motion during the whole of the winter, and was so successful in all his enterprises as to keep the French in perpetual alarm. Maréchal de Villeroy having fixed his head quarters at Cremona, which commands a bridge over the Po; the Prince formed, in the month of January, 1702, a design to surprise the town. He conducted in person a strong detachment of troops from the Oglio, and ordered another corps from the Parmesan to force at the same time the passage of the bridge. Marching in profound silence and secrecy through the ruins of an old aqueduct, he gained possession of one of the gates of the city. M. de Villeroy, suddenly awakened, rushed, unarmed and unattended, into the midst of the tumult, and was instantly made prisoner. The party, however, who were to attack the bridge not coming up at the time appointed, the Prince was ultimately compelled to abandon his enterprise; but he retired in safety with the Maréchal and the other prisoners whom he had taken. The Prince went on, till at length the French court, seeing the whole Spanish Empire in Italy endangered, resolved to send large reinforcements into that country, under the conduct of the Marechal duc de Vendome, a General worthy to be the antagonist of Prince Eugene.

The abdicated monarch, James, departed this life at St. Germains, September 16, 1701, in the 68th year of his age.‡

Upon his death, the Prince, his son, was proclaimed King

* The confinement of these persons gave birth to a very extraordinary paper, intituled, "A memorial from the gentlemen, freeholders, and inhabitants of the counties of———, in behalf of themselves, and many thousands of the good people of England." It was signed Legion, and sent to the Speaker in a letter, commanding him, in the name of two hundred thousand Englishmen, to deliver it to the House of Commons. In this strange expostulation, the House was charged with illegal and unwarrantable practices, in fifteen particulars: a new claim of right was ranged under seven heads: and the Commons were admonished to act according to their duty, as specified in this memorial, on pain of incurring the resentment of an injured nation. It was concluded in these words: "For Englishmen are no more to be slaves to Parliaments than to Kings—our name is Legion, and we are many." The Commons were equally provoked and intimidated by this libel, which was the production of Daniel de Foe, the celebrated author of Robinson Crusoe. They would not, however, deign to take notice of it in the House: but a complaint being made of endeavours to raise tumults and seditions, a committee was appointed to draw up an address to his Majesty, informing him of those seditious endeavours, and beseeching him to provide for the public peace and security.

† They say, "that France is erecting forts under the cannon of their strong places, and drawing lines along their frontier—that by her intrigues she has drawn away the Princes who were their friends, from their interests—and that they are surrounded on all sides except that of the sea—that the winter, which had been hitherto their security, was now over, and they were on the brink of being invaded and overturned every moment—and, in fine, that their condition was worse than if they were actually at war. They remonstrate on the fatal consequences of being left in this exposed condition, and express their confidence in his Majesty's consummate wisdom, and the good intentions of the English Parliament, to rescue them from that ruin with which they are threatened; and which the interests of his Majesty's kingdoms, inseparable from those of the republic, are so deeply concerned to prevent."

‡ Sunk into the extremes of bigotry and superstition, he seemed entirely to have relinquished the hope, and almost the wish, to recover his former greatness. He had been actually admitted into the society of the Jesuits; and had rarely failed, during the latter period of his life, making a visit annually to the abbey of la Trappe—practising there the same austerities which are enjoined upon the monks themselves by the rules of that rigid order. He kept very severe fasts; and would, upon certain days, bind his body with a very sharp pointed iron chain. He assisted at the choir hours, except at night. He ate nothing but eggs, raisins, and pulse; and spent his time in long meditations and spiritual conferences with the abbot, and his confessor, whom he took constantly there with him. In the usual course of things, he heard ordinarily at St. Germains, two masses every day, and on all the great festivals three masses and vespers, &c. During Lent he had sermons in his chapel thrice a week; and he, with his Queen, went every year on foot to the procession of the Holy

King of England, &c. by the officers of his own household in the court-yard of the palace, by the stile and title of King James III. However, before the French monarch would formally recognize him in that capacity, he convened a council of State, in which all his principal ministers concurred in dissuading him from a measure so flagrantly impolitic. At length he appeared fully penetrated with the force of their arguments. On retiring from the council, however, he met, in the apartment of Madame de Maintenon, the disconsolate widow of the late King James, who, in the moving language of tears and supplications, conjured him not to refuse, to the only son of a monarch whom he had so generously protected, the sad homage of an empty title, the sole remains of their former greatness. She reminded him that he had, during the life-time of the father, acknowledged the son as Prince of Wales, and that he could not without tarnishing his own glory, now hesitate to acknowledge him as King: that the Prince of Orange himself could not be offended at this bare nominal recognition, whilst he enjoyed unmolested all the fruits of his usurpation. The prayers and entreaties of the Queen, powerfully supported by Madame de Maintenon, shook the resolution of the monarch; and, reverting to his original purpose, he gave orders that the King of England should be publicly recognized in that capacity: this was done that very day by the King and court of France. Startled, nevertheless, at the consequences of this rash step, M. de Torcy, in a conference held soon after with the Earl of Manchester, who would no longer appear at court, endeavoured to apologize for this measure, as "merely complimentary; and expressed his hope that the present negotiation would terminate in a peace, which would set all right." King William, however, on receiving intelligence of the death of James, and the consequent recognition of his son, sent an express to the Earl of Manchester to return to England without taking his audience of leave.

William arrived in England early in November. His state of health, for the last year harassed with incessant anxiety, was considerably impaired; and his return to England was retarded by an illness of a serious nature, from which he had partially and slowly recovered. Though sensible of the shock his constitution had sustained, his activity and energy of mind seemed in no wise diminished; and knowing how much depended upon himself, he was solicitous to conceal his exhausted condition, till his grand projects were matured; but he told the Earl of Portland, that he should not live to see another summer.

The recognition of the pretended Prince of Wales by the French Monarch, while the treaty of Ryswick was yet in force, had excited the most passionate resentment of all ranks and orders of people; and addresses were presented from all parts, expressing a resolute determination to support his Majesty in the defence of his just rights, in opposition to all invaders of his crown and dignity. This spirit was, however, very ill seconded by those who occupied the great offices of government. So long since as the month of September, the King had written to Lord Sunderland, earnestly requesting his advice in the then situation of affairs; and, conformably to the advice of that nobleman, he wrote from Loo (October 10), to Lord Somers, desiring him to state his sentiments without reserve, relative to the present situation of affairs. Lord Somers in reply, urged upon the King the propriety and necessity in the present crisis, of having recourse to the Whigs, and of dissolving the present Tory Parliament. A dissolution of Parliament was accordingly determined upon; a proclamation for that purpose was issued on the 11th November; and a new Parliament was summoned to meet on the 30th of December,—previously to which great alterations took place in the administration. Lord Godolphin was superseded by the Earl of Carlisle; the Earl of Manchester was made Secretary of State, in the room of Sir Charles Hedges; the Earl of Pembroke was constituted Lord High Admiral; the Duke of Somerset was appointed President of the Council; and the Earl of Rochester was recalled from his government of Ireland.*

The Parliament met on the day appointed; and the first trial of strength was on the choice of a Speaker, which was carried in favour of Mr. Harley, in opposition to Sir Thomas Lyttleton, by a majority of four voices only. The King's speech recommending, in animated and energetic language, unanimity in the prosecution of the most vigorous and decisive measures, was received with unbounded applause. The King, the Parliament, and the nation seemed now animated by the same spirit; and at no period of his reign had William attained to so great a height of popularity. The House of Commons passed an unanimous resolve, that no peace should be made with France, until reparation be made for the late indignity offered by the French King; and 900,000 men were voted for the sea and land service. The Peers, on their part, were equally unanimous.

Early in January, 1702, a bill of attainder of the pretended Prince of Wales, now stiling himself King of Great Britain, was introduced into the House of Commons, and passed with perfect unanimity; but the Lords, including the Queen-Regent in the attaint, the Commons refused to concur—"that it may be of dangerous consequence to attaint persons by an amendment only, in which case such due consideration cannot be had as the nature of an attainder does require." Another bill followed, for the farther security of his Majesty's person, and the succession of the crown in the Protestant line—containing an abjuration of the pretended Prince of Wales, and an oath to the King as rightful and lawful sovereign. A question arising whether the oath should be compulsive or voluntary, a serious and vehement debate ensued; and the House was on a division so equally balanced, that there appeared a majority of one voice only for making the oath obligatory, the numbers being 188 to 187 voices.†

Respecting the great question of the Irish forfeitures, the House did not appear inclined to recede from the system of their predecessors; and the petitions presented to the King against the act of resumption by the city of Dublin and divers counties of Ireland, and laid before the House, were voted to contain scandalous reflections, highly reflecting upon his Majesty's honour and both Houses of Parliament. The subject of the impeachments, voted in the course of the last session, was revived with great warmth, but with little expectation, or perhaps desire, of success on the part of the Tories; and a resolution ultimately passed the House, "that it is the undoubted right of every subject of England, under any accusation, either by impeachment or otherwise, to be brought to a speedy trial, in order to be acquitted." This was regarded as a justification of the conduct of the House of Lords, and equivalent to an avowal that their Lordships had not denied justice in the matter of the impeachment.

During the whole of the winter, it had been sedu-

Holy Sacrement over the town of St. Germains. On the day and octave of Corpus Christi they heard high mass at the parish church; and on every evening during the octave, and on Sundays and great holidays throughout the year, they were present at the exaltation of the host. In the beginning of the year, his health visibly declined; and he had in April drunk the mineral waters of Bourbon without finding benefit. During his last illness the King of France came to visit him at St. Germains, and seemed much touched with his condition. The dying monarch, raising himself in his bed, expressed in faint accents his gratitude to his most Christian Majesty for the numerous instances of friendship and generosity he had received from him. Louis told him, he did not yet know the extent of the kindness he intended for him and his family: for that, in the event of his decease, he would acknowledge the Prince his son as King of Great Britain

On hearing this, James appeared overwhelmed with surprise and joy, and said "He had nothing farther to ask or wish." He exhorted his son to persevere in the faith, as a point of infinitely more consequence to him than the acquisition of a crown. He said, that by his practice he recommended Christian forgiveness to him; for he heartily forgave all his enemies, not even excepting the Princess of Denmark, the Prince of Orange, and the Emperor.

* The King pressing, as it is said, the great seal on the acceptance of Lord Somers, and that nobleman hesitating, in the apprehension of a new relapse in favour of the Tories; the King exclaimed with passionate emphasis, "Never, never, never!"

lously reported, by those who were near the person of the King, that he was in a fair way of obtaining a complete re-establishment of his health; but this was a subject of great doubt with many. On Saturday February the 21st, his Majesty rode as usual from Kensington to Hampton-court; passing through the park, his horse suddenly plunging, fell on very level ground, and the King's collar-bone was fractured with the violence of the shock. He was immediately carried to Hampton-court, where the fracture was reduced by Ronjat his first surgeon; and he thought himself in the evening well enough to be removed to Kensington. No dangerous symptoms appeared for some days, and his active and ardent mind was still employed on the great objects he had in view. On the 28th of February he sent a message to both Houses, recommending the appointment of commissioners to treat with those already authorised by the Parliament of Scotland, respecting an union of the two kingdoms, "than which the King declared he was satisfied that nothing could more contribute to the present and future security and happiness of England and Scotland, and to which he now hoped there would be found a general disposition." On the Monday following, a commission was issued to give the royal assent to such bills as were ready; amongst which was the bill for attainting the pretended Prince of Wales.

Great hopes were still professed of a speedy and perfect recovery; but on Wednesday, March the 3d, the King, falling asleep on a couch in the gallery of his palace, on his awaking, was seized with a shivering fit, which was followed by a paroxysm of fever; and these fits returning every day with increasing violence, on the sixth his case was esteemed very dangerous. The Lords having expedited the abjuration bill, a second commission was issued to give the royal assent to this favourite measure of national security; but the King being no longer able to make perfect use of his hand, a stamp was provided to supply the defect. On the same day, (March 6th), the Earl of Albemarle arrived from Holland, and, being immediately admitted to the King's presence, gave such an account of the posture of affairs on the Continent as must have afforded him the highest satisfaction, had he been capable of attending to any temporal concerns. But he received the intelligence without any visible emotion; and soon afterwards said, "Je tire vers ma fin"—I approach my end.

During the latter period of his illness, his Majesty was attended by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Sarum. His reason and all his senses were entire to the last minute. Early on Sunday morning (March 7), he desired the sacrament; after which, several of the Lords of the council and other nobles attending were called in, to whom the King laboured to speak with cheerfulness. When Lord Auverquerque appeared, he raised his voice, and thanked him for his long and faithful services. He took an affectionate leave of the Duke of Ormond and others, and delivered to the Earl of Albemarle the keys of his escritoire. Breathing with great difficulty, he asked his first physician, Dr. Bidloo, "How long this could last?" to which he answered, "Perhaps an hour." But the King, offering his pulse, said, "I do not die yet!" After a short interval, he enquired for the Earl of Portland; but before he came, his voice had totally failed, though his lips were seen to move; and taking his hand, he carried it to his heart with much tenderness. Throughout his illness no symptoms of mental weakness appeared. The conflict between life and death continued till about eight o'clock the ensuing morning, when the commendatory prayer was said for him; and, as it ended, the King, who had been supported all night in his bed, expired in the arms of one of his pages, March 8th, 1702, after a reign of thirteen years and a month, and in the fifty-second year of his age. On his left arm was found a ribband, to which was fastened a ring, enclosing a lock of the late Queen Mary's hair—a proof of the tender regard he entertained for her memory. On being opened, in order to his embalmment, the left lobe of the lungs was found inflamed to a degree of mortification; but the head and the heart were perfectly sound.*

His Majesty's body, having been opened and embalmed, lay in state for some time at Kensington; and, on the twelfth day of April, it was deposited in a vault of Henry's chapel, in Westminster Abbey.

* Few sovereigns have had their characters drawn in more opposing colours than William III. Belsham, the favourite historian of the Whigs, thus pourtrays the object of his warm and almost idolatrous admiration:—"Thus lived and died William III. King of Great Britain and Stadtholder of Holland; a monarch on whose great actions and illustrious character history delights to dwell. In his person he was not above the middle size, pale, thin, and valetudinary. He had a Roman nose, bright and eagle eyes, a large front, and a countenance composed to gravity and authority. All his senses were critical and exquisite. His words came from him with caution and deliberation; and his manners, excepting to his intimate friends, were cold and reserved. He spoke Dutch, French, English, and German, equally well; and he understood Latin, Spanish, and Italian. His memory was exact and tenacious, and he was a profound observer of men and things. He perfectly understood, and possessed a most extensive influence over the political concerns and interests of Europe. Though far above vanity or flattery, he was pertinacious in his opinions; and, from a clear perception or persuasion of their rectitude, was too impatient of censure or control. He attained not to the praise of habitual generosity, from his frequent and apparently capricious deviations into the extremes of profusion and parsimony. His love of secrecy was perhaps too nearly allied to dissimulation and suspicion; and his fidelity in friendship to partiality and prejudice. Though resentful and irritable by nature, he harboured no malice, and disdained the meanness of revenge. He believed firmly in the truth of religion, and entertained an high sense of its importance. But his tolerant spirit, and his indifference to the forms of church government, made him very obnoxious to the great body of the clergy. He appeared born for the purpose of opposing tyranny, persecution, and oppression; and for the space of thirty years it is not too much to affirm that he sustained the greatest and most truly glorious character of any Prince whose name is recorded in history. In his days, and by his means, the first firm and solid foundations were laid of all that is most valuable in civil society. Every vindication of the natural and unalienable rights of mankind was, till he ascended the throne of Great Britain, penal and criminal. To him we owe the assertion and the final establishment of our constitutional privileges. To him the intellectual world is indebted for the full freedom of discussion, and the unrestrained avowal of their sentiments on subjects of the highest magnitude and importance. To sum up all, his character was distinguished by virtues rarely found amongst Princes—moderation, integrity, simplicity, beneficence, magnanimity. Time, which has cast a veil over his imperfections, has added lustre to his many great and admirable qualities. His political views were in the highest degree laudable and upright. He had true ideas of the nature and ends of government: and the beneficial effects of his noble and heroic exertions will probably descend to the latest generations, rendering his name justly dear to the friends of civil and religious liberty, and his memory glorious and immortal."

Smollet, the Tory continuator of Hume, thus characterises the restorer of the Protestant religion:—"William III. was in his person of the middle stature, a thin body, a delicate constitution, subject to an asthma and continual cough from his infancy. He had an aquiline nose, sparkling eyes, a large forehead, and a grave solemn aspect. He was very sparing of speech: his conversation was dry, and his manner disgusting, except in battle, when his deportment was free, spirited, and animating. In courage, fortitude, and equanimity, he rivalled the most eminent warriors of antiquity; and his natural sagacity made amends for the defects in his education, which had not been properly superintended. He was religious, temperate, generally just and sincere, a stranger to violent transports of passion, and might have passed for one of the best Princes of the age in which he lived, had he never ascended the throne of Great Britain. But the distinguishing criterion of his character was ambition. To this he sacrificed the punctilios of honour and decorum, in deposing his own father-in-law and uncle; and this he gratified at the expence of the nation that raised him to sovereign authority. He aspired to the honour of acting as umpire in all the contests of Europe; and the second object of his attention was, the prosperity of that country to which he owed his birth and extraction. Whether he really thought the interests of the continent and Great Britain were inseparable, or sought only to drag England into the confederacy as a convenient ally, certain it is, he involved the kingdoms in foreign connections, which, in all probability, will be productive of their ruin. In order to establish this favourite point, he scrupled not to employ all the engines of corruption, by which the morals of the nation were totally debauched. He procured a Parliamentary sanction for a standing army, which now seems to be interwoven in the constitution. He introduced the pernicious practice of borrowing upon remote funds; an expedient that necessarily hatched a brood of usurers, brokers, contractors, and stock jobbers, to prey upon the vitals of their country. He entailed upon the nation a growing debt, and a system of politics big with misery, despair, and destruction. To sum up his character in a few words—William was a fatalist in religion, indefatigable in war, enterprising in politics, dead to all the warm and generous emotions of the human heart, a cold relation, an indifferent husband, a disagreeable man, an ungracious Prince, and an imperious sovereign."

BOOK XXVI.

THE REIGN OF ANNE; COMPRISING A PERIOD OF TWELVE YEARS, FOUR MONTHS, AND TWENTY-FOUR DAYS.

29. ANNE.

A. D. 1702.] HOW far Anne, the only surviving daughter of the late K. James II. and by marriage Princess of Denmark, who now ascended the throne, was likely to adopt the counsels, or to pursue the mighty projects of her predecessor, was a matter of much speculation. The doubt however was soon resolved. By an act passed some years previously to the death of the King, the Parliament, notwithstanding that event, still continued to sit. Three days after her accession, (March 11) the Queen, repairing in person to the House of Peers, with the usual solemnity, made a speech from the throne, expressive of her fixed resolution to prosecute the measures concerted by the late King, whom she stiled the great support, not only of these kingdoms but of all Europe. And she declared, that too much could not be done for the encouragement of our allies to reduce the exorbitant power of France.* In answer to the address of the clergy, presented by the Archbishop of Canterbury, she expressed her high regard and attachment to the church; and to that of the dissenters she gave assurances of protection, and protested, "that she would do nothing to forfeit her interest in their affections." These measures of the new reign were chiefly influenced by the Lords Marlborough and Godolphin, who demonstrated the imminent danger to which the liberties of Europe would be exposed, were England to act with indifference or indecision in the present crisis.†

The States General, lamenting their irreparable loss, promised mutually to adhere, at whatever risque, to the interests of their country. In a few days, they received the Queen's speech, and a letter to the States annexed, in which she declared her determination "to maintain all the alliances of her crown entered into by the late King; and to concur with them in such measures as should be necessary to the reduction of the power of France."—That power greatly exulted in the death of the King of England. The sieur de Barré, left by count d'Avaux chargé d'affaires, presented to the States a memorial, inviting them to renew the negotiation, and, in language disrespectful and injurious to the late monarch, stating his hope, "that, as their high mightinesses would now recover their liberty, and be no longer under restraint, they would consult their own interest, and look upon a good intelligence with France as the firmest support of their republic." The States indignantly replied, "that the Sieur Resident ought to know that their high and mighty Lordships have heretofore had as much liberty as at present, to debate and to take all such resolutions as they judged necessary and useful for the good and preservation of their state." The Earl of Marlborough's stay in Holland, though short, answered a most important purpose. Charmed by his noble carriage and engaging manners, and struck with admiration at his superiority of genius, the States, from this time, placed the most unlimited confidence in his capacity and fidelity.

The House of Commons settled upon her Majesty for life the revenue enjoyed by the late King; and the Queen in return declared, "that, in consideration of the great burdens to be sustained by her subjects, she would direct 100,000*l.* per annum to be appropriated to the national service. The abjuration oath imposed by the act of the late King was taken unanimously, and cheerfully; and the Queen soon completed her ministerial arrangements. Her private inclinations were decidedly in favour of the Tories; but the Earl of Marlborough, impatient to give full scope to his talents, employed the extensive influence which he possessed over her mind, through the countess, to induce the appointment of an administration which should prosecute the war with vigour and effect. This he well knew was not to be expected without a powerful co-operation on the part of the Whigs. Lord Godolphin, allied to Marlborough, by the marriage of his son with the eldest daughter of the Earl, was connected with him also by the strictest political union; and though a Tory administration was at length formed, many of the Whigs were admitted into the new arrangement, and a spirit of conciliation pervaded the general system.‡

The Earl of Marlborough had agreed with the States and the imperial minister, that war should be declared against France, at Vienna, London, and the Hague, on the same day, viz. May the 15th, N. S.; but when this resolution came to be debated in council, it was vehemently opposed by the Earl of Rochester and others of the board, who contended, that it was safest and best for England to avoid a declaration of war, and that no necessity existed for acting, if we acted at all, in any other capacity than as auxiliaries. This opinion was overruled; and a resolution was taken in favour of war; which being communicated by the Queen to the House of Commons, the House returned their unanimous thanks, and assurances of assistance.§ On the day

* An expression which occurred in the conclusion of her speech, "That her heart was entirely English," was thought, by those who regarded the proceedings of the new sovereign with jealousy, to glance obliquely upon the honour of the late monarch, and was resented accordingly.

† To give efficacy to a system so opposite to the hopes and expectations of the Tories, Lord Godolphin was advanced to the office of Lord High Treasurer; and the Earl of Marlborough was declared Captain General of the forces of Great Britain at home and abroad, and at the same time appointed ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the States General.

‡ Lord Godolphin, as Lord High Treasurer, was regarded as the efficient head of the ministry: the Earl of Nottingham and Sir Charles Hedges were re-instated in their posts as joint secretaries of state. The Earl of Pembroke being honourably dismissed from the Admiralty, with the offer of a great pension, which he refused to accept, the post of Lord High Admiral was occupied by the Prince of Denmark; the Duke of Somerset, a Whig, was continued president of the council; and Sir Nathan Wright, a Tory, Lord Keeper. The Duke of Devonshire, a Whig, was appointed Lord Steward: and the Marquis of Normandy, a Tory, Lord Privy Seal. Seymour, Howe, Harcourt, and others of the Tories, were now admitted to the council board, from which the great Whig leaders, Somers and Halifax, were excluded.

§ The Earl of Rochester, highly offended that his counsels were rejected, withdrew to his seat in sullen discontent; and a message, after day appointed, the confederate courts solemnly proclaimed war against France in their respective capitals, to the great astonishment of Louis XIV. who, on receiving the intelligence from his first minister, the Marquis de Torcy, gave way to unusual emotions of anger; and throwing from him the Dutch declaration with great violence, he protested, "that messieurs the Dutch merchants should one day repent of their audacity."

A bill was now brought into the House of Commons to empower the Queen to nominate commissioners to treat with Scotland for the purpose of effecting an union between the two kingdoms; which, notwithstanding considerable opposition, passed both Houses by a great majority, and received the royal assent.—A report having been propagated, that the late King had formed a design of excluding her present Majesty from the throne, the Dukes of Somerset and Devonshire, and the Lords Marborough, Jersey, and Albemarle, who had the inspection of the King's papers, were interrogated by the House of Peers as to this point; and they unanimously declaring that nothing relative to such design was to be found, the House voted the report false, villainous and scandalous; and, in reply to an address of the House upon the subject, the Queen declared, "that she would order the Attorney General to prosecute the authors and publishers of this false report." Notice was also taken by the House of Peers of a sermon preached by a Dr. Binckes before the Lower House of Convocation on the thirteenth of January, in which a scandalous parallel was drawn between the sufferings of Christ and those of the "blessed martyr Charles;" and a decided preference given to the latter.* After some debate the Lords voted, that there were expressions in the said sermon which gave just scandal and offence to all Christian people; and it was ordered that this resolution be communicated to his diocesan, the Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, in order to his being proceeded against in the ecclesiastical court.

The business of the session having been terminated, the Parliament was prorogued, on the 25th of May.

An act having passed in Scotland, as well as in England, to continue the existing Parliament six months subsequent to the death of the King, it was convened on the 9th of June, (1702), the Duke of Queensbury being appointed High Commissioner. Before any proceedings could take place, the Duke of Hamilton, and the party of which he was the head, protested against the legality of the meeting—his Grace reading a paper containing the grounds and reasons of their dissent, on the principle, that the 17th act of the 6th session of King William's Parliament, continuing the Parliament after his death, was an unconstitutional innovation. The Duke and seventy-nine of the members, above two fifths of the number present, then withdrew, leaving the majority to sit and act by themselves; as they passed from the Parliament House to the High Cross, they were saluted with loud and universal acclamation. The Duke of Queensbury, however, delivered the Queen's letter to the Parliament, declaring "her firm resolution to maintain and protect her subjects in the full possession of their religion, laws, and liberties, and of the Presbyterian government of the church; then acquainting them with the just causes of declaring war against the French King, and earnestly recommending to them both the providing competent supplies for maintaining such a number of forces as might be necessary for disappointing the enemy's designs and preserving the present happy settlement, and the consideration of an union between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, which was recommended to them by the late King." The Parliament, demonstrating great firmness and spirit, passed an act declaring it to be high treason to impugn the dignity and authority of their proceedings; an act for securing the Protestant religion and Presbyterian church government; an act for a supply of ten months' cess upon all land-rents; and an act for enabling her Majesty to appoint commissioners to treat concerning an union. They also expelled a member of the House, for his audacity in affirming "that Presbytery was inconsistent with monarchy—that, like vice and hypocrisy, and other pests of mankind, it spread and flourished most in turbulent times of anarchy and rebellion; and that order and decency in the church were to be preferred to the pride and infallibility of a Pope in every parish." The Dean and faculty of advocates having passed a vote in favour of the protest of the dissentient members, they were summoned for the same before the House, and received a severe reprimand for their presumption. The dissentient members having deputed the Lord Blantyre to present an address to her Majesty in vindication of their proceedings, she peremptorily refused to receive it; and on the 30th of June, 1702, the Parliament was adjourned.

Commissioners having been appointed for treating concerning an union of the kingdoms of England and Scotland, the persons named in the commission met for the first time on the 22d of October, at Whitehall. The treaty seemed for some time in a prosperous train; but when the commissioners gave in their proposals for preserving the rights and privileges of their company trading to Africa and the Indies, such difficulties arose as put a stop to all farther progress, and in the sequel the commission was dissolved.

The war on the Continent commenced with the siege of Keisarswart, a well fortified town, situated on the Rhine, some leagues below Dusseldorf.† The trenches were opened before the town on the 18th of April; and the place was defended with great vigour; but the fortifications being almost destroyed by the artillery of the besiegers, and the ravelin and counterscarp carried by assault with horrible slaughter, the garrison was compelled, June 15, to capitulate, and was allowed honourable terms; the besiegers having lost 7000 men. The Marechal de Boufflers, finding all his attempts to relieve Keisarswart abortive, decamped from Zanten on the 10th of June, and directed his march, without beat of drum or sound of trumpet, towards Nimeguen, purposing to take a position between that place and the confederate army. The Earl of Athlone, alarmed for the safety of that important city, put his troops in motion, and made good his retreat under the cannon of Nimeguen—resisting and repulsing the various attacks of the French with great resolution. Marechal Boufflers, in consequence, defiled with his whole army towards Cleves, venting his resentment upon the defenceless territories through which he marched, laying waste the country, and destroying the park of Cleves and all its delightful walks and avenues.

The Earl of Marlborough at length arrived to take upon him the command of the allied army; the Earl of Athlone, though Field-Marshal of the Dutch forces, and a General of great ability and experience, relinquishing his pretensions in favour of the Earl of Marlborough. The English commander, finding his force superior to that of the enemy, resolved to pass the after an interval of some months, being sent to him from the Queen, commanding him to repair to his government of Ireland, he insolently declared, "That he would not go if the Queen would give him the country." The Earl then waited upon her Majesty, and in great wrath desired leave to resign his employments; which was readily granted, and the viceroyalty of that kingdom immediately conferred upon the Duke of Ormond.

* "If," says Dr. Binckes, "with respect to the dignity of the person, to have been King of the Jews was what ought to have secured our Saviour from violence; here is also one not only born to a crown, but actually possessed of it. He was not only called King by some, and at the same time derided by others for being so called, but he was acknowledged by all to be a King. He was not just dressed up for an hour or two in purple robes, and saluted with a hail, King! but the usual ornaments of Majesty were his customary apparel; his subjects owned him to be their King; and yet they brought him before a tribunal, they judged him, they condemned him.—Our Saviour's declaring 'that his kingdom was not of this world,' might look like a sort of renunciation of his temporal sovereignty, but here was indisputable right of sovereignty:—both by the laws of God and man. He was the reigning Prince and the Lord's anointed; and yet, in despite of all law human and Divine, he was by direct force of arms and the most daring methods of a flagrant rebellion and violence, deprived at once of his imperial crown and life."

† Keisarswart belonged to the Elector of Cologne, who had put the French into possession of all the strong places in his dominions; and whilst in their hands, it exposed both the circle of Westphalia, and the eastern provinces of the States to alarming inroads.

Maese,

Maese, below Grave, in pursuit of them; and the confederates, who were so lately reduced to the necessity of retreating under the cannon of Nimeguen, had now the pleasure to see the French flying before them. The Earl of Marlborough gave orders to lay siege to Venlo, which surrendered on the 25th of September. He then proceeded to Roermond, at the confluence of the Roer and the Maese, which with Stevenswart, a fortified town five miles south of Roermond, was reduced before the middle of October. Marechal Boufflers retreated towards Liege, apprehending that city to be in danger; but, on the approach of the Earl of Marlborough, he again put his army in motion towards Tongeren; and Liege being left defenceless, was delivered up. The garrison, retiring into the citadel, prepared for a vigorous resistance; but, in six days a practical breach being made, the place was taken sword in hand by the most extraordinary efforts of valour. This was a conquest of great importance, the navigation of the Maese being now completely opened. There is however great reason to believe that the operations of this first campaign would have proved far more decisive, had not the plans of the Earl of Marlborough been frustrated by the ignorant and obstinate opposition of the field deputies accompanying the Dutch army.*

The French army in Germany slowly assembling under Marechal de Catinat, the imperialists had an opportunity of laying siege to Landau, a strong fortress on the banks of the Queich in the Lower Alsatia. The place was invested by Prince Louis of Baden on the 16th of June; several weeks elapsed in raising batteries and making approaches; and, matters being in a prosperous train, on the 27th of July the King of the Romans arrived in the confederate camp in order to have the honour of taking the city; but it did not surrender till the 12th of September. The necessity of the French King's affairs had forced him to grant the Elector of Bavaria all his demands. No sooner had this Prince decided in favour of France, than he possessed himself by stratagem of the imperial city of Ulm upon the Danube; which excited great alarm throughout the empire. The diet, after a warm debate, resolved, by a great majority of voices, to declare war against France and Spain; the emperor was addressed to proceed against the Elector of Bavaria according to the established constitutions; and the ministers of Bavaria and Cologne were forbidden to appear any more in that assembly. In consequence of the seizure of Ulm, the Prince of Baden was obliged to return to the defence of the empire; and his army being weakened by various detachments, he took a strong position near Friedlinguen, where he was attacked by the Marquis de Villars with a far superior force. The Germans, under the conduct of this general, defended themselves with great vigour; and though the imperial cavalry were routed and broken, the enemy were finally repulsed by the unsupported efforts of the infantry, who pursued them almost to the bridge of Hunninguen. The Prince being nevertheless under the necessity of abandoning Friedlinguen, the French King caused Te Deum to be sung for the success of his arms; and the Marquis de Villars was also on this occasion advanced to the dignity of a Marechal of France. On the side of the Moselle, the French under M. Tallard made themselves masters of Triers and Traerbach. In Italy the war was carried on by the Duc de Vendome and Prince Eugene with an ardent emulation of skill and valour. The city of Mantua had for a long time been blockaded by the imperial army; and the more direct passes being strongly fortified, the Duc de Vendome marched through the Venetian territories, notwithstanding the protestations of the republic, to its relief. The Prince, who, in consequence of the defection of the Elector of Bavaria, had not received his promised reinforcements, at the approach of the enemy withdrew his forces. Philip, King of Spain, impatient to signalize himself in the field, had embraced the indiscreet resolution of assuming the command of the Italian army in person. He arrived at Naples in April, and there received, by a cardinal legate, the compliments of the Pope, who nevertheless refused the investiture of the kingdom; his Holiness thus endeavouring to preserve a good understanding with both parties; but the imperial ambassador was in consequence ordered to leave Rome. The King of Spain was conveyed to Finale by the French fleet; and soon after joining the Dukes of Savoy and Vendome, the united forces of France, Spain, and Piedmont, to the amount of 40,000 men, advanced to Luzzara with a view to cut off the communication of the imperialists with Mirandola and the Modenese. Prince Eugene, whose army did not exceed 30,000, marched to attack them (August 15), with the greatest intrepidity. It is said, that the plan formed by the Prince was the most masterly that could be conceived, and failed of success by a mere accident. The contest was very bloody, and the success doubtful. The French at length abandoned the field; part of their ammunition and provisions fell into the hands of the imperialists; but the Prince, weakened even by the advantage he had gained, was obliged to act on the defensive; and the fortress of Luzzara and other contiguous posts were captured by the French, who had upon the whole somewhat the advantage of the campaign. King Philip, disappointed and disgusted, returned at the end of the year to Madrid.

The confederate fleet, consisting of fifty ships of the line, with about 14,000 land-forces on board, under the command of Sir George Rooke and the Duke of Ormond, sailed from St. Helen's, July 1st. on a secret expedition: on the 12th of August they cast anchor before the city of Cadiz; but, owing to various circumstances, after much loss of time, they returned, without the accomplishment of any important object.† On their return they received the intelligence that the Spanish

* Upon the breaking up of the army in November, the Earl thought the easiest and most expeditious mode of retiring to the Hague was by falling down the Maese in one of the great boats which navigate that river. He had a guard of twenty-five soldiers in the boat, and an escort of fifty horse to patrole the banks; but the troopers mistaking their way in the night, three leagues below Venlo, a party of thirty-five men from the garrison of Gueldres, the only place in Guelderland yet remaining in possession of the French, lurking near the river, suddenly seized the hauling-rope, and drawing the boat on shore made a general discharge of fire-arms; and throwing several hand-grenades into the boat amongst the crew, who were mostly asleep, they rendered themselves masters of the vessel before they could recover from their surprise. The Earl was accompanied by M. Opdom, a Dutch officer of high rank, and M. Gueldermalsen, one of the deputies of the States, who were provided with passes, which the Earl, unsuspicious of danger, had neglected to procure; but, recollecting that he had an obsolete pass belonging to his brother General Churchill in his possession, he produced it with the utmost composure; and in the hurry it was returned without examination. After securing the guard and rifling the vessel, which they detained for this purpose some hours, they suffered her to proceed on her voyage. The Governor of Venlo, hearing of the capture, and ignorant of the subsequent release, marched with his whole garrison to invest the town of Gueldres; and the news reaching the Hague in the same imperfect manner, the States resolved that immediate orders be sent to all the forces in the vicinity to assemble and form the siege of the place, menacing the garrison with the last extremities if they refused to relinquish their prisoner: but before the orders could be dispatched, the Earl arrived in safety at the Hague, where he was received with inexpressible joy.

† One side of the two bays of Cadiz, both inner and outer, is formed by a narrow neck of land, which runs into the Western Ocean, three miles in length. At the extremity of this neck stands the town of Cadiz, well fortified towards the land on the east, and the bay on the north. St. Mary's is situated on the opposite shore. The inner bay, called the Pointal, formed by two points of land 700 yards distant, is commanded by two forts, called Matagorda and St. Laurent. The men of war and the galleys that lay in the outer bay retired into the Pointal, whither Sir Stafford Fairborne offered immediately to follow them; but that Sir George Rooke thought too hazardous: and, instead of proceeding to vigorous enterprise, several days were lost in endeavouring to obtain intelligence; in which time the most valuable effects of the Spaniards were conveyed from Cadiz to St. Mary's, and the narrow passage between the bays rendered impracticable. At length a council of war was called, which, in opposition to the remonstrances of the Duke of Ormond, came to a resolution not to make an attempt on the island of Cadiz. However, the land-forces being disembarked made themselves masters of Port St. Mary, where the authority of the General was insufficient to restrain them from the grossest excesses. After an unsuccessful attempt on the fort of Matagorda, it appeared to be the prevailing opinion that nothing could be done; and provisions growing scarce, and the naval commander representing the dangers of the sea at this season, the Duke of Ormond with great reluctance consented to re-imbark the land-forces; and the whole fleet set sail for England.

flota, under the convoy of a large squadron of ships of war, had put into the harbour of Vigo, which it was instantly determined to attack. The Duke of Ormond, at the head of a large detachment of troops, reduced by extraordinary exertions of valour the castles at the entrance of the port: and the immense boom thrown across the harbour being broke asunder by admiral Hopson, who amidst a most tremendous fire bore with full sail against it in the Torbay, the whole fleet of men of war and galleons, which had retreated thither for security, were destroyed or captured, with inconsiderable loss. The cargo on board the flota was computed at twenty millions of pieces-of-eight in gold and silver, and the goods were valued at as much more. Of specie and merchandize, however, a large proportion was taken out and saved by the enemy; but enough remained to reward and enrich the captors, who, at their arrival in England, were received with loud acclamations—the success at Vigo silencing the clamours occasioned by the previous miscarriage at Cadiz.

The Parliament was on the 2d of July dissolved by proclamation, and a new Parliament summoned, which met for the first time on the 20th of October, Robert Harley being again chosen Speaker. The complexion of the House of Commons quickly appeared to be of the Tory cast; and an address was presented abounding with reflections on the memory of the late King. Soon after the commencement of the session, the Queen recommended the making a farther provision for the Prince of Denmark in case of survivance; and the Commons voted him a revenue of 100,000*l.* per annum.

The Earl of Marlborough was about this time created a Duke; and the Queen informed the House of Commons, that she had also granted him a pension of 5000*l.* per annum out of the post office revenue, and signified her wish that it might be perpetuated to him and his heirs by act of Parliament. This occasioned high debates; the Duke requested the Queen to withdraw her message; and the House by way of apology, stated, in an address, "Their apprehensions of the danger of making a precedent for the alienation of the revenue of the crown, so much reduced by the exorbitant grants of the last reign." This refusal was thought to excite in the mind of the Duke no little chagrin and resentment towards the Tory party.

Sir Humphry Edwin, a dissenter, who served the office of Lord Mayor of London in 1697, had, during his Mayoralty, been guilty of the gross indiscretion of attending in his formalities with the city sword, &c. at a certain meeting-house or conventicle, called Pinner's Hall. This was much censured at the time, and was now made the pretext for bringing in a bill for preventing, under great and grievous penalties and incapacities, the practice of occasional conformity, which was painted in frightful colours, as an enormity by which the church was exposed to the most imminent dangers. This bill passed the Commons by a great majority; but the Lords received it with coldness, altered and mitigated the pecuniary penalties therein imposed, and also struck out a declaratory clause, affirming it to be the intent of the test act that every person complying therewith should be in all respects conformable to the church. The bill being returned to the Commons, a free conference was demanded and held on the subject of the amendments; and each House persisting in its opinion, the bill was lost for this session. The disposition of the Commons farther displayed itself by a bill prolonging, for a year, the time allowed for taking the abjuration oath. The Upper House agreed to this, but the Whig Lords had influence sufficient to obtain the insertion of two important clauses; the first declaring it high treason to endeavour to defeat the succession to the crown as now by law established;—and, secondly, for extending the obligation of the oath to Ireland. A bill was also introduced by Sir Edward Seymour, for "resuming all the grants of the late King;" but the measure was subsequently dropped. The place bill, so much a favourite with the Tories during the late reign, was now revived by the Whigs; but its former advocates, with surprising effrontery, opposed and negatived it, and brought in a bill, which they pretended would answer the purpose of securing the independency of the House much better—providing that no person shall be chosen members but such as are possessed of a certain qualification in landed estate. This was rejected by the Lords, and the session was terminated on the 27th February, 1703—the Queen declaring "her resolution to maintain the act of toleration, with which she hoped those who had the misfortune to dissent from the church would rest satisfied."*

In the course of the last year, Colonel Moore, governor of Carolina, with a strong provincial force, made himself master of the town of St. Augustine, capital of the neighbouring Spanish settlement of Florida; but the arrival of some French and Spanish ships compelled him to evacuate his conquests previously to the surrender of the fort or citadel. Colonel Codrington, governor of the Leeward islands, landing on the Isle of Guadaloupe, possessed himself of the town and castle of Basse-terre; and, after ravaging and plundering the country, he retired with inconsiderable loss to St. Christopher's. An English armament, consisting chiefly of privateers, sailing up the river Darien, arrived in twelve days at the golden mines of Santa Cruz, near St. Martha, whence, though the country was previously alarmed, they carried off a great booty. In the West Indies, Admiral Benbow fell in (August the 19th, 1702) with a French armament of nearly equal force under M. du Casse. The Defiance and Windsor, two of his capital ships, after receiving two or three broadsides, deserted the line, and bore away out of gun-shot; and other ships of the fleet also falling astern, the French endeavoured to escape in the night. The English commander pursued, and, for several successive days, fought the enemy with the utmost bravery, though ill supported, till on the 24th his right leg was broken by a chain-shot. Ordering his cradle upon the quarter deck, he then continued the fight with undiminished ardour. Almost all the other ships keeping aloof, he made the signal for the captains to come on board; but his entreaties and reproaches proved equally unavailing, and he was reluctantly compelled to desist from any farther pursuit of the enemy, though actually within his grasp. Returning to Jamaica, he ordered a court martial to be held on six of the captains, two of whom, Kirby and Wade, were condemned to be shot; which sentence was afterwards executed upon them, by the Queen's command, at Plymouth. Admiral Benbow, after languishing some weeks, died of his wounds, extremely lamented as one of the bravest and most experienced naval officers that England ever bred.†

The campaign of 1703 commenced by the capture of Rheinberg, by Count Lottum, General of the Prussian forces. In April, the Duke of Marlborough resolved upon the siege of the important town of Bonne, the key of the electorate of Cologne. The place was invested April 24th, being attacked on different sides by General Fagel and the hereditary Prince of Hesse; while the celebrated Coehorn directed his efforts against the fortress situated on the other bank of the Rhine. The skill and courage of the besiegers were aided by fortune; for the chain which held the flying bridge, by means of which the fort communicated with the town, was broke by a chance shot from a cannon, and the fort surrendered May 8. The garrison from the town being also repulsed in a desperate sally, and a lodgement

* At this period the preposterous practice of touching for the King's evil was revived; and an office was inserted in the liturgy, to be used upon the occasion. Bernard, first surgeon to the Queen, a man of wit, who had often made this precious foolery the subject of his satire, being reminded of his former jests, said, sneeringly,—"Really one could not have thought it, if one had not seen it!"

† When Du Casse arrived at Carthagena, he wrote a letter to Benbow to this effect:

"Sir,

"I had little hope on Monday last but to have supped in your cabin; but it pleased God to order it otherwise. I am thankful for it. As for those cowardly captains, who deserted you, hang them up; for, by God, they deserve it.

"Your's,

"DU CASSE."

made on the counterscarp by the Prince of Hesse, the Marquis d'Alegre, governor of the place, capitulated on the 16th of May.

Marechals Boufflers and Villeroi had attempted a diversion by seizing Tongeren, making a motion toward Maestricht, with a view to bombard that city; but finding M. Auverquerque at the head of his troops ready to receive them, they marched back to Tongeren, which they subsequently abandoned on the approach of the Duke of Marlborough. The Dutch Generals, Coehorn and Spaar, made in different quarters successive attacks upon the French with considerable advantage; but Marechal Boufflers coming by surprise with a far superior force upon a body of troops, chiefly Dutch, commanded by Baron Obdam stationed at Eckeren, near Antwerp, was near putting them to the total rout; Obdam himself escaping on the first shock with about thirty horse to Breda, whence he wrote to the States an account of his defeat, concluding that all was lost. With such skill and presence of mind, however, did General Sclangenburg rally the troops after the departure of Obdam, that the fortune of the day was in a great measure retrieved, and the French were finally compelled to retreat, both sides sustaining heavy loss. The Duke of Marlborough advancing towards Marechal Villeroi, then lying with the grand army at St. Job, that General set fire to his camp, and retired with precipitation within his lines. The Duke then detached a body of troops under Count Noyelles, who reduced the town and castle of Huy. When Huy was on the point of surrendering, a grand council of war was summoned, in order to determine what enterprise should be next undertaken. The Dutch deputies and generals proposed the siege of Limburg; but the Duke of Marlborough, in conjunction with the Duke of Wirtemburg, &c. delivered their opinion, that a general attack upon the enemy's lines between the Mehaigne and Leuwe would be attended with great and decisive success; and that Limburg might with ease be reduced by a detachment when the season was more advanced. The Dutch deputies, however, persisted in their opposition, and the Duke of Marlborough was obliged to content himself with the acquisition of Limburg, which surrendered after a feeble resistance. Gueldres also capitulated on the 17th of December. On the Rhine, Marechal Villars maintained the superiority of the arms of France. In the month of March he invested the fortress of Kehl, opposite Strasburg, which soon surrendered on honourable terms; and he had orders to join the Elector of Bavaria, who had defeated the imperialists at Scarding, and taken possession of the city of Ratisbon, where the diet of the empire was actually assembled. Prince Louis of Baden lay encamped at Stolhoffen, where he was attacked in his entrenchments by Marechal Villars and Count Tallard, with a force more than double his number; but the French were vigorously repulsed, and the two Marechals obliged to withdraw. Marechal Villars, however, penetrating the passes of the Black Forest, joined the Elector near Dutlingen. It was also designed that this Prince should be farther re-inforced by the Duc de Vendome from the Milanese: but the Elector, with a view to facilitate this junction, marching into the Tyrol, where he even made his triumphal entry into Inspruck the capital, was in the sequel attacked by the peasants, and compelled to evacuate the whole territory with great loss; and the Duc de Vendome, who had advanced almost to Trent, retired to Italy. The miscarriage of the design upon the Tyrol occasioned such loss of time, that the French made no other acquisition this summer beyond the mountains than the strong fortress of Barsello, accounted the key of the Duchy of Modena. The French interest received a great blow this year, by the defection of the Duke of Savoy, who was led to recognise the Archduke Charles (son of the Emperor) as King of Spain, and by the accession of Prussia and Portugal to the grand alliance.

Towards the end of December the nominal King of Spain (Charles) landed at Portsmouth, and immediately repaired to Windsor, where he was entertained with much splendor and magnificence. Early in the new year (1704,) he sailed, under convoy of a powerful squadron commanded by Sir George Rooke, to Lisbon, where he was welcomed with distinguished honours.

In the month of September (1703) the Duke of Ormond, who had succeeded the Earl of Rochester, as Viceroy of Ireland, held a session of Parliament in Dublin. The addresses of the two Houses were in the highest degree loyal, and complimentary to the present governor; but the proceedings of Parliament, during the whole of the session, indicated the deep sense entertained by the Irish legislature of the multiplicity and magnitude of the national grievances; and they concluded a long memorial with the declaration, "That they could not despair of her Majesty's goodness being extended towards them in such a prudent and gracious manner as might afford them relief according to the exigencies of their condition, by restoring them to a full enjoyment of their constitution, or by promoting a more firm and strict union with her Majesty's subjects of England." The answer of the Duke was favourable to this great project; but his political influence was circumscribed; and the earnest desire of the Irish legislature never became the theme of Parliamentary discussion in England. A severe bill was introduced against the Roman Catholics, framed on the model of that passed some years since in England, which the English ministry, anxious not to increase the discontents of the Irish Protestants, would not venture to reject; but they annexed to it a clause, extending the operation of the test act to Ireland, which they hoped would have been fatal to the bill. Farther measures of rigour appeared to be in contemplation, when the Parliament was suddenly adjourned.

The English session was opened (Nov. 9) by a warlike speech, in which the Queen demanded "such supplies as should be requisite to defray the necessary charge of the war during the next year, with regard, not only to all the former engagements, but particularly to the alliance lately made with the King of Portugal, for recovering the monarchy of Spain from the house of Bourbon, and restoring it to the house of Austria." A short time after the meeting of Parliament, a motion was made in the Commons for leave to bring in a bill against occasional conformity, and carried, notwithstanding the non-concurrence of the court, by a great majority. It was, however, somewhat differently modified from the former, and the penalties greatly mitigated; and in the preamble the clause against persecution was omitted. When sent up to the Lords, the bill occasioned a debate of many hours, whether it should be read a second time, or thrown out; and, on dividing the House, it was resolved by a majority of twelve voices not to give the bill a second reading, but to reject it.

During the present session a discovery was made of a plot which excited much attention. Simon Fraser, of Beaufort, head of the clan of the Frasers, who assumed upon doubtful authority the title of Lord Lovat, had been deputed from the court of St. Germains into Scotland, with a commission to treat with the Highland chieftains who were still attached to that interest. After much intrigue, he obtained an introduction to the Duke of Queensberry, to whom he betrayed the secret of his embassy. Queensberry, it appears, took an ungenerous advantage of this discovery, to expose several persons whom he accounted his personal or political enemies, particularly the Marquis of Athol, for whom Lovat pretended to have a letter from the Queen at St. Germains, thanking that nobleman for his assurances of fidelity and attachment. The direction of this letter, said to be intended for the Duke of Gordon, was observed to be in a hand different from the contents, to which it was affirmed by the friends of the Marquis to have been insidiously affixed by Lovat, between whom and Athol subsisted a deadly feud. Intelligence having been conveyed to London of this secret mission, which was corroborated by the seizure about this time of several Jacobite emissaries, her Majesty, on the 17th of December, acquainted the Parliament, "That she had had unquestionable information of very ill practices and designs carried on in Scotland." A long and tedious examination followed, upon which the House of Commons passed no judgments; but the Peers, towards the end of the session, came to a resolution, "That there appeared to have been a dangerous conspiracy carried on for raising a rebellion in Scotland, and invading that kingdom with a French power; and their Lordships gave it as their opinion, that nothing had given so much encouragement to her Majesty's enemies to enter into this detestable conspiracy, as that the succession to the crown of Scotland was not declared to be in the Princess Sophia and her heirs, being Protestants." Her Majesty replied, "That she had already declared her intentions of endeavouring the settlement of the Protestant succession in Scotland, as the effectual means of securing their quiet and our own, and the readiest way to an entire union between both kingdoms, in the perfecting of which it was very desirable that no time should be lost." The secret correspondence of Fraser with Queensberry could not long remain unsuspected by the Jacobites. In consequence of a pass procured for him under a feigned name, he returned to the continent, and, repairing to the court of St. Germains, delivered a long and confused memorial to the Queen Regent, containing a pompous account of the success of his mission, acknowledging his intrigues with Queensberry, Argyle, Leven, &c. On the perusal of this memorial, the Earl of Middleton clearly perceived the falsehood and treachery of Lovat; and, in the sequel, he was thrown into the Bastille.

The Queen acquired much popularity, in consequence of a message delivered to the House of Commons by Sir Charles Hedges, on the anniversary of her birthday this year (1701) importing, "That her Majesty, having taken into her serious consideration the mean and insufficient maintenance belonging to the clergy in divers parts of this kingdom, to give them some ease had been pleased to remit the arrears of the tenths to the poor clergy: and for an augmentation of their maintenance, her Majesty declared that she would make a grant of her whole revenue arising out of the first-fruits and tenths, as far as it should become free from incumbrances, to be applied to this purpose. And if the House of Commons could find any proper method by which her Majesty's good intentions to the poor clergy might be made more effectual, it would be of great advantage to the public, and acceptable to her Majesty." A bill was consequently brought in, enabling her Majesty to alienate this branch of the revenue, then amounting to about 17,000*l.* per annum, but since much improved and increased, and to create a corporation by charter to apply it to the use for which she now gave it. In aid of this purpose, a partial repeal of the statute of mortmain took place, that it might be free to all men to give or bequeath what they thought fit towards the augmentation of the fund. This excellent charity is known by the appellation of Queen's Anne's Bounty; and it produced a set of addresses from all the clergy of England, full of thanks and just acknowledgments.* Parliament was prorogued on the 3d of April.

The Whigs continued to gain ground in the cabinet. The Earl of Nottingham, before the prorogation of Parliament, resigned his post of Secretary of State—not being able to obtain the dismission of the Dukes of Somerset and Devonshire from the Queen's service, and resolving, to participate no longer in any councils to which those great Whig Peers were admitted. The seals were given to Mr. Harley, and at the same time Mr. St. John was made secretary at war. The key of chamberlain also was at this period taken from Lord Jersey, and transferred to the Earl of Kent. These changes were however far from giving entire satisfaction to the zealous Whigs, while they still saw such men as the Marquis of Normandy, Sir Nathan Wright, and Sir Charles Hedges, in possession of some of the highest offices of the state.

In January, Count Wrattislau, the imperial ambassador, presented a memorial to the British court, in which he represented the alarming and dangerous situation to which the Emperor and the empire were reduced in consequence of the rapid success of the French arms in Germany, and the defection of the Elector of Bavaria, who had entered into a strict confederacy with France; had joined the armies of that monarchy with all his forces; seized the cities of Augsburg, Ulm, and Passau, and threatened to attack even the imperial capital of Vienna itself. The Emperor therefore implored the aid and protection of the Queen and people of England to save the Roman empire from impending ruin. This application was not made in vain. The Duke of Marlborough, on his arrival at the Hague, represented to the States the necessity of making a powerful effort for the relief of the empire; and proposed, that, as the frontier of Holland was now perfectly secure, he should be permitted to march with the grand confederate army to the banks of the Moselle, there to fix the seat of the war. The consent of the States having been with some difficulty procured, the proposed movement towards the Moselle took place. M. de Villeroy, attempted to follow the English general in his first marches, but was soon left at a great distance. Marechal Tallard, to whom the defence of the Moselle was entrusted, apprehending Traerbach to be in danger, and that the Duke's intentions were to penetrate into France on that side, took no steps to obstruct his Grace's farther progress to the east. To the amazement, however, not only of the French Generals, to whom the Duke's movements were wholly incomprehensible, but of all Europe, whose attention was now fixed on this interesting scene, the allied army passed the Rhine, May 26th, and in a few days after the Mayne and the Necke. On his arrival at Ladenburg, June 3d, he thought proper to throw off the mask; and he wrote from thence a letter to the States, acquainting them that he had received orders from the Queen to adopt the most vigorous measures to deliver the empire from the oppression of France—that for this purpose he was proceeding on his march to the Danube; and he hoped their high mightinesses would not hesitate to allow their troops to share in the glory of this enterprise. The States, finding it impracticable to recede, complied with a good grace, and immediately dispatched a courier to inform the Duke, that his design met with their unanimous approbation—that they entrusted their troops entirely to his disposal, placing the most perfect reliance on his Grace's skill, experience, and discretion. The Duke now proceeded on his expedition; and at Mildenheim he had an interview with Prince Eugene, with whom he arranged the future plan of operations. On the 1st of July, the Duke, having been joined by the imperial army under the Prince of Baden, came in sight of the lines of Schellenburg, in which the flower of the Bavarian troops lay strongly entrenched, near the town of Donavert, on the banks of the Danube. Early the next morning the English and imperial generals resolved on the attack, and leading on their respective armies with a spirit of emulation, the English and Dutch commencing the action, and being supported by the Germans, after a gallant resistance, in which the Prince of Baden was slightly wounded, general Count Stirum, mortally, and many other officers, the lines were forced with great slaughter, and Donavert immediately surrendered at discretion. But this success, though brilliant, was lost in the splendor of the subsequent victory. The Elector of Bavaria obstinately refusing to listen to terms of accommodation, though he saw the country desolated around him to the very gates of Munich; and having been joined by M. Tallard, who had with great danger and difficulty traversed the immense forests of Suabia with a view to his relief;

* It is necessary to remark, that this ancient branch of the papal, and, since the æra of the reformation, of the royal revenue, had never been regularly paid into the royal treasury; but, being collected by the Bishops, was set apart as a fund on which to make assignments to court favourites—the Earl of Sunderland at this very period enjoying a pension of 2000*l.* per annum for two lives, payable out of the same.

it

it was resolved by the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene—the Prince of Baden being occupied in the siege of Ingolstadt—to engage (August 13) the combined armies of French and Bavarians, then posted near the village of Blenheim. The enemy were very advantageously encamped on a rising ground; their right flank was covered by the Danube and the village of Blenheim, into which the Marechal had thrown a great body of his best troops; their left wing, commanded by Marechal Marsin and the Elector, in person, was protected by the village of Lutzingen and the adjoining woods; and they had in front of the camp a rivulet, whose banks were steep and the bottom marshy. The battle began with an attempt upon the fortified post of Blenheim by some battalions of English infantry who formed a van guard; but, though vigorously supported, they were compelled, after performing prodigies of valour, to retreat with the loss of one third of their numbers, amongst whom was the gallant Brigadier Rowe their commander. The Duke of Marlborough, perceiving that the village could not be carried without a vast effusion of blood, ordered a detachment to take possession of the defiles leading thereto, by which means the troops inclosed in the village were rendered useless. On the common occasion this repulse might have been construed into a defeat; but upon the present it operated only as a stimulus to greater exertions. As it had been determined that the Duke of Marlborough should command the attack against Marshal Tallard, about noon the left wing of the allied army passed the rivulet without molestation, and drew up in order of battle on the other side. So unaccountably supine, or so inexcusably presumptuous, were the French commanders on this occasion, that they suffered even the second line of cavalry to form without descending from the heights of which they were in possession, into the meadows, which occupied the interval between the camp and the rivulet. On being informed that the allies were throwing bridges over different parts of the stream, M. Tallard disdainfully replied, "If they have not pontoons enough, I will lend them some." The allies now ascending the hill in a firm compact body, the enemy advanced with great spirit and resolution, and a furious and bloody contest ensued. The centre of the French army having been extremely weakened in consequence of the great force stationed at Blenheim, they were at length overpowered; and giving way on all sides in extreme confusion, M. Tallard made an effort to gain the bridge thrown over the Danube, between Blenheim and Hochstedt; but, being closely pursued, vast numbers were either killed or forced into the river, and the Marechal himself was made a prisoner. The troops inclosed in the village of Blenheim, being now left destitute of support, were obliged to surrender at discretion. On the right, where Prince Eugene commanded, though the success was not so decisive, the Elector and M. Marsin were compelled, after a severe conflict, to retreat in confusion, and with very great loss; and upon the whole, this has always been considered as one of the most complete and important victories ever gained. Exclusively of the prodigious carnage during the heat of the action; seventy entire squadrons and battalions were either captured at Blenheim or drowned in the Danube; and the shattered remains of their army, after the loss of 40,000 veteran troops, were utterly incapable of making head against the victors. This day entirely changed the aspect of affairs in Europe.*

The Elector of Bavaria, at the head of a small body of troops, effected a retreat, or rather made his escape, and joined Marechal Villeroi in Flanders, leaving the electorate at the mercy of the conquerors; on his way he met the Elector of Cologne, his brother, driven also from his dominions, and they had the sad satisfaction of embracing and mingling their tears together. After reducing Ingoldstadt and the other fortresses of the Duchy, the imperial and allied army gloriously concluded the campaign with the sieges of Landau, Triers, and Traerbach. In the month of December, the Duke of Marlborough returned in triumph to England, where he was received with joy unparalleled.

King Charles's presence in Portugal did not produce the effects expected from it; and nothing but weakness and confusion seemed to pervade the councils of the court of Lisbon. The English and Dutch auxiliaries arrived early in the spring; but no preparations had been made for taking the field; and the Duke of Schomberg, General of the British forces, saw them with astonishment and indignation distributed among the frontier garrisons. The Duke of Berwick, who commanded for Philip V. the reigning monarch, entering Portugal in the month of May, reduced with little difficulty the towns of Sogura, Salvaterra, Cebreros, &c. The Marquis of Villa-Darias, at the head of another army, penetrated into that kingdom by a different route leading directly to the metropolis, which seemed exposed to extreme danger. Passing the Tagus, the Duke of Berwick, now joined by Philip, invested Portalegre, and afterwards Castel-Davide, both of which surrendered at discretion. A faint attempt was made to relieve the latter by the Marquis das Minas, who had drawn together, after long delay, something like the appearance of an army, the Kings of Portugal and Spain accompanying him in person. The intense heat of the weather, and not the resistance of the Portuguese, at length compelled the Spanish General to send his wearied troops into quarters of refreshment; and King Philip returned to Madrid. The Duke of Schomberg was now superseded in the command by the Earl of Galway, who carried with him large re-inforcements; and, in September, the Kings of Spain and Portugal joined the Earl, then encamped near Almeida.

In the course of the present summer, Sir George Rooke, appearing before Barcelona, sent a flag of truce with a letter from the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt, formerly viceroy of Catalonia, who was on board the fleet, to the governor Don Francisco de Velasco, summoning him to surrender the town to his lawful sovereign King Charles III. The city was known to be well affected to the Austrian interests, yet the governor returned a

* The danger and difficulty of this attack, on a superior army thus advantageously posted, was represented to the Duke in strong colours by several of the general officers. But he told them, he had weighed these objections in his mind, and he foresaw that inaction would be no less fatal than defeat—the empire was not to be saved without effort, and the attempt, however hazardous, was necessary. Perceiving the crisis to which matters had now arrived, knowing the fate of Europe to be depending, and inflamed with that enthusiastic love and ambition of glory which constitute the hero, he had determined to conquer or to die. On the eve of the battle he had, agreeably to that regard to religion which was a remarkable trait in his character, devoted himself to the Almighty in the presence of his Chaplain, and received the holy sacrament; and in the morning he was observed to be inspired with an extraordinary cheerfulness and alacrity, which diffused itself over the whole confederate army, who marched as in confidence of victory. The most singular part of this business was the unconditional surrender of the forty battalions and squadrons posted at Bleinheim, and commanded by M. Clerambault, an officer of great reputed skill and courage. The encomiums bestowed on the Duke of Marlborough in consequence of this victory, were unbounded and universal; and no one was more eager to do justice to his unrivalled merit than Prince Eugene, who pretended only to the second honours of the day. In the letter of congratulation written to the Duke by the States General, their high mightinesses declare, "that they never durst carry their hopes so far as to think of so glorious and complete a victory: they style it a day whose glory might have been envied by the greatest captains of past ages, and whose memory will endure through all ages to come:" and in their subsequent epistle to the Queen, they acknowledge "that it was the bravery of the English troops that principally contributed to the victory—and that the Duke of Marlborough had reaped laurels that could never fade." The Emperor, who, previously to this glorious event, was reduced to a state of extreme peril, pressed by the Bavarian forces on the one side and the Hungarian insurgents on the other, wrote to the Duke a letter filled with the warmest acknowledgments. After mentioning to this nobleman the honours so deservedly conferred upon him by his admission into the college of Princes of the holy Roman empire, his Imperial Majesty declares this to be done, "that it may more and more appear to all the world how much, as I freely own it, I and all the empire owe to the most serene Queen of Great Britain, for having sent her powerful assistance as far as Augsburg and Bavaria itself under your conduct, when my own affairs and those of the empire were so much shaken and disordered by the perfidious defection of the Bavarians.—Past ages having never seen the like victory obtained over the French, it may reasonably be hoped that the full and perfect liberty of the Christian world shall be rescued from the power of France, which was so imminently impending over it."

haughty

haughty refusal, and arrested several of the principal citizens whom he suspected. Returning to Lisbon, in July, Sir George Rooke was joined by Sir Cloudesley Shovel; and in a council of war it was resolved to make a sudden attempt upon the hitherto impregnable fortress of Gibraltar. After a furious cannonade, in which 15,000 shot were in a few hours fired into the town, the boats of the fleet were armed, and landed upon the Peninsula; and a redoubt half-way between the mole and the town being taken by storm, the governor capitulated. This unwelcome intelligence had no sooner reached Madrid, than the Marquis de Villa-Darias was detached with a large body of troops to retake this important fortress. Having furnished it with the necessary supplies for a vigorous defence, Sir George Rooke, sailing again into the Mediterranean in conjunction with the Dutch Admiral Callemberg, met off Malaga, August the 13th, (O. S.) the French fleet under the Count de Toulouse, consisting of about fifty sail of the line. A fierce and bloody encounter ensued, which lasted from ten in the morning till sunset. No vessel on either side was captured or sunk; but the French suffered much in the action, and bore away in the night for Toulon, so disabled as to render it impossible to put to sea again for the season.* Sir George Rooke soon afterwards returned to England, leaving Sir John Leake with a strong squadron to defend the coasts of Portugal. All the efforts of the Count de Villa-Darias to recover Gibraltar, being found ineffectual, the Marquis de Tesse was sent from France to supersede him in the command, but with no better success. The Prince of Hesse defended the place with undaunted valour; and after a close investment by sea and land for six months, the siege was finally raised in consequence of the defeat of the French squadron, cruising off the bay under M. de Pointis, by Sir John Leake.

Subsequently to the recess of the Scotch Parliament, in the summer of 1702, various changes took place favourable to the views of the party then absolute in England. The Earls of Marchmont, Melville, Selkirk, Hyndford, and Leven, were displaced, and the Earl of Seafield constituted Chancellor, the Marquis of Annandale, president, the Marquis of Athol, Privy Seal, Viscount Tarbat, Secretary of State, and Sir James Murray, Lord Register. The Parliament having been dissolved, and writs issued in the spring of 1703, the Duke of Queensberry was appointed Lord Commissioner. A general proclamation of indemnity having been issued, on the 6th of March, for all treasons committed previously to the month of April, 1702, great numbers of Jacobites were encouraged to return to Scotland from St. Germains and other parts of France; by which means considerable strength accrued to the malcontent faction, which consisted however, of such heterogeneous materials as to render it impossible firmly to unite in any consistent plan of opposition. The new Parliament met May the 6th; and the Lord Commissioner read from the throne the Queen's letter, recommending liberality in their supplies, prudence and unanimity in their resolves; after which, the Duke of Hamilton offered the draught of a bill, recognizing her Majesty's right and title to the crown of Scotland; to which Sir James Stuart the Lord Advocate offered an additional clause, "That it should be treason to question her Majesty's right and title to the crown, or her exercise of the government, from her actual entry to the same." When the act of recognition had passed, the Earl of Hume, who had qualified only since the death of King William, rose, and moved the House for a supply: on which the Marquis Tweeddale said, "that he had an overture to make, which he hoped would, by reason of its importance, be preferred to all other business. This he declared to be for a resolve of Parliament, to proceed in the first place to make such conditions and regulations, to take place after the decease of her Majesty, as should be necessary for the preservation of the national religion and liberty." After a long debate, it was determined, that the overture should have precedence of the motion; upon which the Marquis of Athol offered "An act for the security of the kingdom in case of her Majesty's decease." After the House had made some progress in considering the clauses of this act, it was suggested to be necessary to rescind the second act of the third Parliament of King Charles II. establishing the succession of the crown in the next blood in the royal line, of whatsoever religion; for that, as the law of Scotland then stood, the right of blood, passing over the claims of the court of St. Germains, would inhere in the house of Savoy. The Lord Advocate presented a bill for rescinding the said act accordingly; but it was urged that, all Popish successors being excluded, they would by this repeal virtually decree the succession to the house of Hanover; and it was ordered to lie on the table. The act of security at length passed the House (August 13th) by a majority of 59 voices.† Several weeks of anxious expectation and suspense having elapsed, the Lord Commissioner informed the House, that he was empowered to give the royal assent to all the acts passed during the session, except the act of security. No sooner was this announced, than the members broke out into the most violent invectives—branding the servants of the crown as the slaves of the English ministry, and the calumniators of their country. Some even denied that the right of a negative was inherent in the crown. A vote passed declaring void the commission for treating of an union with England. They persisted in their refusal to grant any supply; and the commissioner urging the defenceless state of the kingdom, and the necessity of supplies for securing the same, he was reminded of the security which had been denied to the nation; and the Earl of Roxburgh declared, "That if there was no other way of supporting the natural and undeniable privilege of Parliament, the friends of their country were resolved to demand justice with their swords in their hands."

An "act for toleration to all Protestants in the exercise of religious worship," presented by the Earl of Strathmore, having been read, a strong representation was offered against it, in the name of the General Assembly, concluding in these words,—"That they were persuaded, that to enact a toleration for those of the episcopal way, which God in his infinite mercy avert! would be to establish iniquity by a law, and would bring upon the promoters thereof, and their families, the dreadful guilt of all those sins and pernicious effects that might ensue thereupon." The bill was consequently lost, the court not chusing to involve itself in a theological quarrel. But the Presbyterians were not content with this odious victory over humanity and justice; for an act subsequently passed, "for preserving the true reformed Protestant religion, and confirming Presbyterian church government and discipline by kirk sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods, and general assemblies, as agreeable to the word of God, and the only government of Christ's church within this kingdom."‡ After a long and tumultuous session, the Lord

* Of the English and Dutch the loss in killed and wounded was computed at near 3000 men, and that of the enemy was supposed to be far greater, including more than 200 officers. Sir Cloudesley Shovel who commanded the van, and fought heroically, declares in his official letter the battle to have been so sharply contested, "that the like never has been, he thinks, in any time."

† This act contained in substance, that on the 20th day after the Queen's decease the estates of Parliament should meet; and that in the intermediate time the executive government should devolve on those members who should be resident in Edinburgh—that no foreigner or "Englishman" should be capable of sitting as a member of the assembly of the estates—that the nomination of a successor should be vested in the assembly or convention—but that the successor so named should not be the successor to the crown of England, unless such conditions of government should be previously settled as should secure the honour of the kingdom, the independence of the crown, the freedom, frequency, and power of Parliament, and the religion, liberty, and trade of the Scottish nation, from "English" or foreign influence.

‡ In another act introduced by the Duke of Argyle, ratifying the acts of the former Parliament, it was declared high treason, by writing or speaking, or any open act or deed, to endeavour to alter or innovate

Lord Commissioner adjourned the Parliament to the 12th of October, 1704.*

The Parliament of Scotland was again convened at Edinburgh, July the 6th, 1704; new counsels having been adopted by the English cabinet. Mr. James Johnston, late Secretary of State for Scotland in the reign of King William, was appointed to the office of Lord Register; and the Marquis of Tweeddale was made High Commissioner in the room of the Duke of Queensberry. The royal letter, framed in terms of remarkable temper and ability, most earnestly recommended the settling of the succession in the Protestant line. No sooner, however, had the session commenced than the Duke of Hamilton presented a resolution, "That this Parliament would not proceed to name a successor to the crown until the Scots had a previous treaty with England in relation to commerce and other concerns." This was supported by the celebrated Fletcher of Saltoun, head of the republicans, who strongly insisted on the hardships and miseries which the Scots had suffered since the union of the two crowns; and the impossibility of meliorating their condition without adopting measures to dissolve a connection which had proved so fatal.

The resolution of the Duke of Hamilton, combined with a motion of the Earl of Rothes, "That the Parliament would immediately proceed to make such limitations and conditions as might be judged proper for rectifying the constitution, and vindicating the sovereignty and independency of the nation," was then carried by a great majority. The former act of security was immediately and unanimously revived; and a supply granted for two months' cess only; at the end of which term it was well understood that the act must receive the royal assent, or the army be disbanded for want of pay. The former of these alternatives being regarded as the less of the two evils, a letter was written to the Queen, signed by all the ministers in Scotland, stating and balancing the arguments on both sides, and concluding with their humble advice to pass the bill. Orders were accordingly sent to the Marquis of Tweeddale, to signify the royal assent. The supplies were immediately granted, and the Lord Commissioner prorogued the Parliament, August the 27th.†

The English Parliament met October the 29th; and the adverse disposition of the two Houses appeared conspicuous in the different strain of their addresses; the Lords invidiously passing over the naval exploits of Sir George Rooke, the hero of the Tories; and the Commons affecting to place the successes in the Mediterranean, and the indecisive battle off Malaga, upon a level with the victories of Schellenburg and Blenheim. Mr. Bromley in a short time moved the House to bring in a bill against occasional conformity; and notwithstanding the opposition of ministers, the motion was carried, and a bill introduced, framed on principles and enforced by penalties as low and moderate as possible. The resistance, however, made against it, even in the Commons, indicated the hopelessness of its passing through the Lords; and it was determined, by its patrons, to annex it to the land tax bill. Upon a division, the tack was rejected by 251 against 134; and the bill was therefore, in its separate form, sent up to the Lords, and read for the first time. On the question for the second reading, the Queen being present, it was negatived by 71 against 50.

The attention of the House was soon transferred to the transactions of the Scotch Parliament during their last session; and the discontented party were loud in their exclamations against the English ministry, for suffering such fatal measures to pass. The House of Lords was much agitated and inflamed; and though Lord Godolphin's friends were too numerous to suffer a direct vote of censure to pass, they agreed to a variety of resolutions, which sufficiently indicated the general resentment and apprehension.‡

Their Lordships also presented an address to the Queen, desiring that speedy and effectual orders might be given for putting the town of Newcastle in a state of defence, and likewise for securing the port of Tinmouth, and for repairing the fortifications of Carlisle and Hull. They also besought her Majesty to cause the militia of the four northern counties to be disciplined and provided with arms and ammunition, and a competent number of regular troops to be stationed upon the borders. To all these particulars the Queen expressed her ready assent; and the course of things seemed rapidly tending to open hostility and war. A bill, founded upon the resolutions of the Lords, was sent down to the Commons, who, though not less enraged, scrupled to pass it, under the fastidious notion of its being a money bill, in consequence of the pecuniary penalties engrafted on it; but they framed a similar bill of their own, which they transmitted to the Lords. The Lords passed the bill without delay, and on the following Christmas-day, 1705, it was to take effect. Lord Godolphin now found himself in a very critical situation; and, forgetful of his Jacobitical principles, he determined to exert himself to accomplish the union of the two crowns.

An address of the House of Commons having recommended to the Queen to consider of some proper means to perpetuate the memory of the great services performed by the Duke of Marlborough, she declared her resolution to bestow upon his grace the honour of Woodstock, with the parks and manors appertaining thereto. A magnificent palace was consequently erected at the public expence, to which the name of Blenheim House was given.

An enquiry at this time took place in the House of Lords relative to various mismanagements in the navy and admiralty departments, which were chiefly under the direction of Sir George Rooke. Twenty-two vessels were employed in cruising with so little success, that three ships, commanded by diligent officers, might have performed more; as was proved by a sort of numerical calculation. Even treachery was suspected; and the Whig interest having obtained the ascendency, Sir George Rooke was dismissed from his offices, and Sir Cloudesley Shovel appointed as his successor. On the 4th of March, the Queen put an end to the session; and on the 5th of April following (1705) the Parliament was dissolved by proclamation.§

vate the claim of right or any article thereof—and consequently that which related to the establishment of Presbyterian government in Scotland. Sixty members voted against this bill; amongst whom to their honour, were several Presbyterians: whilst on the other hand the ministers and their dependents supported the measure—the Lords Athol and Tarbat excepted.

* During the recess, the Marquis of Athol was created a Duke, and Viscount Tarbat, Earl of Cromartie—with a view to prevent their total secession from the court, which thus paid an involuntary homage to their firmness and sincerity. At this period the Queen revived the ancient order of the Thistle, which King William had suffered to fall into disuse.

† After the recess, the Marquis of Tweeddale was advanced to the Chancellorship; the Earls of Seafield and Roxburgh made Secretaries of State; the Earls of Rothes appointed Lord Privy-Seal; the Earls of Selkirk and Belhaven brought into the Treasury; Mr. Baillie of Jervis-wood nominated Treasurer-depute; and various other alterations made, consonant to the ascendency of the Whig interest.

‡ "First, that the Queen be enabled by act of Parliament to nominate commissioners, the former commission having expired, to treat concerning an union with Scotland.

"2dly. That the natives of Scotland should not enjoy the privileges of Englishmen, until an union be effected, or the succession settled as in England.

"3dly. That the bringing of cattle from Scotland into England be prevented.

"4thly. That the Lord High-Admiral be required to issue orders for capturing such Scotch vessels as shall be found trading to the ports of France, or any other of her Majesty's enemies.

"5thly. That the exportation of English wool into Scotland be prohibited."

§ This Parliament was distinguished by the perpetual misunderstandings which prevailed between the two Houses. At the last general election, the vote of one Ashby, an inhabitant of the borough of Aylesbury, being rejected by White, the returning officer, he commenced an action at common law against White, for illegally depriving him of his franchise; and obtained a verdict for damages at the ensuing assizes for the county of Bucks. The court of Queen's Bench, however, being moved to quash all proceeding in this matter, as contrary to the privileges of the House of Commons, the three puisne judges were of opinion "That the verdict could not be sustained." Lord Chief Justice Holt, however, at this time presiding in the court, declared, "That the verdict was both legal and just—that, though the House of Commons possessed a separate and independent

The union of England and Scotland having been finally resolved upon by the English cabinet, the Marquis of Tweeddale, and the Earls of Rothes, Roxburgh, and Selkirk, the Lord of Belhaven, Baillie of Jerviswood, and Mr. James Johnston, were removed from their offices, and the Duke of Queensberry re-instated in the chief management of affairs, under the designation of Lord Privy-Seal. The Earl of Seafield was at the same time again appointed Chancellor; the Marquis of Annandale and the Earl of London were made Secretaries of State; Sir James Murray, Lord Register; and a secret understanding taking place between the new administration and many of the Whigs not connected with the ex-ministers, the Duke of Argyle, a young nobleman already distinguished both by his civil and military talents, head of an illustrious family, zealously attached to the Whig interest, and of great influence and popularity in the kingdom, was appointed High Commissioner to the Scottish Parliament, which met June 28, 1705. The Queen's letter having been read, recommending the succession of the crown in the Protestant line, and setting on foot a treaty of union, as the two principal ends to prevent all differences that might happen between the two kingdoms, it was resolved, on the motion of the Duke of Hamilton, ambiguously expressed, "that the Parliament would not proceed to the nomination of a successor till they had a previous treaty with England in relation to their commerce and other concerns with that nation." This motion, grounded on the precedent of the last year, met with little opposition; and the way was now open for proceeding to the grand business of the session. On the 20th of July, the draught of an act for a treaty, not of commerce merely, but of union, irreversible and indissoluble, was presented, occasioning in its progress very high debates, which continued for several weeks in succession. When it became evident that the act would pass, the Duke of Hamilton moved, that the Queen should have the nomination of the commissioners. On the first hearing of this motion, many of the Jacobite party rushed out of the House, exclaiming aloud, "Betrayed! betrayed!" after which the treaty met with comparatively little opposition. The reason which Hamilton alledged for this measure was, "that as it was impossible to prevent the bill from passing, it was politic to conciliate the favour of the Queen, by complimenting her with the choice of the commissioners." A vote founded on a motion of the Duke of Athol was however agreed upon, that no proceeding should be made in the treaty, till the act which declared the Scots aliens, &c. should be repealed. This business having been settled, the supplies were granted, and the Parliament was adjourned to the 20th of December.

In the month of April, the Duke of Marlborough, now intending to execute the project, respecting which the French were so needlessly apprehensive the preceeding year, (to penetrate into France on the side of the Moselle,) again passed into Holland. Prince Louis of Baden, upon whose co-operation the success of the project depended, had expressed his entire approbation of it; but when all things were in readiness for opening the campaign, he sent an express to the Duke, signifying his inability on account of ill health, and the weakness of his army, to fulfil his engagements. The Duke at length persuaded him, with much difficulty, to resume the original plan of operations; but, after waiting in vain several weeks, he received advice that the Prince of Baden was gone much indisposed to the baths of Schwalbach, and that neither horses nor artillery were provided. At the same time he learned the loss of Huy, and that the Elector of Bavaria and M. Villeroi had actually invested the city of Liege. Perceiving his schemes thus rendered abortive, the Duke resolved immediately to march back to the Maese, though without expressing strong resentment against the Prince of Baden, who was believed to view his successes in the last campaign with envious eyes. On the arrival of the Duke, the face of affairs was immediately changed in the Netherlands. He compelled the enemy to raise the siege of Liege, with little difficulty recaptured Huy, and attacking the French, who had retired within their lines, successfully forced them in their entrenchments, near Tirlemont. In this action, his Grace distinguished himself by extraordinary exertions of personal valour. M. Villeroi and the Elector continued their retreat along the banks of the Dyle, till, separated from the allied army, which pressed upon the rear, only by the small river Ysche, the Duke and M. Auverquerque commanded the troops to form in order of battle. Unexpectedly the field deputies accompanying the Dutch pendent jurisdiction, agreeably to the constitution of Parliament, so far as to determine, in case of appeal, which of the different candidates were duly elected; yet, their authority did not supersede the common course of judicial proceeding in the courts sitting at Westminster, which founded their decision on the known laws of the land and the evidence which came regularly and properly before them: and which neither could nor would take cognizance of the proceedings of the House of Commons, nor of the grounds of their proceedings. Where a legal right existed, "and such," said his Lordship, "is the franchise of an elector, the law, of which the courts of justice are the sole dispensers, will protect him in the enjoyment of that right." The verdict was however reversed, but the cause was by writ of error immediately brought before the House of Lords; who, after requiring the opinion of the twelve judges, and debating the matter at great length, determined almost unanimously to supersede the judgment pronounced in the Queen's bench, and to affirm the verdict originally given at the county assizes. The House of Commons, enraged at these proceedings, declared, "that Matthew Ashby, having, in contempt of the jurisdiction of that House, commenced and prosecuted an action at common law against William White for not receiving his vote at an election for burgess to serve in Parliament for the borough of Aylesbury, was guilty of a high breach of the privileges of that House—and that all attorneys, solicitors, counsellors, and serjeants at law, soliciting, prosecuting, or pleading in any such cause, were guilty of a high breach of the privileges of that House." They ordered these resolutions, signed by the clerk of the House, to be affixed to Westminster-hall gate. So far, however, was the chief justice from being intimidated by this language, that he publicly declared, "that if any messenger of the House of Commons presumed to enter that hall, in order to seize the person of any attorney or pleader by virtue of this warrant, he would immediately commit him to Newgate." The House of Lords, on their part, passed votes justificatory of their own conduct; copies of which were transmitted to all sheriffs and borough-reeves throughout the kingdom. The Commons, finding the general voice of the people declare strongly in favour of their antagonists, seemed disposed to let it rest in its present state; and the judgment of the Lords was duly and regularly executed. Upon this five other inhabitants of the borough of Aylesbury brought their several actions for damages upon the same grounds. This threw the House of Commons into a new ferment; and by their own authority they committed these five men to prison, where they lay three months, without however offering to make any submission. After the money bills had been passed by the Commons, a motion was made in the Queen's Bench, in behalf of the prisoners, for a habeas corpus, and the puisne judges declared themselves of opinion, as before, "that the court could take no cognizance of the matter." The chief justice, however, maintained that a general warrant of commitment for breach of privilege was of the nature of an execution; and as it appeared, upon the face of the warrant itself, that the prisoners had been guilty of no legal offence, unless to claim the benefit of the law in opposition to a vote of the House of Commons were such, it was his opinion that they ought instantly to be discharged. This opinion not availing in opposition to that of the majority of the bench, the prisoners were remanded; in consequence of which they moved for a writ of error, to bring the matter before the Lords. As this could only be obtained by petition to the crown, the Commons presented an address to the Queen, humbly requesting her Majesty, that the writ of error might not be granted; and they also took upon them to affirm, "that in this case no writ of error could lie." The Queen replied, "that she hoped never to give her faithful Commons any just ground of complaint; but to obstruct the course of judicial proceeding was a matter of such importance, that she thought it necessary to weigh and consider carefully what it might be proper for her to do." The Commons received this answer in sullen silence, and immediately ordered the prisoners to be removed from Newgate into the custody of their serjeant at arms, lest they should be discharged in consequence of the Queen's granting a writ of error. They also resolved, that the lawyers who had pleaded in behalf of the prisoners on return of the habeas corpus were guilty of a breach of privilege; and ordered them to be taken into custody. The Lords upon this voted, "that for subjects to claim their just rights, in a course of law, was no breach of privilege—that the imprisonment of the men of Aylesbury was contrary to law—and that the writ of error could not be refused, without a violation of Magna Charta." This was followed by an address to the Queen, humbly beseeching her Majesty to give immediate orders for issuing the writ of error. The judges, now recovering from their terrors, decided, "that a petition for a writ of error was a petition of right, and not of grace." The Queen was pleased to reply to this address, "that she would certainly have complied with their Lordships' request in regard to the writ of error, but that, as it now became necessary to put an end to the session, she knew it could produce no effect." The Lords immediately returned their humble thanks to her Majesty for this instance of her Majesty's regard for the legal and impartial administration of public justice.

army interposed their veto, and could not be induced to hazard a general engagement, which promised, as the Duke said, "all imaginable success." His Grace, in consequence, wrote a warm letter to their high mightinesses, complaining how much less he found his authority in Flanders than when he had the honour of commanding the troops the last year in Germany. The result was, that General Schlangenburg, to whose advice the refractory conduct of the field deputies was attributed, received his dismission. The French and Bavarians having made good their retreat to the strong camp of Parke, which covered Louvaine and Brussels, the projects of the Duke were finally defeated both in Germany and Flanders.*

In Italy, Prince Eugene encountered difficulties from the duc de Vendome. The campaign in Portugal had an auspicious commencement: the siege and vigorous defence of Gibraltar causing a diversion of the Spanish arms, afforded the Portuguese an opportunity of penetrating the Spanish frontier; and something of the spirit of enterprise appeared, notwithstanding the indisposition of Don Pedro the King; during which the Queen dowager of Charles II. of England, (who died on the last day of this year,) the sister of that monarch, who had returned to Portugal soon after the Revolution, was entrusted with the Regency of the kingdom. Towards the end of June, the English fleet, with a large reinforcement of troops on board, under the command of Sir Cloudesley Shovel and the Earl of Peterborough, had arrived at Lisbon; and the Prince of Hesse, who, on the relief of Gibraltar, had repaired also to that metropolis, giving to the Archduke, stiling himself King Charles III. the most positive assurances of the favourable disposition of Catalonia and Valencia; and being strongly seconded by the Earl of Peterborough, a man of great but eccentric talents, the Archduke declared his resolution to try his fortune in that part of Spain. The whole armament, having on board nineteen battalions of infantry and 1300 horse, with a good train of artillery, arrived in the bay of Barcelona August 22, and a landing was effected amidst the acclamation of the Catalans. A determination was taken in a council of war, immediately to lay siege to the city of Barcelona, though the force of the allies was to appearance utterly inadequate to such an enterprize. The principal dependance was on the known disaffection of the inhabitants. Deserters came daily from the town, who brought them much useful intelligence: the most important article was, that fort Monjuic, a castle of great strength, situated on the heights, which in a great measure commanded the town, was very ill guarded. A resolution was consequently taken to attempt it by a coup de main. The Prince of Hesse and the Earl of Peterborough, at the head of a chosen body of troops, after a nocturnal and circuitous march attained the summit of the hill at break of day, September the 7th. At the first onset the Prince of Hesse fell mortally wounded; but the Earl continued the assault with little prospect of success, till, the magazine of powder by some accident suddenly blowing up, the governor in consternation surrendered the fort. The city was now attacked with great advantage; and on the 9th of October the governor consented to capitulate; and the garrison was allowed to march out with all the honours of war. The whole province of Catalonia, the town of Roses excepted, now declared in favour of King Charles III. The kingdom of Valencia rapidly followed the example of Catalonia, Alicant alone retaining its allegiance to King Philip.

On the 25th of October, the new Parliament met at Westminster; and, of 513 members, 457 were present at the choice of a Speaker, which fell on Mr. Smith, (who had occupied the post of Chancellor of the Exchequer in the late reign) in opposition to Mr. Bromley, by 250 against 207 voices. Thus it clearly appeared, to the great joy of the nation, that a Whig Parliament had been elected.†

On the 15th of November, in a committee on the state of the nation, Lord Haversham moved, "that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to invite the presumptive heir to the crown of England, according to the acts of Parliament made for settling the succession to the crown in the Protestant line, into this kingdom, to reside here." This was strongly supported by the Duke of Buckingham, and the Earls of Nottingham and Rochester. In lieu of this measure, so replete, as the Whigs contended, with mischief and danger, the Earl of Wharton moved for a bill establishing an eventual council of Regency, which should be empowered to act on the demise of the Queen, previously to the arrival of the successor; and the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Privy-Seal, the Lord High Admiral, and the Lord Chief Justice of England, for the time being, were nominated for that high trust. The successor was also authorised, to send over an instrument sealed up, containing the name of such persons as he thought proper to join in the same trust as coregents. This bill was received with great applause, and soon passed, with slight opposition, into a law. Another act endowed the electoral family with all the privileges of naturalization, rendered yet more valuable, or at least more honourable, by the singular distinction of its extending to all the descendants of the Princess Sophia wheresoever born. The conduct of the Tories, in their opposition to the act of Regency, conduced greatly to the Queen's cordial reconciliation with the Whigs.‡

Her Majesty having laid before the two Houses the addresses of the Scotch Parliament, expressive of their resolution not to enter into any negotiation respecting a union with England, until the act declaring them aliens, &c. should be repealed; a motion for that purpose was accordingly made, and unanimously acceded to.

The "danger of the church," had been much used, of late, by the Tories, as the watch-word of the party; in consequence of which Lord Halifax moved to appoint a day to enquire into the grounds of this pretended danger. A violent debate ensued; in the course of which, the Earl of Rochester affirmed, that the danger of the church arose from three causes:

1st. The act of security, by which Scotland, where presbytery was established without a toleration, was rendered very formidable and dangerous.

2dly. The Protestant heir not being resident in the kingdom;—and 3dly. The not passing the occasional conformity bill.

* This year, in the month of May, died the Emperor Leopold, who had experienced, during his long reign, frequent and wonderful vicissitudes of fortune. He was succeeded by his son Joseph, King of the Romans, who inherited, with the imperial diadem, all his father's weakness, pride, bigotry, and hatred of heresy. The Duke of Marlborough, with whom the new Emperor declared himself desirous to confer, arrived at Vienna November 12, where he was received with the highest distinction, and invested with the dignity of a co-estate of the empire—the Lordship of Mindelheim, in the circle of Suabia, being erected into a principality, and assigned to him in reward of his great services. He then visited the courts of Berlin and Hanover, as in the preceding year, and arrived in London on the 30th of December.

† Some months previously to the meeting of the new Parliament, the Duke of Buckingham, late Marquis of Normandy, had been dismissed from his office of Lord Privy Seal, which was conferred upon the Duke of Newcastle; and more recently the great seal had been taken from Nathan Wright, Lord Keeper, and given to Mr. William Cowper, soon after created Lord Cowper—a lawyer very eminent in his profession, and zealously attached to the Whig principles of 1688. The Duke of Ormond was also in the ensuing spring superseded in the government of Ireland by the Earl of Pembroke.

‡ The Princess Sophia, now 75 years of age, but unimpaired in health, vivacity, and intellect, would have had no objection, it appears, to accept an invitation to fix her residence in England—in which case it was understood that a royal appanage, and the title of Princess of Wales, would have been conferred upon her. She even wrote a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, one of the few Whigs who supported the motion of Lord Haversham, expressing her suspicions of some who had been numbered amongst the friends of her family, for the part they had taken in opposition to it. The Earl of Halifax being sent to Hanover with the two acts of regency and naturalization, the Duke of Marlborough, and the Lords Cowper and Somers, &c. wrote letters to the electoral court in vindication of their late conduct, which appear to have given complete satisfaction. The order of the Garter was also presented to the electoral Prince by Lord Halifax, accompanied by a gracious declaration of the royal favour to the house of Hanover.

Lord Halifax replied, "that the act of security in Scotland was a national thing, wholly foreign to church affairs; that, however inimical the church or the kingdom of Scotland might be supposed, England was at all times able to defend herself; and at present more so than at any former period—the strength of England having increased since the union of the two crowns, much more in proportion than that of Scotland; but that, by God's blessing, an entire union of the British nations was soon likely to put an end to this source of danger. As to the House of Hanover, he said, that was a danger but of eight days standing; for a fortnight ago no one dreamed that the absence of the Princess Sophia was cause of danger to the church. With regard to the occasional conformity bill, that matter had been recently canvassed, and the opinion of the House was already formed, that such a bill would not prove of any advantage or security to the church, but rather the reverse. On a division, it was carried by a majority of 61 against 30, "that the church of England, as by law established, which was rescued from the extremest danger by King William III. of glorious memory, is now in a most safe and flourishing condition, &c." The resolution of the Lords having been agreed to by the Commons on a division of 212 against 160, an address to the same effect was presented to the Queen, who declared her satisfaction to find both Houses so ready to join with her in suppressing so indecent an outcry.* On the 19th of March, the Queen came to the House of Peers, and, with many gracious expressions, closed the session.

Her Majesty now again appointed commissioners on each side to treat upon the great business of the union of the kingdoms, who met for the first time on the 16th of April, (1706,) at Whitehall. The Scotch commissioners had entertained the idea of a federal union, like that of the United Provinces, or of the cantons of Switzerland; but the English had determined to treat only concerning an incorporating union, which should consolidate all national interests. The Queen twice appeared amongst the commissioners, to urge and exhort the speedy conclusion of the treaty; and, on the 23d of July, the articles of the union having been fully completed and agreed upon, were presented to her Majesty at which she expressed the highest satisfaction.†

The French court was emboldened, at the opening of the present campaign, to resume her ancient spirit of military enterprise; and orders were sent to M. Villeroi to act upon the offensive, and risque a general engagement. The French commander consequently passed the Dyle, behind which his army lay strongly entrenched, and took a secure post at Tirlemont; he also advanced the next day, (Whitsunday, May 12,) to Ramillies, where he unexpectedly found his progress stopped by the English General. The disposition of M. Villeroi on this occasion is said to have been grossly deficient in skill and judgment. The village of Ramillies, into which was thrown a great body of troops, fronted the centre of the French infantry; but without any precautions of defence, and at such a distance from the line as to render it incapable of support. The left wing, composed of cavalry, was covered by the Gheet and the impassable marshes that bounded it: the troops, therefore, could neither charge the enemy, nor be charged by them. The right extended to the village of Taniercs on the banks of the Mehaigne, and ought to have been supported by it; but the village itself was guarded by one regiment only of dragoons. The baggage, instead of being removed to the rear, was heaped between the two lines, and materially embarrassed their motions. The Duke of Marlborough, perceiving the left wing of the French army rendered useless, detached a large proportion of his right to reinforce his centre and left, where the stress of the battle must necessarily lie. During this grand movement, M. Villeroi was urged to adjust his order of battle to that which he saw the enemy forming; but nothing could prevail upon him to vary his first disposition, though five hours were employed in the necessary evolutions on the part of the allies. The event justified the prediction of M. Gassion, the Lieutenant General of the French army, who had exclaimed to the Commander-in-Chief—"You are lost if you do not change your order of battle!" The troops posted precisely as the enemy could wish, having no confidence in their General, and overpowered by numbers, were speedily routed, and a complete victory was obtained with inconsiderable loss. The Duke of Marlborough was nevertheless exposed to the utmost personal danger, being thrown with violence from his horse while charging at the head of his squadrons, and with difficulty rescued from the enemy; after which, a cannon-ball took off the head of Colonel Bringfield, his gentleman of the horse, as he was holding the Duke's stirrup to remount. M. Villeroi lost his whole train of artillery, most of his baggage, 120 standards, and about 18 or 20,000 men, killed, wounded, prisoners, or deserters. The Marechal and the Elector of Bavaria, who displayed much personal courage in the action, with the broken remains of their army, continued their flight beyond the Dyle, till they reached Louvaine; where having held by torch-light in the market-place a council of war, they resolved to abandon that place, and retire towards Brussels: whence the Elector first found an interval of leisure to announce to the French King this unfortunate event, which he ascribed to a fatality beyond example. The consternation occasioned by this great victory extended even to Paris; and the Duc de Vendome was in haste recalled from Italy to take the command of the army in Flanders. M. Villeroi, on his subsequent arrival at Versailles, expected to be received with resentment and reproach; but Louis, with whom he had ever been a favourite, gave him a cordial and gracious welcome, observing only, "Fortune you know, M. le Duc, is a female, and you and I are now too old to expect her favours." The English commander followed the dispersed and disheartened enemy by rapid marches, and received on the 26th of May the submission of the States of Brabant. On the 28th the Duke marched in great military pomp into the city of Brussels, and was received with all the external demonstrations of joy. Louvaine, Mechlin, Ghent, and Bruges, surrendered on the first summons; and, what was still more surprising, Oudenard capitulated on the

* The Upper House of convocation having prepared an address to the throne in terms of loyal affection, and expressing their indignation at the suggestion that the church was in danger under her Majesty's administration, the Lower House refused either to concur, or to state their exceptions. Much altercation ensued, which terminated in a secession of about one third of the members of the Lower House. At length the Queen sent a letter to the Archbishop, dated February the 25th (1706,) in which she expressed her surprise that the differences in convocation were still kept up—and intimated her dislike of divisions and innovations. She declared her resolution to maintain her supremacy, and the due subordination of Presbyters to Bishops as a fundamental part of the ecclesiastical constitution; and she required the Archbishop, after communicating this resolution to the Bishops and clergy, to prorogue the convocation to such time as appeared most convenient. The high church party submitted to the prorogation with great resentment and reluctance; as a violation of their pretended right to continue their sitting during the session of Parliament.

† Lord Somers was believed to have had the chief share in framing this treaty, which was in many respects highly advantageous to Scotland, though in some points it seemed to derogate from her national dignity and independence. When four shillings in the pound land tax, amounting to the sum of two millions, were levied in England, Scotland was to be assessed at the rate of 48,000*l.* only. On the other hand, the peerage of Scotland were divested of their privilege of sitting as Lords of Parliament, and the whole body was in future to be represented by sixteen Peers elected by themselves; and the Commons by 45 members chosen by the country. Scotland was rendered liable to the same duties of customs and excise with England; and a part of these being mortgaged for the payment of the principal or interest of the public debt of England, the sum of 398,000*l.* was paid to Scotland as an equivalent for her share of the same, to be applied to a re-coinage of the public moneys, to the payment of the Scotch national debt, to indemnify the Darien company for their losses, in consideration of the dissolution of the same, and the encouragement of the infant manufactures of the kingdom. Trade was to be free over all the island, and to the plantations: private rights were to be preserved; and the judicatories and laws of Scotland were to be continued. Finally, the two nations were to the end of time to constitute one kingdom, under the same succession to the crown, and united under one legislature. There was no provision in the treaty respecting religion—agreeably to an express limitation in the powers granted to the commissioners by the Parliaments of both kingdoms. These were the chief and leading articles of this memorable treaty—the first of the kind upon record.

mere condition of the garrison being allowed to retire to Mons.—"The hand of God," says the Duke, "appears visibly in all this, striking the enemy with such a terror as obliges them to deliver up so many strong places and large countries without offering the least resistance." Two leagues from Antwerp the Duke was met by the Bishop and clergy, accompanied by the magistracy of that city, who, on presenting its keys, declared that they had never been delivered to any person since the great Duke of Parma. The Marquis of Terracena, grandee of Spain, and governor of Antwerp, declaring for King Charles, nearly the whole garrison, consisting of six French and six Spanish battalions, followed his example, and the States of Flanders formally recognized the title of that monarch. Courtray was taken possion of early in July, and the Elector of Bavaria, who then resided at Mons, retreated with precipitation to Valenciennes. The arrival of the Duc de Vendome seemed at length to restore something like order, and to re-animate in some measure the drooping courage of the French. The Governor of Dendermond had the merit, in the midst of the general consternation, to declare, in answer to the summons which he had received, that he hoped to deserve the esteem of the English commander by discharging his duty, and the trust reposed in him; and after sustaining a blockade of three months, he did not at last surrender till besieged in form and reduced to extremity. At the latter end of June, Ostend was invested by Field-Marshal Auverquerque, and at the same time attacked on the sea-side by an English squadron commanded by Sir Stafford Fairborne. It held out not more than ten days, and four days only after the batteries were opened. On the other hand, the town of Menin disputed all the efforts of the besiegers with extraordinary vigour; and it was not till after a fierce and bloody action, and till the fortifications had been reduced to a heap of ruins, and the garrison diminished to a third of their original number, that the place finally capitulated, its brave defenders being allowed to march with the honours of war through the breach. The campaign closed with the siege and capture of Aeth, which surrendered on the 1st of October, the Duke of Marlborough in person commanding the covering army. Leaving the army under the command of M. Auverquerque, at the latter end of October, his Grace repaired by the route of Brussels and Antwerp to the Hague, and thence to London.

Philip, King of Spain, had assembled a great army early in the spring, with which, on being joined by the French auxiliaries under M. de Tesse, he appeared suddenly before Barcelona, where the rival monarch kept his court, and in a short time formed the investment of that important place by land, while the count de Toulouse blockaded it by sea. The Earl of Peterborough, who flew from Valencia to its relief, made incredible efforts to save this capital; but all his exertions would have been unavailing, had it not been for the critical arrival of the English fleet under Sir John Leake, May the 8th, 1706; on the first appearance of which the Count de Toulouse retired to Toulon; and M. de Tesse, raising the siege in much disorder, retreated with a dispirited and nearly ruined army beyond the mountains.*

Lord Peterborough now urged the necessity of immediately proceeding to Madrid, to form a junction with the Portuguese army under the Marquis Das Minas and the Earl of Galway, who, after capturing the towns of Alcantara, and Cuidad Rodrigo, had marched to that capital, of which on the 24th of June they took quiet and peaceable possession. The decisive counsels of the English General, happily for Spain, were disregarded by the Archduke; Charles lingering near three months in Catalonia and Arragon—thus allowing his rival full time to recruit his shattered forces, and to receive additional succours from France; and on his reapproach to the capital, the Portuguese army, dispirited by inaction, suspense, and disappointment, retreated towards Arragon, where they formed a tardy and ineffectual junction with the imperialists. Lord Peterborough, enraged to perceive his expostulations fruitless, withdrew in disgust, and without leave sailed in one of the Queen's ships for Genoa.†

The success of the allied arms in Italy was scarcely inferior to those in Flanders.‡ On the banks of the Rhine alone, where M. Villars commanded with superior strength against the Prince of Baden, did fortune seem disposed to be more favourable to France. The imperialists were compelled to abandon the posts they held on the western side of that great river; to raise the siege of Fort Louis; and they were even forced from the lines they occupied at Buhl, near Stolhoffen, celebrated both for their natural and artificial strength.

During the autumn, advances were made by the King of France, for obtaining peace. The Elector of Bavaria wrote, by his direction, a letter to the Duke of Marlborough, proposing conferences to be held for that purpose, at some spot between the two camps, and, after the separation of the two armies, at any place between Mons and Brussels. This proposal having been rejected, the King of France next applied to the Pope to interpose his good offices, and left it to the arbitration of his holiness to satisfy the rights and demands of the Emperor—specifically offering the Milanese, Naples, Sicily, and Sardinia, with a barrier for Holland; all which propositions were refused with disdain by the court of Vienna, which insisted on nothing less than the dethronement of Philip, and the renunciation of the whole Spanish sovereignty.

On the 3d of October, the Parliament of Scotland was convened for the last time at Edinburgh, the Duke of Queensberry opening the session with unusual state and magnificence. Her Majesty's letter announced that the articles of the treaty of union had been agreed upon by the commissioners appointed for that purpose, and recommended their adoption, "as the only effectual way to secure their present and future happiness, and to disappoint the designs of her and their enemies, who would doubtless on this occasion use their utmost endeavours to prevent or delay this union, which must so contribute to her glory and the happiness of her people." The accomplishment of this treaty was the death blow to the hopes of the court of St. Germains; yet the delusive idea was cherished, that the English ministers entertained amicable intentions respecting the exiled family. The French King, shewed no inclination, and even declared his total inability, to engage in any hostile enterprise against Britain. All that the court of St. Germains therefore could do, was to send over to Scotland, in compliance with the commendation of M. Chamillart the French minister, Colonel Hooke, a man of sense and experience, to acquire on the spot a perfect knowledge of the state of things.*

* An almost total eclipse of the sun, which happened on that day, afforded occasion for much sarcastic and much superstitious reflection—the sun being the chosen device of the French monarch, whose ostentatious motto was "Nec pluribus impar."—Not an unequal match for numbers.

† The chief reason assigned for the fatal lapse of time during the weeks wasted at Saragossa, was the inability of his Majesty to make his public entry into Madrid with the requisite magnificence: to which General Stanhope with warmth replied, "that King William, when he made his descent upon England, went to London attended only by a few dragoons, otherwise he had lost his crown."

‡ The Duke of Savoy, who had acceded to the grand alliance in the expectation of being powerfully supported by the Emperor, seemed abandoned to his fate, which his resolution and courage served only to protract, but could not avert. Overpowered by the superior force and great military talents of his antagonist, he was at length reduced to take refuge in his capital of Turin, where, on the recall of the Duc de Vendome, he was closely besieged by the French army under Marechal de Marsin, and the Duke of Orleans, nephew of Louis XIV. The Imperial court, determining to make one grand effort effectually to aid the Duke of Savoy in this extremity, directed Prince Eugene at the head of a powerful army to march to the relief of Turin. With such ability and success did that commander execute this important commission, that, after surmounting all the numerous difficulties which obstructed his junction with the Duke, and passing the Adige and the Po in the sight of the Duc de Vendome, he attacked the French army in their entrenchments before Turin, and gained a glorious and decisive victory—the unfortunate Marechal Marsin falling in the action. The Duke of Orleans was wounded and carried off the field; the lines were forced in all quarters; and the French army was put completely to the rout, and all the baggage, provisions, ammunition, and military-chest, fell into the hands of the conquerors. This event was quickly followed by the final expulsion of the French from Lombardy—a treaty of evacuation being concluded between France and the Emperor, in consequence of which a large body of troops were left at liberty to act in Spain or elsewhere.

Upon the whole, the Jacobites determined to exert themselves to the utmost in opposition to the treaty of union; and in this design they were, from motives very different, seconded by the old republican party, headed by Fletcher of Saltoun.† On the other hand, the Marquis of Tweeddale, and those who adhered to that distinguished nobleman, notwithstanding their recent dismission from office, still preserved a good understanding with the court; and, perceiving matters had arrived at a crisis, they probably thought that they consulted the welfare of their country, as well as their private interest, in throwing their whole weight into the scale of government. That dangerous clause in the act of security, authorising all the Protestant heritors and the burghers to provide arms, and to discipline and exercise their fencible men, was suspended by the Scottish Parliament at the commencement of the treaty of union, and the lieges were prohibited from assembling on any pretence, during the session;—a wise and necessary measure, by which the chieftains, who were adverse to the union, and preparing force to oppose it, were suddenly and effectually restrained. The Duke of Queensberry discovered also much political dexterity and address in gaining over the leaders of the Cameronians, and other disaffected clans. The debates of the Scotch Parliament on this occasion were, both in argument and eloquence, equal perhaps to those of any public assembly whose transactions have been the subject of historic record. Every consideration of honour, interest and safety, which can touch the human heart, or awaken the dormant passions of the soul, was urged by the members in opposition to deter the House from the adoption of this project. Such, indeed, was the violence with which the treaty was opposed, and such the commotion which it excited in the kingdom, that the Duke of Queensberry absolutely despaired of success, and was desirous of adjourning the Parliament, till by time and management he should be able to obviate those formidable difficulties. But the Lord Treasurer Godolphin, who saw that the measure would be lost by delay, urged him to persist in his exertions; which were at length crowned with success. The Duke of Athol, and the opposition in general, had resolved to have recourse to a forcible dissolution of Parliament: but their designs were rendered abortive by the irresolution or treachery of Hamilton, whose conduct was altogether inconsequential and indecisive.‡

The commissioners having been expressly restrained from treating of the subject of religion, an act was preparing for securing the Presbyterian government of the church of Scotland. Exclusively of the methods used to allay the popular resentment, and the sacrifices made to national prejudice, other means were adopted to facilitate the final passing of the act of union. The sum of 20,000*l.*, and upwards was remitted at the present juncture to Scotland, and distributed so judiciously, that the rage of opposition suddenly subsided, and the treaty received, without any material alteration, the solemn sanction of the Scotch Parliament; the general question being carried by a majority of 110 voices. On the 25th of March, the Parliament was adjourned, never to meet again.

The English Parliament had met on the 3d of December, 1706, and voted liberal supplies for carrying on the war; but nothing material occurred till the 28th of January, when the Queen came to the House of Peers, and announced that the treaty of union had been ratified by the Parliament of Scotland. The treaty itself, and the proceedings relative to it, being laid before the House of Peers, their Lordships, on the motion of the Archbishop of Canterbury, ordered a bill to be brought in for the security of the church of England; which speedily passed both Houses, and received the royal assent. On the 4th of February, the House of Commons, in a grand committee, took into consideration the articles of the union as ratified by the Scottish Parliament; on the 15th of the same month, they were submitted to the Lords; and, having been approved, a bill founded thereon passed triumphantly through both Houses, and received the royal assent.§ The Parliament was prorogued on the 30th of April; and on the succeeding day, the two nations of England and Scotland were indissolubly incorporated into one kingdom—ever afterwards to be known by the appellation of Great Britain. On this occasion, congratulatory addresses were sent up from all parts of England; and the 1st of May was celebrated by a public thanksgiving in all the churches. Scotland, however, observed a sullen and expressive silence; and the day was kept in many parts of that kingdom as a day of fasting and humiliation, indicating the idea entertained of the union with England, as a judgment inflicted upon them by Divine Providence.‖

A. D. 1707.] In the spring of the present year, the Duke of Marlborough was invested with a very important embassy to the King of Sweden. That monarch, after

* The Colonel was furnished by the two courts of St. Germains and Versailles with ample instructions, and a formal declaration on the part of the former, to be published at the proper period, proclaiming "the resolution of his Majesty King James VIII. to repair to his kingdom of Scotland in order to assert his undoubted right, and to deliver all his good subjects from the oppression and tyranny they had groaned under for above eighteen years past." And the Colonel was expressly authorized and commissioned to represent to them "the necessity of laying hold of this opportunity of vindicating the sovereign's right, and their own privileges and independency, which, if neglected, may never be retrieved." But in the paper signed by M. Chamillart it is "particularly recommended to Colonel Hooke, not to engage his Most Christian Majesty in expences which he cannot conveniently support, nor give them any room to hope for more than he can furnish."

† The leaders of the Jacobites were the Dukes of Hamilton, Gordon, and Athol, the Marquis of Annandale, the Earls of Errol, Marischal, and Belhaven, &c. Of these the Duke of Hamilton was universally considered as the chief in point of power, influence, and popularity; and, being descended by the female line from the House of Stuart, to which the House of Hamilton was regarded in Scotland as next in the order of succession, a gleam of royalty opened upon his mind, and he was suspected, not without reason, of aspiring to the vacant throne, if by any means the claims of the rival courts of St. Germains and Hanover could be superseded.

‡ After urging the party in opposition not to look back upon what might have been done amiss, but now at last to unite their efforts to save the nation, which stood on the brink of ruin, he proposed at a general meeting a daring protestation against the union, which, he said, "if the English did not desist from prosecuting, they must have recourse to arms, and call over the King." All who were present expressed their concurrence; and a day being fixed for presenting the protestation, the Duke pretended to be taken ill. In consequence, however, of the expostulations of his friends on his ambiguous and fluctuating conduct, he was prevailed upon to go to the Parliament House; but being there seized with another paroxysm of terror, he absolutely refused to present the protestation, and promised only to be the first adherer. The Duke of Athol therefore undertook the office of presenting the protest, which declared "an incorporating union of the two nations to be contrary to the honour, interest, and fundamental laws and constitution of Scotland; and in particular to the act of the 8th of James VI. by which it is ordained that none of the lieges presume to impugn the dignity and authority of the three estates of Parliament; and also to the act of the 1st of her present Majesty, by which it is declared high treason by any open act or deed to alter or innovate the claim of right."

§ When the question of the union was about to come under the consideration of the English Parliament, a committee was named by the Lower House of Convocation to consider the present "danger of the church;" but, to prevent an interference so subversive of the public welfare and repose, a prorogation immediately took place; and the Queen, by advice of her ministers, determined to discontinue the sittings of this factious assembly. During the remainder of this and the whole of the next Parliament, the convocation was prorogued from time to time, and not suffered to enter upon business.

‖ Many promotions took place at this period. The Marquis of Montrose and the Earl of Roxburgh were created Dukes in Scotland; Lord Cowper was declared Lord High Chancellor; the Earl of Stamford, First Lord of Trade, &c. A more remarkable change had been made in the course of the session by the dismission of Sir Charles Hedges, Secretary of State, and the transfer of the seals to the Earl of Sunderland, who had lately succeeded to that title on the death of his father, and who was nearly allied to the Duke of Marlborough by marriage with his second daughter. This promotion seemed favourable to the interest and influence of the Whigs, but it proved otherwise. The Queen parted from Sir Charles Hedges, with extreme reluctance, and she retained a permanent resentment of the force and constraint which she acted under upon this occasion. In October the Duke of Marlborough had written to the Duchess to urge this matter upon the Queen; which she did in a style of singular insolence. About this period a new favourite had arisen in the court. This was Mrs. Masham, a relation of the Duchess of Marlborough, introduced by her to the Queen; over whom she had, by her insinuating manners, so opposite to the imperious deportment of the Duchess, acquired such after forcing the Danish court to a separate peace at Travendahl, passed over into Ingria, where the czar Peter was engaged in the siege of Narva at the head of an army of 80,000 Russians. Leading to the attack a body of troops not exceeding 10,000 men, he totally defeated the czar. He then advanced into Livonia, and compelled the King of Poland to raise the siege of Riga. Afterwards attacking the united army of Poles and Saxons on the banks of the Dwina, he forced the passage of that river with great slaughter; and, penetrating into the heart of the kingdom, by a series of astonishing successes made himself master of Cracow and Warsaw; and, animated by an implacable animosity against King Augustus, he caused a diet to be assembled, by whom the deposition of that monarch was pronounced, and Stanislaus Leckzinski, a Polish palatine of great merit, elected King of Poland in his stead. The unfortunate Augustus, retiring into Saxony was pursued thither also by his relentless antagonist, who reduced the whole electorate, Dresden excepted, to unconditional submission, levying immense contributions upon the inhabitants, and diffusing terror throughout all the neighbouring states, and even the court of Vienna. A treaty was at length signed at Alt-Ranstadt between the Kings of Sweden and Poland; by which the latter relinquished his pretensions to the Polish diadem in favour of Stanislaus—retaining the mere empty title of King, and stipulating only for the restitution of his electorate. The King of Sweden, however, remained with his army in Saxony, where he gave great umbrage to the allies, particularly the Emperor.* At length the Duke of Marlborough arrived in Saxony, upon an ostensible embassy of compliment, but with a secret purpose to discover the real intentions of the King of Sweden. Conducted by Count Piper with distinguished marks of honour into the King's presence, he presented to King Charles a letter from the Queen of England, written with her own hand; and knowing the weakness of the King's character with respect to flattery and the extravagance of his pride, ill concealed under a guise of simplicity and modest reserve, he declared, "that had not the sex of the Queen of England, his mistress, prevented, she would have crossed the sea to visit a Prince admired by the whole universe;" adding, "that he esteemed himself honoured in making these assurances; and that he should think it a great happiness if his affairs would allow him to learn under so great a General as his Majesty, what he yet wanted to know in the art of war." The King of Sweden answered, "that he should always have the utmost regard for the interposition of the Queen of Great Britain, and the interests of the grand alliance—that her Majesty might be assured his design was to depart hence, as soon as he had obtained the satisfaction he had demanded—and that he should do nothing which might tend to the prejudice of the common cause in general, or to the Protestant religion in particular, of which he should always glory to be a zealous protector." He then invited the Duke to dinner, placing him on his right hand, and Count Piper on the left: after which the Duke retired with the King and the Count into the audience room, where a long and interesting conference took place; during which the Duke it is said, often fixed his eyes attentively on the King. When France was mentioned, he perceived symptoms of disgust and aversion; and when the conquests of the allies were touched upon, of satisfaction and pleasure. When he named the czar, the King's countenance was inflamed, and his eyes sparkled with anger. He moreover remarked, that the King had a map of Muscovy lying before him on the table. Hence he inferred, that the real object of the King's ambition was to dethrone the czar, as he had already done the King of Poland—that he entertained no designs inimical to the allies; and meant only to impose some hard terms upon the Emperor, with which the court of Vienna would be obliged to comply: and satisfied with the justness of these conclusions, he retired from the King's presence without making any specific proposal. After receiving the highest marks of distinction which this modern Vandal ever perhaps conferred upon any individual, he took his leave, and, passing through the courts of Berlin and Hanover, arrived at the Hague, on the 8th of May.

Intelligence having been received, a few days afterwards, that the French were encamped on the plain of Fleurus, the Duke of Marlborough hastened to the attack, but found the pass of Ronquieres, secured by the enemy. He had proposed to form the siege of Mons or Charleroi, in case he failed in his attempt to bring on a general engagement; but this design was frustrated by M. Vendome's taking a position which would have exposed the wealthy and open cities of Brabant, Louvaine, and Brussels in particular, to the utmost danger. The two armies after this remained in the strong opposite camps of Meldert and Gemblours, nearly two months, almost in a state of inaction; during which the Duke declared the enemy to be in such a situation, that, so far from being able to undertake any siege, the allies would rather be obliged to spend their time in observing his motions". At length the Duke and M. Auverquerque, receiving advice that the French General had detached twenty-five battalions and squadrons to Provence, resolved to venture an attack on the fortified camp of Gemblours; and on the 9th of August the allies passed the Dyle at the abbey of Florivale, and, marching all night, arrived at break of day at the heights of Wavren. On the first alarm the French decamped with precipitation from Gemblours, and retreated to the strong position of Pieton. On the Duke of Marlborough's continuing his march towards Pieton, they again decamped silently in the night, scarcely halting till they had passed the Scheldt, and found themselves safe behind their lines under the cannon of Lisle, their right extending to Pont-à-Tresin. The heavy rains which fell at this time prevented the allies such an ascendency, that her Grace was supplanted before she was apprised of the danger. Mrs. Masham had formed a strict connection with the Secretary of State, Harley, who had, in conjunction with her, devised a project of raising himself to the summit of power on the ruins of the present ministry, whose politics he found secretly distasteful to the Queen. The Secretary had been frequently introduced by the favourite to private audiences of the Queen, in which he represented to her, the political thraldom in which she was held by the Marlborough family; and he operated on the goodness and humanity of the Queen's disposition, by reprobating the boundless ambition and avarice which prompted the General to continue a war so fruitful of misery and calamity—a war which might indeed be necessary to his greatness, but which it would be easy to terminate on very advantageous and honourable terms for the sovereign and nation. The advancement of Sunderland would of course tend to strengthen that influence, which the Queen had now learned to dread; and the personal consequence of Harley, who feared not the competition of Sir Charles Hedges, would be greatly eclipsed by the promotion of a man of Sunderland's high rank, connections, and political ability. After a long and obstinate resistance, the Queen yielded the point; and the Earl of Sunderland was declared Secretary of State in December, 1706. From this moment the Marlborough interest was undermined.

* The Swedish Envoy at Vienna, Baron Strahlenheim, having complained in high terms of the conduct of Count Zobar, a young and rash Hungarian noble, who had spoken disrespectfully of the King of Sweden, that fierce Coqueror insisted upon the Count's being delivered up to him; also upon the absolute surrender of the Russian troops who had escaped from the defeats in Poland into Germany, and had been entertained in the imperial armies; and of those officers who had obstructed the Swedish levies in Silesia. Count Wrattislau being nominated Ambassador to the King of Sweden, Count Piper, first Minister to his Swedish Majesty, wrote to him, saying "that if he came with power to give his master real satisfaction, he would be welcome; but that, if he only came to enter into a discussion of his Swedish Majesty's pretensions, he might save himself the trouble of that journey;" and upon the Count's subsequent arrival at Alt-Ranstadt, the King refused to admit him to an audience. The demands of Sweden were now enlarged and multiplied into divers distinct articles, of which the most remarkable were, that the Protestant religion, in Silesia be restored, according to the treaty of Westphalia; that his imperial Majesty should renounce all pretences to the quota which the King of Sweden, as Prince of the empire, had omitted to furnish during the present war; and that the whole Swedish army, on their return to Poland, should be maintained at the Emperor's charge: all which the court of Vienna was ultimately compelled to ratify. On the expression of surprise, by some of the courtiers, at his imperial Majesty's yielding to the article respecting the restoration of Protestantism in Silesia, the Emperor replied, "that it was fortunate the King of Sweden did not insist upon his turning Protestant himself."

from urging the pursuit beyond the plains of Marimont; and though the French suffered greatly in this long and fatiguing march, the Duc de Vendome ultimately succeeded in his determination to avoid a battle, and in covering the fortified towns on the frontier. The Duke of Marlborough left the camp at Helchin early in October, and retired disappointed to the Hague. On the Rhine, Marechal Villars met with considerable success. The disasters of the preceding campaign in this quarter, were believed to have sunk deep into the mind of Prince Louis of Baden, who had been for some time in a declining state of health. He had retired to the baths of Schlangenbade, declaring openly, "That as affairs were at that time managed, the greatest misfortune that could befal a man of honour was to command an imperial army." He expired on the 4th of January 1706-7, and was succeeded by the Margrave of Bareith, a man enfeebled by age, of mean capacity, and of great perverseness of character. All Germany was thrown into consternation at the rapid progress of the French army, which, passing the Rhine at Strasburg, defeated the advanced guard of the Imperial army, forced the lines at Stolhoffen, esteemed the rampart of the empire, laid the Duchy of Wirtemburg under contribution, made themselves masters of Suabia, and penetrated to the Danube. The anxiety of the court of Vienna, at these alarming successes, appears in a letter from the minister Count Zinzendorf to the Duke of Marlborough, dated June the 4th, in which he observes —"I understand, by the letter your highness was pleased to write me on the 23d of May, the uneasiness you were then under with regard to the state of affairs on the Rhine, which without doubt is increased by the behaviour of the army of the empire when the Marechal de Villars passed the Rhine. I confess this is a very unlucky accident, which could not have happened if we had had a competent chief at the head of our troops. Your highness knows that the first proposal was to send for the Prince of Savoy, and that it was afterwards thought proper in England and Holland to change that purpose; though I will not pretend to say whether this might not have been the most reasonable project. Count Staremberg was put in the room of this Prince; but immediately this resolution was changed,—and, thanks be to God! the whole court was witness that I had no hand in it. But, in short, there are certain moments at court in which it is impossible to put a stop to, or to hinder, those evil resolutions which one has frequently reason to wish otherwise in the sequel. In this unhappy juncture I have proposed the elector of Hanover for this command, because I believe it necessary the army of the empire should have a chief whose birth and personal merit may carry a weight with them." This was an honourable testimony to the political and military character of that Prince, who now began to derive importance from his eventual claim to the succession of the British crown. In a short time he assumed the command of the Imperial army, which he conducted with much judgment and prudence. Count Merci having surprised and defeated the Marquis de Vivans at Offenburg, M. de Villars was forced to abandon his splendid projects, and repass the Rhine by Fort Louis into Alsace.

In July, Prince Eugene and the Duke of Savoy passed the Var at the head of 30,000 men, and marched directly towards Toulon, to which they laid close siege. As the principal naval magazines of France, and the greater part of its fleet, were inclosed within its walls or its harbour, this enterprise excited general consternation. The place was however defended with the most heroic valour; and troops being assembled from all parts for its relief, the Duke of Savoy thought proper to raise the siege with precipitation, and to repass the Var. This expedition, however, caused a powerful diversion to the French forces on the Rhine; and immense damage was sustained from the attacks of the English fleet, co-operating with the besieging army, on the ships of war and merchantmen in the harbour.*

In Spain, the affairs of the allies suffered a fatal reverse. Don Pedro, King of Portugal, having died December 9, 1706, was succeeded by his son Don Juan V. who declared that he would religiously observe all the engagements of his father. In a council of war, held at Valencia (February 1707) it was resolved by the Marquis das Minas and the Earl of Galway, to act offensively. The Earl of Peterborough, who had returned to Spain, gave his opinion in favour of a defensive campaign; but this was by his enemies ascribed merely to envy and hatred of the Earl of Galway. In consequence of the resolution actually taken, the confederate army moved to Yecla, where the Duke of Berwick had formed a grand dépot of provisions and stores, which he abandoned at their approach. The confederates advanced to Portalegre, with a view to surprise him in his camp; but before this design could be effected, intelligence was received that the Duke, having been joined by the re-inforcements he looked for, was on his march to attack the allies. The Earl of Galway proceeded (April 14) to the plains of Almanza, where he found the enemy, far superior in number, drawn up and ready to receive him. The action extended from wing to wing. The centre of the allied army, composed of English and Dutch infantry, fought with the greatest gallantry, and drove the enemy before them; but the right wing, consisting entirely of Portuguese troops, commanded by the Marquis das Minas in person, fled at the first onset; and the left, where the English and Dutch cavalry were posted, after incredible efforts of valour, yielding to superior force, the Duke of Berwick ordered his two wings to attack the main body in flank. The Generals of infantry, however, forming the battalions into a hollow square, retired from the field of battle with inconsiderable loss; but night quickly came on; they were strangers to the country, and did not know whither to retire for safety; after marching nine hours, and fighting about six, they could move no farther; they had spent their ammunition, and had not so much as bread and water to refresh themselves with; and they expected to be attacked next morning by the enemy, against whom they could oppose no effectual resistance. In these circumstances, they resolved to surrender themselves prisoners of war, to the amount of twenty-three entire battalions. The Duke of Berwick is said to have been astonished, and scarcely to have believed the officer who brought the message. The Portuguese and part of the British cavalry, with the foot that guarded the baggage made good their retreat to Alcira, where the broken remains of the army mournfully assembled, after sustaining a loss of 14,000 men, exclusive of 800 officers; with all the artillery, equipage, ammunition, and standards. Das Minas made an early escape with the Portuguese cavalry of Xativa; and the Earl of Galway, who charged, first as General, at the head of the left wing, and then as a volunteer in Fabreque's regiment of dragoons, retired reluctantly from the field, after receiving a dangerous sabre wound on the head. The day after the battle, the Duke of Orleans arrived to take the command of the Spanish army, which had now acquired the most decisive superiority; and though the Earl of Galway did all that an active and able general could to retrieve so great a misfortune, Arragon and Valentia were gradually evacuated, and the campaign concluded with the siege and capture of Lerida by the forces of King Philip.

Sir Cloudesley Shovel commanded in the Mediterranean. On the miscarriage of the expedition he left a strong squadron under the command of Sir Thomas Dilkes, and sailed from Gibraltar with fifteen ships of the line, for England. On the 22d of October, 1707, he had ninety fathom water in the soundings, and brought the fleet to, the weather being extremely hazy. Towards evening a fresh and apparently favourable gale springing up, he made the signal for sailing, supposing the channel to be open; but by eight o'clock signals of distress were made by several of the fleet, who found themselves, to their astonishment, upon the rocks to the westward of Scilly. The Association, in which Sir Cloudesley had his flag, struck and instantly foundered with all the crew. The Eagle and Romney experienced the same fate. The Royal Anne was saved by the extraordinary presence of mind and activity of Sir George Byng and his men, who shifted the sails when within a ship's length of a rock to the leeward. Lord Dursley, in the St. George, had a still more miraculous escape; for his ship was dashed on the same ridge of rocks with the Association; and the same wave which was perceived to be fatal to the latter, set the St. George again afloat. Sir Cloudesley Shovel's body, with many others, being cast on shore and found on the strand, was carried to London and interred in Westminster abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory.* This terrible calamity was ill compensated by the accounts which at this period arrived of the total destruction of the French fisheries at Newfoundland—several frigates on that station being taken or burnt, and upwards of 300 boats demolished, with 70,000 quintals of fish.

* Great blame was upon this occasion imputed to the Emperor, who, careless and indifferent to the success of an enterprise from which he could reap no benefit, had detached a large body of troops, originally destined for this purpose, to the kingdom of Naples, of which he effected a complete conquest.

In the month of July, a session of the Irish Parliament was held by the Earl of Pembroke, in which some faint attempts appear to have been made to obtain a reform of the more flagrant existing abuses. The House of Commons passed a resolution, to which the members engaged individually upon their honour to adhere, in favour of the manufactures of Ireland; and the address of the Commons, congratulating her Majesty upon the glory which she had acquired by accomplishing the union of the British kingdoms, hinted at a more comprehensive union, which would farther redound to the strength and lustre of her crown.

The first Parliament of Great Britain assembled on the 23d of October, this year, and Mr. Smith was chosen speaker. Fresh assurances were given of the resolution of the two Houses to support the war; the Lords and Commons joined in a resolution and address, "That no peace could be safe or honourable for her Majesty or her allies, if Spain or the West Indies were suffered to continue in the power of the house of Bourbon;" and the Queen replied, "that she was fully of opinion that no peace could be safe till the entire monarchy of Spain was restored to the house of Austria." The Tories magnified the services of the Earl of Peterborough; and the Whigs vindicated the Earl of Galway; but, after much useless discussion, the whole business fell to the ground.

During this session, a bill was introduced, and passed, "For rendering the union of the two kingdoms more entire and complete;" by which it was positively enacted that there should be but one privy council in the kingdom of Great Britain. The influence of the court was strenuously exerted against this bill, but without success.

In February, 1708, an important change occurred in the administration, by the dismission of Mr. Harley, Secretary of State, and the promotion of Mr. Boyle, Chancellor of the Exchequer, to that office, who was succeeded by Mr. Smith, Speaker of the House of Commons. Mr. St. John, Secretary at War, and Sir Simeon Harcourt, Attorney-General, followed the fortunes of Mr. Harley, and resigned their places; the former of which was given to Mr. Robert Walpole; and Sir James Montague was made Attorney-General.† Shortly after this change, the nation was alarmed with the news of an invasion. Encouraged by the spirit of disaffection now prevailing in Scotland, incited by the invitations of a number of persons of rank and property in that kingdom, and desirous perhaps to avenge the insult he had recently suffered at Toulon, the French King, with a view of making a descent in North Britain, equipped a powerful armament; on board of which embarked the Chevalier de St. George, son of the late King James. On sailing from Dunkirk they were closely pursued by an English squadron, commanded by Sir George Byng, who captured, near the Frith of Forth, one of their flag ships; and the whole armament was so scattered and dispersed in their retreat from the action, that they could not even effect a landing, which might at this crisis, have been attended with very serious consequences. After being tossed about for more than a month, they got back, in a distressed condition, to Dunkirk. On this occasion the most firm and vigorous measures were taken by the government. The Habeas Corpus Act was suspended; the abjuration oath was tendered to all persons; and those who refused it were declared to be in the condition of convict recusants. A vote of credit passed the House of Commons; twelve battalions of troops were ordered immediately from Flanders; and the Queen publicly declared, "That her chief dependence was placed on those who had given repeated proofs of their warmth and concern for the support of the Revolution." Yet she is said to have discovered much personal affection and tenderness for her unfortunate brother. Sir George Byng had no instructions relative to him individually; and when the subject was under discussion by the privy council, she appeared greatly agitated, and dissolved into tears, on which the council broke up in much confusion. In the speech delivered by the Queen to the Parliament, the Chevalier de St. George was stiled "The Pretender," a term which was re-echoed in the numerous addresses to the Queen from every part of the kingdom; and by this appellation he was in future usually distinguished. The Parliament, which had completed its three years, was now dissolved; and a new one was summoned to meet in November, in which the Whig interest still preponderated.

Early in April, the Duke of Marlborough arrived at the Hague, where he met with Prince Eugene, with whom and the grand pensionary Heinsius, and the deputies of the States, he held a long conference respecting the future operations of the war. Having settled the plan of the campaign, the two commanders repaired to the court of Herenhausen, where they prevailed upon the electoral Prince of Hanover again to assume the command of the army under the Rhine; and Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough had the satisfaction to serve together in the Low Countries.

Louis XIV. seemed this year inclined to act more upon the offensive; and, early in the summer, the cities of Ghent and Bruges were surprised by a detachment from the French army; after which the Duc de Vendome sat down before Oudenard. Prince Eugene, having rejoined the army with a strong re-inforcement from Germany, the allied Generals advanced with swift marches to the relief of that place: on which the enemy raised the siege with precipitation, and retreated towards

* It is not generally known, that this distinguished officer, who deservedly ranks amongst the Naval Worthies of Britain, was not drowned; but, after having reached the shore in safety, was, according to the confession of an ancient woman, by her treacherously and inhumanly murdered. The atrocious act she, many years afterwards, when on her death bed, revealed to the minister of the parish who attended her; declaring she could not die in peace till she had made this confession. She acknowledged having been led to commit this horrid deed for the sake of plunder; and that she then had in her possession, among other things, an emerald ring, which she had been afraid to sell, lest it should lead to a discovery. This ring, which was then delivered to the minister, was by him given to James, Earl of Berkeley, (in possession of whose family it now remains) at his particular request, Sir Cloudesly Shovel and himself having lived on terms of the most intimate friendship.

† The Lords Godolphin and Marlborough had for a considerable time been very uneasy at the secret practices of the late Secretary, and the dangerous intrigues carrying on by him in conjunction with Mrs. Masham; and at length they avowed their determination to serve the Queen no longer, if he were continued in that post. The Queen being inflexible, these noblemen actually withdrew from court. Shortly afterwards the Queen repaired to the cabinet council, where Mr. Harley attempted to state some particulars relative to foreign affairs; on which the Duke of Somerset said, "he did not see how they could deliberate on such matters in the absence of the General and Treasurer." The other members present plainly acquiescing in this sentiment, the council broke up in disorder, and the Queen, sending for the Duke of Marlborough, told him Mr. Harley should resign; which he did within two days. But from this æra the Queen harboured the deepest resentment against the Duke and the Treasurer, and manifested an incurable alienation from the Whigs.

the Scheldt, which the main body of the French army passed at Gavre. The intention of M. Vendome was to attack the allies when the troops were divided by the river; and he had made his dispositions accordingly; but the pride and ignorance of the Duke of Burgundy (eldest son of the Dauphin, and entrusted with the chief command) frustrated this plan, and the French army was thrown into confusion by a variety of inconsistent movements: the army of the allies, having crossed the Scheldt (July 11) appeared in sight, and it was too late to think of a retreat. The attack soon became general; and the Imperial and English Generals charging at the head of their respective troops, the French were borne down on all sides. The electoral Prince of Hanover had a distinguished share in the glory of the day, leading on the Hanoverian cavalry sword in hand to the attack of the household troops of France with brilliant success; whilst (according to the English and Dutch contemporary historians) the Pretender, who accompanied the Duke of Burgundy, and "saw" the engagement from the steeple of an adjacent village, was amongst the first to quit the field.* The French army was in the end entirely defeated. Night, however, saved them from total ruin; and M. de Vendome, seeing all hope extinguished, formed his best troops into a rear-guard, with which he secured a tolerable retreat. The loss suffered by the French did not amount to less than 14 or 15,000 men; and above 100 standards and colours were taken.

The Generals of the allies now determined to undertake the siege of Lisle, on the fortifications of which Vauban had exhausted his skill, and which was defended by a garrison so numerous, commanded by an officer of such experience and valour, the Marechal de Boufflers, that the success of the enterprise was considered extremely doubtful. In addition to this, all the great military talents of the Duc de Vendome were exerted to obstruct the progress of the siege. This important town, however, after a noble defence, surrendered to the allied army on the 10th of December; and thus the frontier of France was exposed to the most dangerous attacks of the enemy.

A resolution was immediately afterwards taken, late as the season was, to recover the important city of Ghent, lost at the commencement of the campaign, and which was the key of the principal rivers and canals. Count de la Mothe, who had recently been beaten at Wynendale, commanded there with thirty-seven battalions.

In four days after the opening of the trenches he beat a parley and surrendered, though no batteries had been raised against the body of the place, and the covered way had not been attacked. The surrender of Bruges immediately followed. After the termination of the campaign, public clamour ran so high against Chamillart, the French minister, that he was removed from the post of secretary, and the seals were transferred to M. Voisin. Soon after the surrender of Lisle, M. Berwick received a private letter from the Duke of Marlborough, signifying in frank and ingenuous terms that this was a favourable occasion to set on foot a negotiation for peace. Chamillart, however, "taking it into his head," as was his usual phrase, that this proposal proceeded from the bad situation of the allied army, dictated such an extraordinary answer, that M. Berwick sent it in French to show that it did not come from him. The Duke of Marlborough was so highly offended, that M. Berwick and M. de Torcy were persuaded that the extreme aversion which he afterwards showed in respect to all propositions of peace originated in resentment for the insult thus offered.

On the Rhine, this summer, nothing of importance occurred. From Italy, the Duke of Savoy attempted another invasion of France. Bending his march towards Savoy over Mount Cenis, he suddenly turned short, and, eluding the vigilance of M. Villars, made himself master of Exilles, Fort la Pérouse, and the citadel lately erected of Fenestrella; by which he not only secured his own territory from insult, but gained a free passage into the enemy's country.

At the close of the campaign of 1707, the Earl of Galway and the Marquis das Minas had returned under convoy of an English fleet to Portugal; and, that the war in Spain might be prosecuted with renewed spirit and vigour, the Emperor appointed to the chief command in Catalonia, Count Staremberg, a General, second in reputation only to Prince Eugene; and General Stanhope succeeded the Earl of Galway in the command of the English auxiliaries. The imperial General, however, not being sufficiently in force, the whole summer passed in operations of a defensive nature. In the interim, Sir John Leake made a conquest of the island of Sardinia, and, in concert with General Stanhope, of Minorca; and the Pope was menaced with the bombardment of Civita Vecchia, in return for the assistance which he had afforded the Pretender on his late expedition to Scotland. From this, however, his holiness was saved by the interposition of the imperial court; for the Pope had, though with great reluctance, and in consequence of the near and alarming approach of the German army from Lombardy towards Rome, recognised the Archduke as King of Spain; excusing himself to Philip V. by saying, "that this recognition added nothing to the right of his competitor."

In May, Commodore Wager, who commanded in the West Indies, signalised himself by an attack upon the Spanish Plate-fleet, on its passage from Carthagena to Porto Bello. The fight began at sunset; and soon after it was dark, the Spanish Admiral blew up with a tremendous explosion. The Rear-Admiral struck about two in the morning, and the Vice-Admiral escaped in a shattered condition. Another large ship of forty guns was run ashore and burnt, and the remaining ships were with difficulty saved by the intervention of a dangerous shoal off Carthagena.†

This year, on the 28th of October, died his royal highness Prince George of Denmark, who had been twenty-five years married to the Queen. It has been justly remarked, that "his total want of talents, his unaspiring disposition and mildness of temper, very happily combined to qualify him for the peculiarly critical station in which his high fortune had placed him, and in which a man of more shining abilities and more daring ambition might have proved singularly troublesome and dangerous." The Earl of Pembroke succeeded the Prince in the post of Lord-High-Admiral; resigning the offices of president of the council and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the former of which was given to Lord Somers, and the latter to the Earl of Wharton. The Earl, however, finding the business of the Admiralty too burdensome, it was, after a short interval, again put into commission, the Earl of Oxford being first Lord Commissioner; and thus the administration was once more constituted entirely of Whigs. The ground, however, was undermined beneath them, and they were themselves sensible that

* The French writers, on the other hand, declare, "that the 'King' showed in this battle much courage and keenness."

† In London, about this time, the Count de Matueof, the Russian ambassador, was arrested in the open street, by certain tradesmen to whom he was considerably indebted. This affair made a great noise; the ambassador declaring to Mr. Boyle, the secretary of state, that if the "criminals" were connived at, under any colour whatsoever, he should instantly depart the kingdom, and leave to the czar his master the protection of his injured honour. The Queen expressed great regret and resentment at the indignity offered, and ordered a prosecution to be instituted against the offenders by the attorney-general; but this did not satisfy the ambassador, who retired into Holland, and thence transmitted a letter from the czar to the Queen, requiring that capital punishment be inflicted upon all concerned in this atrocious assault. That monarch was astonished to be informed, that in England the laws were no less obligatory upon the sovereign than the subject, and that they authorised no such punishment. The persons who committed the arrest were tried in the court of Queen's bench by Lord Chief Justice Holt, and found guilty; but, on arguing the point of law, the court was compelled to dismiss the action. An act, however, was subsequently passed for securing the privileges of ambassadors and foreign ministers; a beautiful copy of which, illuminated on vellum, was presented to the czar by Mr. Whitworth, the English envoy; who at the same time acknowledged and apologised, for the previous insufficiency of the English laws to punish such an offence. The czar graciously declared his acceptance of the apology to the envoy, and also by a letter written with his own hand to the Queen.

they

they no longer possessed the Queen's regard or confidence.*

On the 16th of November, the new Parliament assembled, and chose Sir Richard Onslow speaker. On account of the recent death of her consort, the Queen did not open the session in person; but the Lord Chancellor delivered a speech on the usual topics, concluding with the declaration, "That her Majesty would always endeavour, on her part, to make her people happy to such a degree as that none should enter into measures for the disturbance of her government, the union, or the Protestant succession as by law established, without acting at the same time manifestly against their own true and lasting interest, as well as their duty."† In the course of the session, a remarkable law, originating in the terrors excited by the late invasion, was passed for the regulation of trials for high treason in Scotland. By a clause of this act, torture was abolished, and the forms of procedure in the Scottish judicatures were assimilated nearly to the practice of the English courts. As a heavy drawback on this indulgence, however, the pains and forfeitures of the English law were extended to Scotland. The House of Commons at length inserted a clause, that no estate in land should be forfeited upon a judgment of high treason; and the Lords agreed to the amendment, with the farther proviso, moved by Lord Somers, "That it should not take place till after the death of the Pretender." This rendered the bill odious in Scotland. The term of its duration was, at a subsequent period, extended to the death of the sons of the Pretender. Towards the close of the session, an act of grace, expressed in terms remarkably full, pardoning all treasons, &c. committed before the 19th of April, 1708, passed without any difficulty, and on the 21st of April, 1709, the Parliament was prorogued.

On the 5th of May following, the Earl of Wharton opened the Irish session with a speech, in which he called the attention of the two Houses to the inequality between the Roman Catholics and Protestants with respect to numbers, and reminded them of the sanguinary disposition of the former, as often as they had an opportunity to gratify it. In pursuance of this hint, a horrible bill was introduced and passed, inflicting penalties disgraceful to humanity, on those they were pleased to consider as delinquents; though, since the æra of the revolution, the Catholics had submitted with exemplary and uniform patience to hardships and oppressions, under the intolerable pressure of which even their sighs and groans were regarded as symptoms of an implacable and rebellious spirit. A prorogation of Parliament took place on the 30th of August, and in the succeeding month of May (A. D. 1710) another session was held, in which some acts passed for the encouragement of manufactures and commerce. At the end of the summer the Earl of Wharton took his leave of Ireland, the government of which in his hands displayed throughout the features of oppression.

France, reduced to great extremities, again entertained serious thoughts of peace; and, in March, after the departure of the Duke of Marlborough to England, M. Rouillé was sent to Holland to treat with the States upon the subject. Their high mightinesses, however, though they allowed him to enter the country, would admit no communication without the knowledge and participation of their allies. In April, Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough arrived at the Hague, and held several conferences with the pensionary and the deputies of the States respecting the proposals of M. Rouillé, whose overtures were finally declared unsatisfactory, and the Duke returned in a short time to London. Unwilling to relinquish all hope of pacification, Louis XIV. now sent M. de Torcy, minister for foreign affairs, to the Hague, to renew the negotiation. The Duke of Marlborough and Lord Townshend, a young nobleman rising into political eminence, and now joined with the Duke in this important commission, immediately repaired thither a second time; and Count Zinzendorf also arrived nearly at the same time from Vienna as joint plenipotentiary with Prince Eugene. The conferences were renewed with fresh ardour; and such concessions were made by M. de Torcy as ought to have satisfied the utmost ambition of the allies. The French minister, having gone without avail to the extent of his commission, required a specification of the terms on which the allies would grant peace to France. Preliminary articles were accordingly framed and even signed by the ambassadors of the allied powers;‡ which M. de Torcy was authorised to lay before his most Christian Majesty, and to which he promised that a final answer should be given on or before the 4th of June ensuing (1709.) Such was the excessive rigour of the terms, that M. de Torcy was observed to be affected even to tears in the course of the conferences; the King of France, deriving courage from despair, determined to reject them; and on the 4th of June, Prince Eugene, who was then at Brussels, received a letter from M. de Torcy, importing that Louis XIV. having examined the project of peace concluded at the Hague, found it impossible for him to accept it. The article which chiefly influenced his decision was the last, which, as he affirmed, made the continuance of peace to depend upon a condition not in his power to execute —though he consented to recognise the Archduke as King of Spain, and to withdraw all assistance from the reigning sovereign.§ The negotiation being at an end, the campaign in Flanders was opened in June, 1709,

* It does not appear that at this period the Queen, deeply as she resented the conduct of the Marlborough party, entertained any design, or even idea, of emancipating herself from what she regarded as a political tyranny. The war, and the great leaders and supporters of it, were still highly popular; a new Parliament was on the eve of being elected under the influence of the present ministers: and Harley, whom the queen secretly and confidentially consulted, could not cherish the most distant hope that an administration of a different complexion, if formed, could sustain itself for a moment against so extensive and so potent a combination. Her Majesty, indeed seems to have considered herself as wholly at the mercy of her ministers; and, upon some surmise that a motion for inviting the electoral Prince to England would be brought forward in the ensuing session, at the instance, or with the concurrence of the Whigs, she had addressed herself in a letter to the Duke of Marlborough, couched in the most pressing terms, to avert from her what she deemed so intolerable an evil.

† The Lords Haddo and Johnstown, eldest sons of Scotch Peers, having been returned as representatives of the shires of Aberdeen and Linlithgow, petitions were presented against them as incapable by the act of union of sitting in the House of Commons. By an act of the Scotch Parliament, regulating the mode of electing sixteen Peers and forty-five commoners of that kingdom to represent Scotland in Parliament, and ratified by the act of union, it was declared, "that none shall be capable to elect or be elected to represent a shire or burgh in the Parliament of Great Britain, but such as are now capable to elect or be elected as commissioners for shires or burghs to the Parliament of Scotland." Several instances were alledged of the rejection of the eldest sons of Peers by the Scottish Parliaments; particularly the son of Viscount Tarbat in 1685, and of Lord Levingstone in 1689; and the case being clearly made out, new writs were issued for the counties of Aberdeen and Linlithgow. The Duke of Queensberry having been created an English Peer by the title of Duke of Dover, and taken his seat in Parliament as such, had nevertheless claimed his privilege of voting as a Peer of Scotland in the election of the sixteen Peers. This precedent was objected against as inequitable and dangerous, and, on a division, the matter in dispute was determined against the Duke of Queensberry, though supported by the influence of the court.

‡ The articles were in substance as follows:—"That the most Christian King shall acknowledge Charles III. as King of Spain; that in two months Sicily shall be put into the hands of King Charles; and the Duke of Anjou shall evacuate Spain; to which if he refuses his consent, the French King and the allies shall enter into proper measures for its enforcement—that the French King shall deliver up Strasburgh and Landau to the Emperor, and demolish New Brisac, Fort Louis, and Huningen—that he shall acknowledge the Queen of Great Britain and the Protestant succession—that he shall demolish Dunkirk, and cause the Pretender to retire from France—that he shall deliver up Furnes, Menin, Ypres, Warneton, Commines, Werwick, Poperingen, Lisle, Conde, and Maubeuge, for the barrier of the States—that he shall make over Exilles, Fenestrella, and Chemont, with the valley of Pragelas, &c. for a barrier to the Duke of Savoy—that the pretensions of the electors of Bavaria and Cologne shall be referred to the general negotiation—that the allies shall be allowed to make farther demands at the general congress—that the suspension of arms shall terminate at the end of two months, if the whole Spanish monarchy be not surrendered up before that time."

§ This negotiation, though unsuccessful, answered a good purpose to the King of France, who, in a successful appeal to the French nation, stated the preliminaries insisted upon by the allies. Even in England the impression made was very visible; persons of moderation and reflection perceiving, from the terms now offered and refused, that the war was in future to be continued merely to gratify the immeasureable ambition of the house of Austria.

by the siege of Tournay, which surrendered at discretion, after a long and obstinate resistance. The allies next prepared to attack the city of Mons: but the French army, commanded by Marechal Villars, posting themselves behind the woods of La Merte and Tanieres, in the neighbourhood of Malplaquet, in order to obstruct this design, the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene formed a resolution (September 11) to attack the French General in his camp, which, naturally strong, he had fortified with such care and diligence as to render it apparently inaccessible. After an obstinate and bloody engagement, however, the lines were forced; more than 30,000 men having been left dead upon the field. Marechal Villars was wounded, and compelled to retire from the scene of action: but Marechal Boufflers, second in command, made an excellent retreat; and the loss of the victors was little less than that of the vanquished. The victory, however, was crowned by the taking of Mons, a conquest essential to the security of Brabant; after which both armies went into winter quarters.

On the Rhine, the Elector of Hanover again took upon him the command; but Count Merci, being detached with a considerable body of troops to make an incursion into Franche Comté, was repulsed with loss by M. Harcourt, who conducted the opposite army: and the remaining operations of the campaign were entirely of a defensive nature.

On the frontier of Portugal, the Spanish and Portuguese armies were prepared for action early in the spring; and the Marquis das Minas, contrary to the advice of the Earl of Galway, determining to pass the Coya in face of the enemy commanded by the Marquis de Bay, was defeated with loss: the British infantry, as usual, fought heroically; and, as usual, were abandoned by the Portuguese cavalry. The Earl of Galway had a horse shot under him, and very narrowly escaped being taken. This brave but unfortunate General afterwards chose his posts along the Guadiana, to the banks of which he retreated so judiciously, that the Marquis de Bay could derive no advantage from his victory. On the eastern side, the town and castle of Alicant surrendered to the Spaniards, after a long and most pertinacious defence. The enemy, who had formed the blockade early in the month of December 1708, finding all other means ineffectual, resolved to blow up the rock on which the castle stands; and a mine having been excavated with immense labour, was filled with 200 barrels of powder. The Chevalier d'Asfeldt, who directed the operations of the siege, generously reluctant to carry his purpose into execution, summoned the governor, Colonel Syburgh, to surrender, and at the same time permitted him to send out two of his officers to view the condition of the mine. This produced no change in the resolution of the governor, who determined to stand the explosion; and the signal being next day made for firing the mine, he walked with several officers to the parade, and ordered the guard to retire. This was no sooner done than the mine was blown up, and with little or no noise, made on the very parade, an opening in the rock of some yards in length and about three feet wide, into which the governor and divers other officers fell; and, the opening instantly closing upon them, they all perished! Notwithstanding this horrible catastrophe, Colonel d'Albon, upon whom the command devolved, refused to capitulate. In consequence of so extraordinary a defence, a council of war was held at Barcelona, to concert effectual measures for their relief. General Stanhope in person undertook the command of an armament destined for that purpose; but the weather proved so tempestuous that the troops could not disembark. At length, provisions failing, and the garrison being reduced to extremity, General Stanhope sent a flag of truce to the Spanish commander, offering to surrender the castle of Alicant upon honourable terms; which were granted without hesitation, and the garrison marched out, on the 18th of April, with all the honours of war. On the frontier of Catalonia Marechal Staremberg passed the Segra, and captured the town of Balaguer, the garrison being made prisoners of war; after which he contented himself with acting upon the defensive.

Charles XII. of Sweden, resolving to invade Muscovy, had engaged himself so far in the Ukraine that there was no possibility remaining of retreat. Relying, therefore, upon his fortune, he passed the Nieper, and invested the important fortress of Pultowa. The czar marched at the head of a far superior army to raise the siege. Charles nevertheless determined to risque a battle; but in the end the Swedes were compelled to quit the field with the loss of their camp, artillery, and baggage; and, being closely pursued, the whole army, having neither bread nor ammunition, found themselves reduced to the dreadful necessity of surrendering as prisoners of war. Charles himself with a few followers, passing the Nieper, took refuge in the Turkish dominions, fixing his residence at Bender. Upon this great reverse of his affairs, King Augustus, declaring his renunciation of the crown forced and void, returned to Poland; which his rival Stanislaus was in no less haste to abandon, finding himself utterly unable to make any effectual resistance. The Kings of Denmark and Prussia embraced this apparently favourable opportunity to renew the war against Sweden; but the Danes, passing the Sound to Schoenen (March 1710,) were unexpectedly attacked and entirely defeated by the Swedish militia; and leaving behind them their horses, provisions, and baggage, the remainder of their army returned precipitately to Denmark.

Subsequently to the termination of the campaign in the Netherlands, the French court renewed, in a covert manner, their overtures for peace; and applied, through the mediation of M. Petkum, resident from the Duke of Holstein at the Hague, that passes might be granted for some ministers from France to come to Holland and renew the conferences; or otherwise, that M. Petkum should be permitted to go to France in order to concert some expedient that might facilitate the same general purpose. The former the States refused: but they consented that Petkum should go to France; which he did the latter end of November. Whilst these negotiations were carrying on, King Philip published a manifesto, wherein he protested against all that should be acted to his prejudice, as null and void; and declared his resolution to adhere to his faithful Spaniards as long as there should remain a man that would stand by him. In the course of a few weeks, Petkum returned with a proposal to resume the negotiations in form; and, at the same time, with a frank avowal from King Louis, that it would be impossible for him to execute the thirty-seventh article of the preliminaries relative to the evacuation of Spain, even if he should sign it. On this, the States not only refused to resume the negotiations, but wrote letters to the Emperor and the diet, and the other powers of the alliance, exhorting them to prosecute the war with redoubled energy and spirit. The Parliament met on the 15th of November; and though the necessity was again inculcated of making fresh efforts against the common enemy, the war became every day more unpopular in England.

On the 5th of November, Dr. Sacheverel, a clergyman of the high church party, preaching at St. Paul's cathedral upon the words of St. Paul, "Perils from false brethren," indulged himself in a strain of violent defamation of the present administration. The Lord Treasurer in particular was attacked by the name of Volpone (or the Fox;) and divers of the right reverend bench were also inveighed against, as "perfidious prelates and false sons of the church," on account of their moderation respecting the dissenters, and their avowed approbation of the toleration. He asserted, in terms the most unqualified, the doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance; and pretended that to say the revolution was inconsistent with those doctrines, was to cast black and odious imputations upon it. He affirmed that the church was violently assailed by her enemies, and faintly defended by those who professed themselves her friends. He vehemently urged the necessity of standing up in defence of the church, for which he declared that he sounded the trumpet, and exhorted the people "to put on the whole armour of God." This harangue, being published at the request of the Lord Mayor, was extolled and applauded by the Tories, and circulated by them with great industry throughout the kingdom. At the height of the popular ferment excited by this invective, a complaint was formally preferred to the House of Commons, by one of the members of that House, Mr. Dolben, of this sermon, as containing positions contrary to revolution principles, to the present government, and to the Protestant succession. As it was thus obtruded upon the notice of the House, it was impossible to pass it over without notice; and the majority resolved upon a solemn Parliamentary impeachment at the bar of the House of Lords, which was in a short time actually presented. Every possible artifice was now put in practice by the Tory party to inflame the minds of the public, and to represent Sacheverel as the champion and martyr of the church, which the Whigs had, as they affirmed, a fixed intent to subvert; and of which project the impeachment of Sacheverel was only the prelude. These insinuations were swallowed by the populace with amazing avidity. During the trial, which lasted three weeks, his coach in passing between Westminster-hall and the Temple, where he then lodged, was constantly attended by vast multitudes with shouts and acclamations of applause. Great tumults prevailed in the metropolis; several places of worship, licensed under the act of toleration, were pulled down; and the houses of many of the most eminent dissenters were plundered, and those of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharton, the Bishop of Sarum, &c. were threatened with demolition. When the Commons had gone through their charge, the managers for Sacheverel undertook his defence with great art and eloquence. He afterwards recited a speech himself, in which he solemnly justified his intentions towards the Queen and her government. He spoke in the most respectful terms of the revolution, and the Protestant succession. He maintained the doctrine of non-resistance as a tenet of the church, in which he was brought up; and in a pathetic conclusion endeavoured to excite the pity of his audience. He was surrounded by the Queen's chaplains, who encouraged and extolled him as the champion of the church; and he was favoured by the Queen herself, who could not but approve a doctrine that confirmed her authority and enlarged her power. In conclusion, Sacheverel was found guilty of a misdemeanor by a majority of 17 voices only—52 to 69; and he was adjudged to be suspended from preaching for the space of three years, and his sermon to be publicly burned. To the same flames was also committed the famous decree of the university of Oxford, passed near thirty years before, asserting the absolute authority and indefeasible right of Princes. This mild sentence was considered as equivalent to an acquittal by the Tories, who celebrated their triumph by bonfires and illuminations, over the whole kingdom. These rejoicings were succeeded by numerous addresses, expressive of a zealous attachment to the church, and an utter detestation of all anti-monarchical and republican principles. In a progress which Sacheverel afterwards made into a remote part of the country, he was sumptuously entertained by the university of Oxford, invited to the palaces of different noblemen, received in many towns by the magistrates in their formalities, and generally attended by a numerous escort of horse. In other places the hedges were ornamented with garlands of flowers, the steeples were covered with streamers and flags, and the air every where resounded with the cry of "The church and Sacheverel." The enthusiasm spread like a contagion through all ranks and orders of people.*

The Queen gave the first public indication of her total change of system by dismissing the Marquis of Kent, April 1710, and giving the office of chamberlain to the Duke of Shrewsbury. The Lord Treasurer, to whom the Queen had communicated her intention, and her hope that this change would meet with his approbation, wrote a strong expostulatory epistle to her Majesty; expressing his "conviction that she was suffering herself to be guided to her own ruin and destruction, as fast as it was possible for those to compass it to whom she now seemed so much to hearken." About the beginning of June the design of dismissing the Earl of Sunderland began to be publicly talked of: on which the Duke of Marlborough, then abroad, wrote to the Queen, stating in the most energetic terms the pernicious consequences of this step, and "the alarm and distrust it would excite in all foreign courts." The Duchess of Marlborough also interposed in behalf of the Earl, making it "her last request," and that Majesty would defer the blow till the end of the campaign. This, she added, "she begged upon her knees." On the 14th of June, however, Lord Sunderland was dismissed, and the seals were given to the Earl of Dartmouth. A step so decisive gave the utmost alarm to the Whigs, at whose suggestion, probably, Count Gallas, the imperial minister, and M. Vryberg, the Dutch resident, represented to the Queen the ill effects which a change of the ministry would produce on the whole political system. In answer to their respective memorials, the Queen declared her resolution, whatever changes might be in contemplation, to continue the Duke of Marlborough in his employments. In August the Lord High Treasurer Godolphin was deprived of his staff, and the treasury was put into commission—Earl Paulet being appointed the first commissioner. This appointment, however, was considered merely nominal; Mr. Harley, now Chancellor of the Exchequer, being regarded as chief and sole minister. In October the Queen came in person to the council, and ordered a proclamation to be issued for dissolving the Parliament; upon which the Lord Chancellor rose to speak: but the Queen declared, that she would admit of no debate, for that "such was her pleasure." At the same time, she dismissed the Lord Somers, and made the Earl of Rochester president of the council; the Duke of Buckingham was declared Lord Steward in the room of the Duke of Devonshire; the seals in the possession of Mr. Boyle were given to Mr. St. John; the Lord High Chancellor Cowper was superseded by Sir Simon Harcourt; the Earl of Wharton resigned to the Duke of Ormond the government of Ireland; and the Earl of Orford relinquished his seat at the head of the Admiralty, Sir John Leake succeeding as first commissioner. The Duke of Marlborough alone was still suffered to retain his employments, which he was deterred from resigning by the pressing entreaties of the Emperor and the States General, who conceived the fortune of the war to be in a great measure attached to his person.—The Tories were much elated at these changes, extolling the Queen "for asserting her just prerogative, and setting herself free from an arbitrary junto, who kept her in an inglorious dependence on their will and caprice;" and the Duke of Beaufort congratulated her Majesty "on his being now able to salute her as Queen in reality."

In the early part of the year, M. Torcy sent another project of peace to M. Petkum, offering three fortified towns in Flanders as a pledge for the execution of the 37th article respecting the restitution of the monarchy of Spain. To this an answer was returned, importing that the allies required his most Christian Majesty should declare in plain and express words that he consented to all the preliminaries except the 37th article; which done, the allies would send passports to his ministers to treat of an equivalent for that article. Louis at length reluctantly assented to this proposition; and the Marechal d'Uxelles, and the Abbe de Polignac, were appointed plenipotentiaries from his most Christian Majesty to meet those of the States General, to whom the management of this negotiation was committed, at Gertruy-

* Henry Sacheverel was born at Marlborough, and educated at Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became fellow, and proceeded to the degree of doctor in divinity in 1709. He translated into English verse part of Virgil's first Georgic in Dryden's Miscellanies, and Mr. Addison addressed to him his Account of English Poets. After his trial he was presented to the valuable living of St. Andrew, Holborn. He died in 1724.

denberg. Several interviews took place; but the French ministers in conclusion broke up the conferences, declaring that the proposals made by the deputies of the States were unjust, and impossible to be executed. On the 25th of July, the French ambassadors quitted Gertruydenberg, to repair to their own court, which, seeing a new scene of things opening in England, began to talk of peace with an air of coldness and indifference.

Great progress had now been made in the military operations of the summer. Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough had taken the field, in April; and, notwithstanding the exertions of M. Villars, who directed the operations of the French army, the allies successively reduced the towns of Douay, Bethune, St. Venant, and Aire, passing in the prosecution of these sieges one hundred and fifty days in open trenches.

Nothing worthy of notice occurred on the Rhine, where Count Grousfelt commanded, in consequence of the resignation of the Elector of Brunswick. In Piedmont also the campaign was wholly defensive. The Duke of Savoy was, to all appearance, weary of the war, and little disposed to vigorous exertion. He even made secret proposals to M. Berwick of separate accommodation, requiring, as conditions, indemnity for his losses; the cession of Exilles, Fenestrella, and Monaco; and that Swiss garrisons should be placed in Briancon and Fort Barreaux, by way of security for the performance of the treaty. In lieu of these, France offered a transfer of all the pretensions of Spain upon the Duchy of Milan, and to acknowledge the Duke of Savoy as King of Lombardy; but Louis added, with becoming dignity, that he never would put into the hands of any foreign power the keys of his own kingdom; and as for Monaco, he could neither in honour nor conscience dispose of what did not belong to him. The negotiation upon this broke off, as secretly as it had commenced.

In Spain, the reigning monarch, eager to put a final termination to the hopes and claims of his competitor, advanced at the head of a powerful army into Arragon. General Stanhope, however, with a force inferior, attacked and totally routed the Spanish cavalry at Almanara, killing with his own hand the Spanish commander Amessaga, who had personally assailed him. Count Staremberg, following the motions of the King, discovered the Spanish army drawn up in order of battle near Saragossa; and an engagement ensuing (August 9) the enemy were entirely defeated. King Charles entered Saragossa in triumph, while Philip retired with the wreck of his army to Madrid. Charles, proceeding to Madrid in pursuit of his competitor, had the mortification to find that city entirely deserted by the Spanish grandees, and received the most convincing proofs of the fidelity and attachment of the Castilians to his rival. As it was now evident that the Archduke could never reign in Spain, he, after remaining one night only in the capital, removed to Toledo, there purposing to pass the winter; but he soon found his quarters untenable, from the hostile disposition of the surrounding country.

Philip having made great exertions to collect another army, he soon appeared again in great force, and took possession of his metropolis, amidst loud acclamations. Count Staremberg being wholly unsupported, and apprehending that his retreat to Catalonia might be intercepted, marched back to Saragossa, in the beginning of November.

General Stanhope, with the greater part of the English forces, not entertaining any apprehension of danger, imprudently entered into cantonments at Brihuega, a place so far distant from Saragossa as to make it impracticable to receive immediate support in case of necessity from General Staremberg. He was advised to place a guard upon the neighbouring hills, to prevent a surprise; but neglecting this caution, he found himself, on the 27th of November, suddenly surrounded by the Spanish army; and, as the place was not tenable, and he had little ammunition, he was obliged, after a short but vigorous resistance, to capitulate, and surrender himself and all his forces prisoners of war.

The two armies having approached very near to each other, the imperialists lay on their arms the whole night of the 28th at Villa Viciosa; and, on the morning of the 29th, they were attacked by the Spaniards, much superior in force. The battle was fought with great valour but doubtful success. Staremberg's left wing was utterly defeated, but the right, where he commanded in person, not only maintained their ground but compelled the enemy finally to retire from the field, with the loss of 6000 men, to which his own bore so large a proportion that he found it requisite to abandon Arragon, and retreat to Catalonia; and being closely pursued by the Duc de Vendome, he was at last driven to take shelter under the walls of Barcelona. The important towns of Balaguer and Gironne were also reduced before the end of the campaign to the obedience of Philip, who, from the condition of a fugitive, became in three months absolute master of the whole Spanish monarchy, some places in Catalonia only excepted.

Early in July, the Marquis de Bay surprised the town of Miranda de Duero, in Portugal, and afterwards formed the blockade of Braganza without effect. The Spanish army retiring within the line of their own frontier, on the approach of the allies, the Portuguese made themselves masters of some fortified posts of little consideration. Some time before this, the Earl of Galway had obtained leave to return to England. His enemies, finding it impossible to bring his honour or his courage into question, as vainly endeavoured to impeach his conduct and judgment.

General Stanhope now owned, that nothing could be done more in Spain; and Lord Peterborough was impressed with the same important truth.

On the 25th of November, the new Parliament assembled. It was composed almost wholly of Tories; Mr. Bromley was chosen speaker with scarcely any opposition. In her speech, the Queen recommended the carrying on the war in all its parts, "particularly in Spain," with the utmost vigour.

The Duke of Marlborough arrived in London, in December, and was received with the usual popular acclamation. Strongly solicited by the States General and the Emperor to continue in the command, he seemed resolved to acquiesce in the new order of things; but, convinced at length, that the Duchess of Marlborough must relinquish every hope of regaining the lost affection of the Queen, he carried (January 19, 1711) a surrender of all her places to his sovereign, who divided them between the Duchess of Somerset and Mrs. Masham.*

The House of Commons, actuated by party spirit, eagerly sought occasions to display their hatred to the principles and persons of their predecessors. In pursuance of the report of a committee instituted for examining into the public accounts, they voted, "That of the moneys granted by Parliament, thirty-five millions remained unaccounted for." Mr. Mainwaring, however, auditor of the imprest, published a satisfactory answer to the report, by which it appeared, that of the thirty-five millions, above thirty were accounted for; although from official impediments, the accounts were not formally passed: that, in order to swell the amount, arrears due from the reign of King William, and even of Charles II. were included: and that in no time were accounts so regularly brought up as under the administration of Lord Godolphin. The House of Commons nevertheless, presented a subsequent address to the Queen, in which this accusation was repeated; and, for the sake of offering an indignity to the memory of King William, they ordered in a bill empowering commissioners to examine all grants made by that monarch, and to report the value of them, and the considerations

* The Duke was told "That he had nothing to reproach the present ministers with; that his wife, Lord Godolphin, and himself, had thrown the Queen's favour away; and that he ought not to be angry if other people had taken it up." He never brought the key till he had but three days given him to do it in; and till he found there a longer delay was not to be hoped for from the Queen's resolution.

upon which they were bestowed. This however was rejected by the Upper House.

The Tories having now obtained an ascendancy in the Lords, in consequence of the accession of the sixteen Scottish Peers, came to a resolution, "That the Earl of Peterborough had given a very faithful, just, and honourable account of the councils of war in Valencia; and that the adoption of the opinion of the Earl of Galway, and General Stanhope, for the prosecution of offensive measures, was the unhappy occasion of the battle of Almanza, and our consequent misfortunes in Spain:" and the Earl of Peterborough was thanked for his great and eminent services. A strong protest, however, was entered against this resolution, signed by thirty-six Peers.

About this time, a person calling himself the Marquis de Guiscard, a French refugee, who had been refused, or deprived of a pension by Mr. Harley, being subsequently apprehended on a just suspicion of carrying on a treasonable correspondence with France, and examined before the Council Board, made a sudden and desperate attempt to stab him in the breast with a penknife. Fortunately, the knife alighting on the bone, broke short, and the hurt was comparatively slight. Guiscard was secured, though not without some difficulty, and after receiving several wounds, of which he soon after died in prison. On this event an act was passed, declaring an attempt on the life of a privy counsellor to be felony; and both Houses of Parliament joined in an address to the Queen, expressing their great concern for this barbarous and villainous attempt on the person of Mr. Harley, whose fidelity to her Majesty, and zeal for her service, had drawn upon him the hatred of all the abettors of Popery and faction. Another circumstance, favourable to the views of Mr. Harley, was the sudden death of the Earl of Rochester, between whom and Harley strong symptoms of jealousy and competition had already appeared. Mr. Harley was immediately raised to the dignity of Lord High Treasurer, and created Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer.

Parliament was prorogued on the 12th of June.*

Joseph, Emperor of the Romans, died about this period. His death was an event of great political importance, as it afforded a fair opening to renew the overtures for a general peace. In April this year died also the Dauphin of France, only son of the King, in the 50th year of his age. His eldest son, the Duke of Burgundy, succeeded to the rank and title of Dauphin, but did not retain them many months, as he died, to the great grief of the French nation, early in the ensuing year.

By his incessant intrigues and machinations at the Porte, the King of Sweden had prevailed upon the Grand Seignor, Achmet III. to declare war against Muscovy. The czar, advancing with indiscretion and dangerous contempt of his enemy, far into the Turkish territories, was surrounded by the grand vizir in his camp near the banks of the Pruth, his supplies cut off, and he himself reduced to the necessity of purchasing a peace by the sacrifice of Asoph and his other conquests. In Germany, the King of Denmark unsuccessfully attempted the sieges of Stralsund and Wismar, and he incurred the disgrace of violating the peace, without obtaining any commensurate advantage.

In May, the Duke of Marlborough appeared for the last time at the head of the grand army in Flanders—Prince Eugene commanding a separate body of forces on the Rhine. This campaign was not distinguished on the part of the English, by brilliant success, but it attracted uncommon attention, as exhibiting consummate proofs of military skill and conduct.†

On the Rhine, in Italy, and in Spain, where the Duke of Argyle had succeeded General Stanhope, nothing of moment was attempted on either side The imperial diet assembling at Frankfort under the protection of Prince Eugene, proceeded quietly to the election of an Emperor; and the votes of the electors of Bavaria and Cologne, who were under the ban of the empire, being previously rejected, the electoral college made choice of Charles King of Spain, brother to the late Emperor; who, in the prospect of his new dignity, having quitted Barcelona in September, was crowned at Frankfort with the usual ceremonies.

In the course of the summer, the French, whose marine had gradually fallen into decay since the battle off Malaga, unexpectedly fitted out a considerable squadron under M. Du Guai Trouin, destined for Brazil. Having entered the bay of Rio de Janeiro, he compelled the Portuguese to run ashore, and set several of their ships on fire; after which he made himself master of the town of St. Sebastian, where he found a prodigious booty. On the other hand, an expedition of a somewhat similar nature, set on foot by the new ministers in England, succeeded very ill. The French settlement of Port Royal in the Peninsula of Acadia in North America had been taken possession of by Colonel Nicholson, who gave it the appellation of Annapolis. A design was now formed for the capture of Quebec, the capital of French America; and 5000 troops were put under the command of Brigadier Hill—brother to the favourite, Mrs. Masham—convoyed by a strong squadron under Sir Hovenden Walker. After various delays the fleet entered the gulf of St. Laurence in August; expecting a powerful co-operation from the colonial forces, who were to join them by way of Albany. Before they could reach the city of Quebec, however, they were overtaken by a violent storm, and enveloped in so thick a fog, that they entirely lost sight of land,

* The convocation, which met at the same time with the Parliament, chose the famous Atterbury prolocutor. Soon after, the Queen sent them a licence under the great seal, to sit and do business in as ample a manner as had been ever granted since the Reformation. By this licence they were empowered to enter upon such consultations as the present state of the church required, and especially of such matters as she should lay before them. Immediately a committee was appointed to draw up a representation of the present state of religion and the church, which contained a most virulent declamation against the government from the time of the revolution. This was ascribed to the pen of Atterbury; but the Bishops disapproving the terms in which it was framed, a contest between the two Houses ensued. Their attention, however, was soon diverted to another topic. Whiston, the famous mathematical professor at Cambridge, had recently published a book, in which he attempted to revive and defend the ancient Arian heresy; for which he was expelled the university. Upon this, he wrote a vindication of his doctrine, and dedicated it to the convocation; for which astonishing instance of effrontery, the orthodox sons of the church determined to make him feel the effects of their resentment. But the Archbishop Tennison, a mild and tolerant prelate, stated it as a doubt whether this assembly had any clear warrant for proceeding criminally against a man for heresy. The judges being consulted, were divided in opinion; eight affirming, with some hesitation, that they could; and four with great confidence, that they could not proceed in such a case. With the terrible penalties of a præmunire in prospect, it was necessary therefore to act very cautiously: and their Lordships satisfied themselves with extracting certain propositions from the book in question, which they censured as false and heretical; in which the Lower House concurred. This the Archbishop transmitted to the Queen for her assent, who promised to consider of it; but she did not send any answer during the sitting of the convocation. Neither at their next meeting in the ensuing winter did the expected answer appear. Two Bishops being at length deputed to ask for it, she declared, that she could not tell what was become of the Archbishop's paper. So a new extract of the censure was again sent to her: but no answer ever arrived, and Whiston's affair remained undecided.

† Marechal Villars had with great labour and perseverance drawn lines from Bouchaine on the Scheldt along the Sanset and Scarpe to Arras and Cauche, which he had fortified by redoubts, batteries, and other military works, in such a manner that he hesitated not to boast that they were impregnable, and that the English commander had arrived at his "ne plus ultra." The Duke, however, boldly advanced within two leagues of the French lines; and Villars drew his whole force on that side, in expectation of an immediate engagement. The Duke had previously given orders to Generals Cadogan and Hompesch, with a strong detachment secretly drawn from the neighbouring garrisons, to take possession of the passes on the river Sanset at Arleux. At nine in the evening the Duke silently decamped; and by eight the next morning he arrived at Arleux with his whole army, after a march of ten leagues, without halting. Villars, on being certified of the Duke's motions within a few hours of his departure, marched all night with such expedition, that at eleven the next morning he was in sight of the Duke of Marlborough, who, to his unspeakable mortification, had, as Villars now found, entered those lines which he had himself vauntingly pronounced impregnable, without the loss of a man. The Duke immediately invested the important fortress of Bouchaine, which surrendered after twenty days' open trenches only. This admired and hazardous military achievement closed the long glories of this celebrated commander, who, at the critical moment in which he had almost penetrated the French barrier, and when another Ramillies might have removed all obstacles in his march to Paris, was divested of all the civil and military employments which he had filled with so much glory to himself and to his country.

and could find no soundings or anchorage. The men of war escaped with extreme hazard, but eight transports were lost with their crews and stores; and when the weather cleared up, it was agreed to return home without making any further attempt. They accordingly arrived at Portsmouth early in October.*

During the recess of Parliament, Lord Raby, head of the family of Wentworth-Woodhouse in Yorkshire, long resident at Berlin, was created Earl of Strafford, and sent ambassador to Holland; Sir Simon Harcourt was created Baron Harcourt, and soon after Lord Chancellor; the Duke of Hamilton was admitted to the honours of the English peerage, under the title of Duke of Brandon; the Bishop of Bristol, on the decease of the Duke of Newcastle, was constituted Lord Privy Seal; and the Duke of Buckingham, being made president of the council in the room of the Earl of Rochester, was succeeded in the office of Lord Steward by Earl Paulet, who had been superseded in the treasury by the late promotion of Mr. Harley.† The Earl of Oxford, aware of the unpopularity of the war, had from the first moment of his accession to power, formed the determination to conclude a peace with France; a determination which he manifested too strongly and eagerly not to afford great advantage to a politic and penetrating adversary. The King of France received this intimation with an affectation of indifference, and absolutely refused to resume the negotiations with Holland. However, in a memorial transmitted by M. de Torcy to the court of London, in April 1711, he declared his willingness to treat through the medium of England; and the States General acknowledged themselves ready to join in any measures to obtain a good peace. The whole of the summer was spent in an interchange of messages; and towards the autumn the negotiation became accidentally public, in consequence of the unexpected arrest of one of the government agents, Mr. Prior, at Deal, for want of a passport. Count Gallas, the imperial ambassador, expostulating upon this occasion with the Earl of Oxford, was assured that there was no ground of alarm; for that the Queen would never conclude a peace derogatory from her engagements with her allies. But M. Mesnager, who accompanied Mr. Prior from Paris, being invested with full powers on the part of the most Christian King, provisional articles were actually agreed upon, September the 27th, 1711, O. S. between Great Britain and France, and signed by the two secretaries of state.‡ Five days after the departure of M. Mesnager, the ministers communicated the provisional articles to Count Gallas, who treated them with much scorn, and caused an English translation of them to be published in a paper called The Daily Courant.§

Great and just offence was taken at his thus disclosing the circumstances of a pending negotiation; and an order was sent him, forbidding his appearance at court. The States General, to whom no communications had been made for many months, were scarcely less dissatisfied than the court of Vienna at the tenor of these provisional articles, which they considered as a very insufficient foundation to build upon; and it was not without great reluctance, that their high mightinesses agreed to open the conferences afresh at Utrecht, on the 1st of January, 1712. The Emperor, on his part, wrote a circular letter to the Electors and Princes of the empire, exhorting them to persist in the engagements of the grand alliance. To obviate any disagreeable consequences from the resentment of the Emperor, Queen Anne had sent Earl Rivers to Hanover, to assure the Elector that his interests would be particularly attended to; but his serene highness, notwithstanding, expressed his total disapprobation of the measures in question; and he also ordered his minister, Baron Bothmar, to deliver to Mr. St. John a memorial, which soon afterwards appeared in the public prints, representing the pernicious consequences of leaving Spain and the Indies in the hands of the Duke of Anjou. This indiscreet step, applauded as it was by the Whig party, produced no other effect, than to give extreme umbrage to the court of London, and to lay the foundation of a dangerous misunderstanding between the Queen and her successor.

By a separate and secret instrument signed the same day with the provisional articles, certain additional specific advantages were stipulated for Great Britain: viz. the confirmation of Gibraltar and Minorca, and the cession of the island of St. Christopher.‖

The Pretender, knowing the coldness subsisting between the courts of London and Hanover, was at this time emboldened to address the Queen, in a letter, urging her, as she tendered her own honour and happiness, to do him that justice to which he was entitled; in which case he assured her that no reasonable terms of accommodation which she could desire for herself should be refused by him—and declaring his readiness to give all the security that could be desired, of his

* Scarcely had they reached the harbour, when the Admiral's ship, the Edgar of seventy guns, by some accident blew up, with a great number of persons on board, exclusive of the ship's crew.

† A singular occurrence took place about this time in Scotland. The Duchess of Gordon, a violent female politician, noted for her attachment to the banished family, sent as a present to the faculty of advocates at Edinburgh, a medal with a head on the right side and this legend, "Cujus est?" and on the reverse the British islands, with this motto, "Reddite." A debate arising whether this curious donation should be received, the affirmative was carried by sixty-three voices against twelve; and Mr. Dundas of Arnistoun, in the name of the faculty, returned her grace most hearty thanks for this medal of their sovereign Lord the King—"hoping and being confident that her grace would very soon have an opportunity to compliment the faculty with a second medal, struck upon the restoration of the monarch and the termination of rebellion." Advice being transmitted of this act of effrontery to the Duke of Queensberry, Secretary of State for Scotland, and M. Kreyenberg, the Hanoverian resident, making it the subject of a formal memorial, the Lord Advocate, Sir David Dalrymple, a known friend to the Protestant succession, was dismissed from his office, on pretence of remissness in not prosecuting the Scottish medalists: while Dundas was allowed to escape, notwithstanding his printing a vindication of his conduct, still more impudent and treasonable than his former proceedings. This affair was represented by the enemies of the ministry as a decisive proof of their secret bias in favour of the Pretender; and by their friends, as a trivial and idle business, unworthy of serious notice.

‡ It has been asserted that M. Mesnager, by the instigation or encouragement of Mr. St. John, spoke to the Queen in favour of the Pretender, whom he called "her brother;" and that she did not seem displeased at his discourse. But this is not confirmed by his own account of the negotiation. Indeed the official instructions of M. Mesnager were not such as were likely to incite him to urge this topic with much earnestness or ardour. "It will be acceptable to me," said Louis, on delivering to him his commission, "if you can render the young King any service, and bring the new ministry and Queen into his interest, and make way for his being placed on the throne after the Queen. But remember, if the main affair of the treaty requires it, and the Queen insists upon it, you must give him up to his better fortunes. We must not be ruined on his account. "Entendez vous?" said the King twice together.

§ The articles were seven in number, importing, 1stly, the acknowledgment of the Queen of Great Britain and the Protestant succession in the house of Hanover; 2dly, an engagement to take all just and reasonable measures to prevent the union of the crowns of France and Spain. The third respects an eventual treaty of commerce. The fourth contains a promise of a secure barrier for Holland; the fifth, the same on the side of the empire; the sixth, the demolition of Dunkirk; the seventh, a vague engagement that the pretensions of all the Princes and States engaged in the war shall be amicably discussed and regulated. These loose and general conditions excited universal surprise and distrust.

‖ Considerable difficulties arose in the course of the negotiation respecting the second provisional article—the King of Spain being extremely reluctant to relinquish his right of succession to the crown of France, which by the recent death of the Dauphin, late Duke of Burgundy, would by the laws of France devolve upon him on the demise of the only surviving son of the Duke. In this case the King of Spain proposed that the Spanish monarchy should be transferred to the Duke of Orleans, first Prince of the blood, while he himself succeeded to the crown of France. Louis supported him in his claim: the Marquis de Torcy urging, "That no act of renunciation would invalidate the sacred unalienable right of succession, being founded on a fundamental law, which (said he) we in France are persuaded that God alone can abolish." To this reasoning Mr. St. John replied, "We are willing to believe that you in France are convinced that God alone can abolish that law, upon which the rights of your succession are founded; but you will permit us in England to be also convinced that a Prince can go from his right by a voluntary cession of it; and that he in favour of whom this renunciation is made, may be justly supported in his pretensions by the powers who become guarantees to the treaty." This reasoning, corroborated by a peremptory declaration that the negotiation should be suspended till the solemn renunciations required were assented to, was found too cogent to be resisted; and the renunciations were ultimately executed by the King of Spain, and the Princes of the blood in France, in all the legal and diplomatic forms.

unalterable resolution to make the law of the land the rule of his government—to maintain the church of England in its just rights and privileges; but without giving the slightest intimation or hope that he might be induced to change his religion. To this letter it does not appear that any answer was given.

The Queen, in her speech to the two Houses, (Dec. 7, 1711) expressed her joy in being able to inform them, that, notwithstanding the arts of those who delighted in war, both time and place had been appointed for opening the treaty of a general peace. An address of thanks being proposed, the Earl of Nottingham moved that a clause might be added to the address, representing to her Majesty, "That in the opinion of that House, no peace could be safe or honourable to Great Britain or Europe, if Spain and the Indies were allotted to any branch of the house of Bourbon." This gave rise to a violent debate. The Duke of Marlborough, conceiving himself to be invidiously pointed at in the speech from the throne, affirmed, "that he could declare with a safe conscience, in the presence of her Majesty, of that illustrious assembly, and of that Supreme Being who is infinitely above all the powers upon earth, and before whom, according to the ordinary course of nature, he must soon appear to give an account of his actions, that he ever was desirous of a safe, honourable, and lasting peace; and that he was far from any design of prolonging the war for his own private advantage, as his enemies had most falsely insinuated. That his advanced age, and the many fatigues he had undergone, made him earnestly wish for retirement and repose, having already honours and riches heaped upon him far beyond his desert or expectation. But that he was, in duty to his country and to his sovereign, bound to declare his opinion, that no treaty of pacification, either honourable, safe, or lasting, could be concluded on the foundation of the seven preliminary articles." The previous question being put upon the motion of the Earl of Nottingham, it was carried in the affirmative by a single vote, and the main question by eight voices (sixty-two to fifty-four) against the utmost efforts of the court.* On presenting the address, her Majesty coldly replied, that "she should be very sorry any one could think she would not do her utmost to recover Spain and the West Indies from the house of Bourbon." On the other hand the address of the Commons was expressed in the highest strain of satisfaction and loyalty, a clause similar to that of the Earl of Nottingham being rejected by a majority of 232 voices against 106.

The ministers appear to have been desirous of fixing some stigma upon the character of the Duke of Marlborough; and it appearing on the report of the commissioners of public accounts, framed in a spirit of party rancour, that he had received, in the capacity of commander in chief, certain perquisites, not indeed recognised by Parliament, but authorised by precedent, and out of which the whole expence of secret service was defrayed, it was resolved by the House, that the sums so applied ought to be accounted for as public property; and in the sequel the Queen ordered the attorney-general to commence a prosecution against the Duke for money actually received by virtue of her own warrant.

The occasional conformity bill, which had miscarried three times, and had lain dormant for seven years, was passed this session, through a political manœuvre of the Earl of Nottingham.

During the Christmas recess of 1711, matters having then attained sufficient maturity, the Duke of Marlborough was dismissed from all his employments, by a letter under the Queen's own hand; the charges brought against him in the House of Commons, respecting the perquisites received by his grace as commander-in-chief of the forces of Great Britain, being made the pretext for his disgrace. The Duke, in answer, told the Queen, "That if the inveteracy of his enemies had not been more powerful with them than the consideration of her Majesty's honour and justice, they would not have influenced her to impute the occasion of his dismission to a false and malicious insinuation, contrived by themselves, and made public when there was no opportunity for him to give in his answer."

A. D. 1712.] Very dangerous schemes and projects occupied the Whig party from this period, and gave rise to still more dangerous designs on the part of the furious on the opposite side. The command of the Queen's forces in Flanders was, on the dismission of the Duke of Marlborough, offered to the elector of Hanover; which he, as was foreseen, refusing to accept, the Duke of Ormond was appointed Captain-General of all her Majesty's forces at home and abroad. The Whig interest still preponderating in the Lords, a resolution was taken to create twelve new Peers, to secure a majority for the court.†

The 2d of January (1712) the twelve new Peers were introduced into the House; and the Scotch Lords being now also arrived, the court acquired a decided and permanent majority.

Ministers were embarrassed at this time by an unexpected and unwelcome visit from Prince Eugene, who, on the dismission of Count Gallas, was charged with instructions from the Emperor to represent to the Queen in terms the most urgent, the fatal consequences which would attend the defection of England from the alliance, and to propose a new plan for the future conduct of the war, in which his Imperial Majesty would take upon himself a larger proportion of the burthen than had been required from his predecessors, Leopold and Joseph. The remonstrances of his highness produced no effect; but he was treated with all the external demonstrations of esteem and respect by the Queen, and entertained with great magnificence by the ministers, particularly by the Lord Treasurer, who, it is said, declared in polite terms to the Prince the pride he felt in having for his guest the first General in Europe. "If I am," said his highness, "it is to your lordship I am indebted for it"—alluding to the recent dismission of the Duke of Marlborough. The Prince received, however, positive assurances of concurrence in a vigorous prosecution of the war.

Mr. Walpole, late Secretary at War, having rendered himself extremely obnoxious to the Tories, advantage was taken of an act of his, when in office, to expel him from the House, and also to commit him to the Tower. It appears that Mr. Walpole, in contracting with certain persons for the article of forage, was desirous that a friend might be admitted to a participation of the profits; in lieu of which, the contractors agreed to give him five hundred guineas. The name of the person being concealed, a bill for the amount was paid into Mr. Walpole's hands and indorsed by him. No part of the money was retained by Walpole; but the House nevertheless voted the acceptance of it to be an act of corruption, and proceeded to expulsion and commitment. The censures of the House were treated by the friends of Mr. Walpole with contempt, and he was immediately rechosen by the borough of Lynn Regis. Upon which the House came to the following remarkable resolution, "that Robert Walpole, Esq. having been this session of Parliament committed a prisoner to the Tower of London, and expelled this House for a high breach of trust in the execution of his office, and notorious corruption when Secretary at War, was

* The ascendancy of the opposition in the Peers conspicuously shewed itself, on another occasion, to the great chagrin of the court. The Duke of Hamilton, lately created Duke of Brandon, claiming the place which appertained to him in that quality, was opposed by many of the English Lords, who conceived such assumption to be incompatible with the act of union, as giving a power to the crown to introduce a greater number of Scotch Peers into the House than were allowed by the act. After a vehement debate, the claim of the Duke was rejected, notwithstanding the precedent of the Duke of Queensberry admitted to sit as Duke of Dover, by fifty-seven to fifty-two voices. The Scotch Peers were much enraged at this determination; and signed a representation to the Queen, complaining of it as a breach of the union, and a mark of disgrace put upon the whole peerage of Scotland, who were thus stigmatised as the only description of persons in the realm incapable of being admitted to the honours of the English peerage.

† Sir Miles Wharton, being offered a peerage on this occasion, rejected it with disdain, saying, "that formerly peerages were the reward of services done, but now it appeared they were merely a compensation for services to be done."

and is incapable of being elected a member to serve in this present Parliament."

As it had been a great object with the late Whig ministers to obtain the guarantee of Holland in support of the Protestant succession, it was no less a favourite point with the States that England should guaranty to them in return the quiet possession of their barrier in Flanders. A treaty containing these reciprocal conditions was signed by Lord Townshend at the Hague, October 29, 1709, wherein the barrier was settled to consist not merely of various places acknowledging the sovereignty of the crown of Spain, but of several very important towns captured during the course of the war from France—as Lisle, Tournay, Menin, and Douay. This treaty was regarded by the present ministers as a grand obstacle in the way of peace, which could not too soon be removed; and though it had been solemnly ratified by the Queen, it was now condemned without reserve by the Commons, who came to divers resolutions upon the subject, importing:

1st. "That in the treaty for settling a barrier, &c. under colour of securing the Protestant succession, were several articles destructive to the interest of Great Britain, and highly dishonourable to her Majesty.

2dly. "That Lord Viscount Townshend had not any orders or authority for negociating or concluding several articles in that treaty.

3dly. "That the Lord Viscount Townshend, who signed, and all those who advised the ratifying of that treaty, were enemies to the Queen and kingdom."

The States General, astonished and alarmed at these proceedings, wrote a respectful letter to the Queen, stating the necessity of a powerful barrier for the security of England as well as Holland, and expressing their readiness to explain or modify any articles of the treaty which should not essentially affect the preservation of the Dutch nation, and entreating her Majesty to continue towards them that precious friendship and good will with which she had hitherto honoured them. The House of Commons, however, in an inflammatory representation to the Queen, charged the allies in general, and the States General in particular, with having been grossly deficient in furnishing their quotas of men and money; and, in answer to the various memorials of the States, they received only a cold and vague assurance from the Queen, that she would contribute what was in her power towards their satisfaction, without abandoning the interest of her own kingdoms.

One of the most laudable measures of this Parliament was the bill of granting a toleration to the Scottish episcopalians. Seventeen members only divided against this measure; and of these fourteen were Scotch. The bill passed, with a remarkable clause prohibiting the magistrates of Scotland in future to execute the sentences of the judicatories of the kirk, which was by this means divested of its temporal terrors. This bill was accompanied by another for restoring the right of patronage.

It was about this time, that the first symptoms began to be visible of a coldness and jealousy between the Treasurer and the Secretary, which seem to have originated at the period when Oxford being for a time incapacitated for business by the wound he received from Guiscard, the sole management of affairs devolved on Mr. St. John.*

The first day of the new year had been nominated for opening the Congress at Utrecht, but the conferences did not commence till the 29th of January, 1712; when the Bishop of Bristol, Lord Privy Seal, repairing to the appointed place in great pomp, addressed the assembly in a set speech, particularly and earnestly recommending "clearness, openness, and sincerity, in the conduct of the present negotiation." The propositions signed by M. Mesnager were declared to be the basis of the treaty; for the Congress had not the least notice or intimation of the provincial articles signed on the part of France and England. The ministers of France delivered in their projet of peace February 11th, and it was couched in so high a strain as to excite the greatest amazement.† On the other hand, a contre-projet was given in on the part of the allies, in which the English plenipotentiaries, in contradiction to the secret preliminaries, joined with the rest of the confederate powers in demanding the restitution of the whole Spanish monarchy to the House of Austria; and a specific answer in writing was insisted upon by the French ministers. This the Marechal d'Uxelles refused, and proposed to enter into verbal conferences upon the subject. Upon this difference, the negotiation seemed for many weeks at a stand. The Dutch ministers resuming the language which they had before held, the abbé Polignac disdainfully replied.—"Gentlemen, circumstances are changed, and we shall change our tone: we have been betrayed through you, and by you." In the course of the negotiation, M. Vanderdussen, one of the Dutch plenipotentiaries, urging upon M. de Polignac the releasement of the Protestants confined in the galleys as a condition of the peace, that minister, so celebrated for his wit and address, asked whether the States would, at the request of France, set at liberty the people detained in their spinning-houses and rasp-houses? To which the Dutchman happily answered, "Yes, if the French court would acknowledge those malefactors as brethren."—About this period, Mr. Thomas Harley, a near relation of the Treasurer, and the abbé Gualtier, an obscure priest, arrived at Utrecht, by whom a plan for a general peace was imparted to the English plenipotentiaries, without the least communication with the rest of the allies. Only the Dutch were vehemently urged, "to come into the Queen's measures; otherwise she would consider herself as discharged from all obligation towards them." The States at length thought proper to send a solemn deputation to the Earl of Strafford (April 28,) to know authoritatively what the Queen's measures were. But this nobleman declined to enter into particulars, declaring nevertheless, "that her Majesty's intentions were that her troops should act with the same vigour against France as if there were no negociation on foot."

The confederate army took the field in April under the Prince of Savoy, whom their high mightinesses had appointed Captain General of their forces. The Duke of Ormond, arriving at the Hague nearly at the same time, gave all possible assurances to the pensionary of

* So long since as May 1711, the Secretary wrote to Lord Orrery, resident at Brussels: "Mr. Harley, since his recovery, has not appeared at the Council or at the Treasury at all, and very seldom in the House of Commons. We who are reported to be in his intimacy have few opportunities of seeing him, and none of talking freely with him. As he is the only true channel through which the Queen's pleasure is conveyed, so there is and must be a perfect stagnation till he is pleased to open himself, and set the water flowing." In a following letter he declares the Treasurer "to be wanting in that grace and openness which engages the affection:" and at a later period, April 1712, he mentions him with disgust, as "affecting secrecy and concealment in some important points of the negociation." In his dispatch of July 23d. he breaks out into the most undisguised and impassionate terms of hatred. His own recent promotion to the peerage he ascribes to envy on the part of Oxford. "In the House of Commons," says he, "I was at the head of business, and I must have continued so whether I had been in court, or out of court. There seems to be nothing done for my sake, or as a mark of favour to me. I own to you that I felt more indignation than ever in my life I had done: and the only consideration which kept me from running to extremities, was, that I knew any appearance of breach between myself and the Lord Treasurer would give our common enemies spirit."

† The abbé de Polignac, one of the plenipotentiaries, had previously declared the propositions made at Gertruydenberg—to which the imperial minister, Count Zinzendorf, wished to advert—to be no longer existing; and all the King of France now offered was, to recognise the title of Queen of Great Britain, and the succession of the crown in the House of Hanover, at the signing of the peace; to demolish the fortifications of Dunkirk for a satisfactory equivalent, to cede the islands of St. Christopher, Hudsons's Bay, and Newfoundland, excepting Placentia, to England; and to add to the present Dutch barrier the towns of Furnes, Ypres, Menin, and Fort Knoque. At the same time his Most Christian Majesty demanded, in order to form the barrier of France, Aire, St. Venant, Bethune, and Douay, with their dependencies; that the frontier on the side of the empire and of Italy should be the same as before the war—or, in other words, that Landau, Fenestrella, and Exilles, should be restored to France—that the Low Countries should be given to the Elector of Bavaria; and that Lisle and Tournay should be considered as the equivalent for Dunkirk. Finally, his Most Christian Majesty engaged, that the King of Spain do relinquish all his pretensions to Naples, Sardinia, and Milan, in favour of the Emperor.

a cordial and confidential co-operation with the allies, and especially the Dutch. On the subsequent junction of the armies, a good understanding seemed to prevail between the two Generals; and about the middle of May, the Prince proposing to pass the Scheldt and attack the French, or, if they appeared too strongly posted, to invest the town of Quesnoy, it was assented to by the Duke without hesitation. Within a few days, however, after this movement had taken place, the Duke of Ormond received positive orders from Mr. Secretary St. John to avoid engaging in any siege or hazarding a battle; and desiring at the same time, to disguise the receipt of this order—adding, that it had been communicated to the court of France; and if M. Villars should take any private notice of it, the Duke was to answer accordingly. Notwithstanding the violence of his party zeal, the Duke's noble and ingenuous nature revolted from the execution of the infamous task imposed upon him. In his answer to Mr. St. John (May the 25th) he promised obedience and secresy; but he declared "the difficulty of disguising the true reason of his conduct, having no excuse for delays." Upon receiving a letter from M. Villars, congratulating him on the intelligence which had just reached him from Paris, "that they were to be no longer enemies," he signified to the Marechal the orders he also had received from the Queen of England. On the 8th of June, having been strongly pressed to co-operate actively with the allies, he stated to Mr. St. John "the extreme uneasiness of his situation. Many of the allies scrupled not openly to say, they were betrayed. If he was restrained from action, he saw no use in remaining in his present situation, and he desired leave to return to England. But in all things he professed to submit to her Majesty's pleasure." It was impossible that such proceedings abroad should pass without notice or animadversion at home, On the 7th of June, N. S. the Baron de Hohendorf, on the part of the court of Vienna, and M. Van Borselen on that of the Hague, held conferences with the Lord Treasurer; and in the sequel, orders were dispatched to the Duke of Ormond to concur with the General of the allies in a siege. On the same day the Earl of Hallifax moved, in the House of Peers, an address to the throne, requesting a copy of the orders transmitted to the Duke of Ormond, and beseeching that he might be ordered to act offensively in concert with the allies. In the debate which ensued, the Lord Treasurer declared the orders moved for not proper to be divulged; that he would however venture to say, that if the Duke of Ormond had refused to act offensively he did not doubt but he had followed his instructions; but he could be positive he would not decline joining the allies in a siege. In vindication, however, of the honour of the ministry, who were even publicly accused, of the design to make a separate peace, the Lord Treasurer assured the House that nothing of that nature was ever intended, and that such a peace would be so base, so knavish, and so villainous a thing, that every one who served the Queen knew they must answer it with their heads to the nation. Forty Peers voted in support of the motion of Lord Halifax, and sixty-eight in opposition to it, upon which a most animated protest was signed by twenty-five Peers, declaring "the order of restraint under which they were convinced the Duke of Ormond lay, to be derogatory to her Majesty's honour, to public faith, and that justice which was due to her allies." This protest was immediately printed, and circulated on the Continent in French and other languages, to the great chagrin of the government, which in vain offered a large reward for the discovery of the printer or publisher.

The Queen came to the House of Peers on the 17th of June, and stated to the two Houses, the terms on which peace might be made; for such was the caution of the Lord Treasurer, that he was determined to conclude nothing without the previous sanction of Parliament. An address of thanks and approbation was obtained from the Commons without difficulty; but a very warm debate took place in the House of Peers. The proposed address contained an assurance "that the House did entirely rely on her Majesty's wisdom to finish the great and good work of peace." An amendment was moved that these words might be added, "and in order to that her Majesty would take such measures, in concert with her allies, as might induce them to join with her Majesty in a mutual guarantee." This was rejected by eighty-one voices against thirty-six. But a protest equally forcible with the former was signed by twenty-four Peers.* The session terminated on the 2d of July.

Quesnoy had been invested on the 8th of June; and the Duke of Ormond not having received his last instructions, was with difficulty prevailed upon to furnish sixteen battalions of troops, to join the besieging army. This occasioned a secret expostulation from M. Villars; but the Duke being now free to act, took a proper position to cover the siege. Villars, astonished at this conduct, wrote to the Duke desiring positive information whether the army under his command would oppose any attempt which the King's forces would certainly make upon Prince Eugene's if he continued the siege, adding, that "the King, while he sees Prince Eugene undertaking a siege, and knows the army under his Grace ought not to act directly or indirectly against his, would be very much displeased with him if he should continue inactive." Quesnoy, however, remained closely invested, and the Duke still continued to cover the siege; so that both the French and the allied armies might complain of the treachery of the English councils.

On the 18th of June, (the day succeeding that wherein the Queen made her declaration concerning the terms of peace to the two Houses) Mr. St. John wrote to the Duke informing him, that the Queen insisted on the execution of the article relating to Spain, and on the delivery of Dunkirk, as points without which she would not declare for a cessation of arms in the Netherlands; but if these conditions were accepted, and sent signed by the Marquis de Torcy to his Grace, and Dunkirk put into his possession, he was publicly to own that he could act no longer against the French. The Duke having received a copy of the articles from M. de Torcy accordingly, he, on the 25th of June, visited Prince Eugene and the deputies of the States as he had previously concerted with Marechal Villars. In this conference he stated to the Imperial General that the French King having acceded to the demands of the Queen, and among others the giving up Dunkirk as a pledge, he could no longer cover the siege of Quesnoy: being obliged by his instructions to march with the Queen's troops and those in her pay, and to declare a cessation of arms as soon as Dunkirk was delivered up. This intelligence was received by the Prince and his deputies with indescribable indignation.†

* Some of the expressions contained in this second protest were so offensive to the majority, that it was a few days afterwards moved and carried by ninety voices against sixty-four, the largest number of Peers who had voted upon any question in the present reign, that the protest should be expunged from the journals of the House. But, like the former, it was printed and published in defiance of the orders and menaces of the House.

† His Highness told the English General that the secession of the English troops and forces in British pay would leave them to the mercy of the French: but that he was sure the foreigners would not march. He expostulated with him on the unparalleled baseness of this violation of national faith and honour, and the danger and ruin which might ensue upon this desertion. The Duke was immoveable; and finding, on his subsequent communications with the Generals of the foreign troops in British pay, that they would obey no orders incompatible with the safety of the confederate army, and the common interests of the allies, he sent to M. Villars to apprize him of their determination. Such indeed was the odium attached to the conduct of the English General, that M. Villars having at this period caused several bridges to be thrown over the Senset, a universal surmise prevailed that he waited only till the Duke of Ormond marched off, an event concerning which it was presumed he would receive very correct notice, in order to attack the confederate army, and orders were issued to General Hompesch, Governor of Douay, and to other neighbouring garrisons, that the English troops designed for Dunkirk should not be permitted to enter their gates. An ultimate attempt having been made on the part of the English General to dissuade the Prince from prosecuting the siege of Quesnoy, to which his highness

On the 28th of June the Duke of Ormond ordered the British forces and the troops in British pay to hold themselves in readiness to march. The answer from the foreign Generals imported that they could not separate from Prince Eugene without express orders from their respective Princes: the hereditary Prince of Hesse Cassel, afterwards King of Sweden, adding, that the Hessians desired nothing more eagerly than to march, provided it were to fight the French. On the 4th of July Quesnoy surrendered, the garrison consisting of near three thousand men being made prisoners of war. Upon the succeeding day the Duke of Ormond received an express from Mr. St. John, ordering him for the second time to declare the suspension of arms in case he should be informed from M. de Torcy that orders had been dispatched for the surrender of Dunkirk, that event having been retarded by the refractory conduct of the foreign auxiliaries. The court of London was compelled to acknowledge its inability to make good the conditions on which Dunkirk was to be delivered up, yet the King of France hesitated not to give orders for the surrender of that important place, which was taken possession of by a detachment of troops from England, under the command of General Hill, on the 17th of July. Upon the same day the Duke of Ormond, who had previously received the required satisfaction respecting this preliminary article, caused the cessation of arms to be proclaimed by the sound of the trumpet, as also did Marechal Villars on the part of France. On the 18th of July the British forces began their march to Ghent, of which they took possession, as also of Bruges, on the 23d, after being refused entrance into every fortified town on their route, and in a short time they embarked for England. The Duke of Ormond was highly applauded by the ministers for his conduct in the whole of this critical business.

The Bishop of Bristol, conformably to his instructions, had proposed in a conference with the ministers of the allied courts at Utrecht (June 27), to concur in the suspension of arms agreed upon between England and France, in order to adjust the demands of all the confederates: but he found them unanimous in their answers that the thing required of them exceeded their powers, and that they must wait for fresh orders from their principals. On the other hand Count Zinzendorf, first imperial plenipotentiary at the Congress of Utrecht, presented, June 28, a remarkable memorial to the States, in which he animadverted with great severity upon the conduct of the court of London, and insisted strongly on the danger that would result to the common cause from a cessation of arms, and containing new propositions for the vigorous prosecution of the war, with a view to compass the recovery of the Spanish monarchy to the house of Austria, and to accomplish the other purposes of the grand alliance. In the midst of the rejoicings for the taking of Quesnoy, the Earl of Strafford, who had been for some weeks absent in England, returned to the Hague, and, at a solemn deputation of the States, now somewhat elated by recent success, exerted his last and utmost efforts to engage their high mightinesses to accede to the proposal of England for a suspension of arms. But the minister of the Emperor signified to the States, "that if they agreed to such proposal, Prince Eugene had orders immediately to march off with all the Emperor's forces into the empire, and leave the Dutch to the mercy of both their old and new enemies." At length, their high mightinesses came to a resolution (July 9th), that they were entirely disposed to put an end to this bloody and expensive war by a good peace; that, in order to this, they were ready to listen to such proposals as France should be willing to make in writing, in answer to the specific demands of the allies: that if the same were just and reasonable, in such a case their high mightinesses would readily consent to a general peace, but that they would never depart from their engagements with their allies, without whose consent they could not agree to a cessation of arms. On this the Earl of Strafford left the Hague in great anger, and repaired to the army of the Duke of Ormond, then encamped at Chateau Cambresis.

A short time previously to the 17th of July, the day on which the suspension of arms took place—a measure which is thought, by some, to have originated with the Queen herself—Prince Eugene retired from Haspre with all the allied forces, excepting the British. Almost at the moment of proclaiming the suspension, the Prince, as it were in bravado, caused the strong and important fortress of Landreci to be invested; and it was determined, in a council of war, that, notwithstanding the defection of the English, nothing should be omitted to carry on the operations of the campaign with such vigour as to enable the allied army to take winter quarters in Picardy. Landreci was regarded as a place of so much importance that the siege of it excited, even in Paris, great agitation and alarm: and Louis declared to the Duke of Harcourt, that in case of any fresh disaster he would convene all the nobility of his kingdom, and though now seventy-four years of age, would lead them on in person to the enemy, and, if unable to save the kingdom, to perish at their head. Marechal Villars, however, on the 24th of July, passing the Scheldt with great secresy and dispatch, fell suddenly, with a far superior force, on a separate corps of the allied army posted at Denain, and commanded by the Earl of Albemarle, whom he totally defeated in sight of Prince Eugene, who was prevented, by the accidental breaking down of the bridge thrown over the Scheldt, from affording him the least succour. Seventeen entire battalians were either killed or captured on this occasion; and a convoy of 500 waggons, destined for the camp before Landreci, fell into the hands of the French.

The communication between the allied army and the grand depot of ammunition and military stores at Marchiennes, on the Scarpe, being now completely cut off, the French General immediately invested that important post, which was well fortified, encompassed with morasses and canals, and defended by a garrison of more than five thousand men. To the astonishment of the world, however, this place surrendered in less than a week, the garrison being made prisoners of war. In consequence of this unexpected capture, the allied army experienced the most distressing embarrassments, the siege of Landreci was raised, and the French acquired a decided superiority in the field. Villars, ever active and indefatigable, immediately proceeded to the investment of the city of Douay. This important place, not being supposed in danger, was weakly garrisoned; yet General Hompesch, the Governor, made so vigorous a defence, that Douay held out till the 8th of September, when the garrison was compelled to surrender prisoners of war. The next object of Marechal Villars was the town of Quesnoy, recently captured by the allies. This place made a defence no less resolute than Douay; and it was not till the 14th of October that it submitted to a capitulation. Bouchain, the sole acquisition of the last campaign, also capitulated, after a defence very ill proportioned to its reputed strength. These garrisons completed the number of forty battalions killed or made prisoners by the French since the unfortunate affair of Denain. The surprisal of Fort Knocque, situated on the canal of Ypres, was the only compensation for all these losses; so that the triumph of Villars was complete.

Mr. Secretary St. John, now created Lord Viscount Bolingbroke, was dispatched early in August to the court of Versailles, in order to obviate all the remaining difficulties. He was received by the French monarch with all imaginable marks of distinction; and in a short time the object of his mission being in great part effected, a cessation of arms by sea and land for the space of four months was agreed upon. In the mean time the negociations at Utrecht proceeded slowly and heavily.

highness replied, "that instead of relinquishing the siege he would cause it to be prosecuted with all imaginable vigour," all correspondence ceased between them. The Prince, knowing the constant and amicable intercourse kept up between the British and French commanders, made no scruple to declare "that he should be glad if the English would march off; they being now only a burden to the Netherlands."

At length their high mightinesses declared (October the 9th,) "that for the good of peace, the States were willing to yield Lisle to France, and to recede from their pretensions to have Douay, Valenciennes, and Maubeuge, which they had hitherto insisted upon: provided Conde and Tournay were included in their barrier, the Tariffs of 1664 restored, and that Sicily be yielded to the Emperor, and Strasburgh to the empire." This was a proposition which the English court acknowledged to be entitled to regard and consideration; but the arrogance of France still retarded the negociation.—In October, Lord Lexington was appointed to go as ambassador to Spain; and the renunciation of King Philip having been drawn up in form, his Majesty signed it November the 5th, and swore upon the holy Evangelists to observe it, in presence of the council of state and of the chief nobility.*—In November, a further suspension of arms was agreed upon for four months, to which Portugal acceded: and the British forces in that kingdom were immediately recalled.†—About the close of the year ‡ the British plenipotentiaries at Utrecht signified to the States, that if they would sign the preliminaries of peace in conjunction with England, Tournay should be added to their barrier. Their high mightinesses acceding, not without great opposition from the States of Holland, to this proposition, a new barrier treaty was concluded, differing from the former, so much inveighed against, chiefly by its inferiority of strength and security.

The King of Prussia, who had been some time indisposed, died on the 25th of February, 1713. This event occasioned some delay, and it was not till the month of April following, that the British plenipotentiaries declared to the ministers of Holland and the Emperor, that they were ready, with the ministers of Prussia, Portugal, and Savoy, to sign their respective treaties. The imperial ambassadors replied, that neither they nor the ministers of the empire were ready to sign, nor would they hearken to peace without the restitution of Strasburgh: and they entered a formal protestation against the treaty. The Dutch, however, thought proper to comply; and on the 11th of April, 1713, the treaty of Utrecht was completed.§—In addition to the places anciently possessed by the Dutch, Luxemburg, Namur, Charleroi, Ypres, and Neuport, were assigned to the States as a perpetual barrier. His imperial Majesty was allowed to the first of June to declare his acceptance, or non-acceptance of the terms proposed.

As soon as this important intelligence reached London, the Parliament was assembled, after no less than seven prorogations since the month of January; and the substance of the treaty being laid before them, an address of congratulation was presented by the two Houses, whose example was followed by most of the corporate bodies, accompanied by great public rejoicings. The proclamation of peace was published on the 4th of May, exactly eleven years subsequent to the declaration of war. In a few weeks Mr. Benson, Chancellor of the Exchequer, offered to the House of Commons copies of the treaty of peace with France, as also of commerce; by which the manufactures of each kingdom were admitted into the other upon the payment of very low ad valorem duties. Political artifice and commercial prejudice being combined in opposition to this wise measure, the bill for rendering the treaty of commerce effectual was, after violent debates, rejected by 194 against 185.

The Scotch Peers being extremely exasperated at their exclusion from the honours of the English Peerage; and the Scotch nation being equally enraged at the recent impositions of a heavy additional duty on malt, a motion was made by the Earl of Findlater for leave to bring in a bill for dissolving the union and securing the Protestant succession in the House of Hanover. To embarrass the administration, this was defended by the Scotch Lords Mar, Eglington, &c. and warmly supported by the English Whig Lords, Sunderland, Townshend, Halifax, &c. once the zealous advocates of the union. On the other hand, it was opposed by the Tories, who were the original and vehement enemies of that measure. The question being put upon Lord Findlater's motion, it was negatived by a majority of four voices only—the numbers being 71 to 67 Peers, proxies included.

In consequence of the peace, immense reductions were now made both in the army and navy establishments. "Make yourselves safe," said the Queen, "and I shall be satisfied. Next to the protection of

* The cortez of Spain being summoned to meet at Madrid, the King afterwards went in state to that assembly, and declared to them, "that the efforts which the nation had made with so much zeal and fidelity to secure his crown in two perilous emergencies were of such a nature as never to be forgotten. In order, therefore, to shew his gratitude, to procure peace for his people, and to be never separated from them, he renounced all pretensions which either himself or his issue might have to the crown of France; and desired them to give their consent to it." Upon this, the cortez confirmed and approved the renunciation; and the crown of Spain, after King Philip's posterity, was limited to the house of Savoy. The like renunciation was made some months after by the Princes of France to the crown of Spain, and King Philip was declared incapable of succeeding to the crown of France. This was the more necessary, as the death of the dauphin of France, father to the King of Spain, had been quickly followed by that of the Duke of Burgundy, February 1712, and in a few days afterwards by the eldest son of the Duke; so that the younger of his two children, an infant scarcely two years of age, was the only intervening impediment to the hereditary claim of the Catholic King to the Gallic crown.

† The Duke of Hamilton, noted for his attachment to the Stuart family, was at this time appointed ambassador extraordinary to the court of France; but being at the eve of his expected departure killed in a duel with Lord Mohun, who himself also fell in the bloody contest, he was succeeded by the Duke of Shrewsbury. Some dispute, it appeared, had arisen, between the Duke of Hamilton and Lord Mohun, respecting a law-suit. Mohun, who had been twice tried for murder, and was accounted a mean tool, as well as the Hector of the Whig party, sent a message by General Macartney to the Duke, challenging him to single combat. The principals met by appointment in Hyde Park, attended by Macartney and Colonel Hamilton. They fought with such fury, that Mohun was killed upon the spot, and the Duke expired before he could be conveyed to his own house. Macartney disappeared, and escaped in disguise to the Continent. Colonel Hamilton declared upon oath before the Privy Council, that when the principals engaged, he and Macartney followed their example; and that Macartney was immediately disarmed; but the Colonel seeing the Duke fall upon his antagonist, threw away the swords, and ran to lift him up: that while he was employed in raising the Duke, Macartney, having taken up one of the swords, stabbed his Grace over Hamilton's shoulder, and retired immediately. A proclamation was issued, promising a reward of five hundred pounds to those who would apprehend or discover Macartney: and the Duchess of Hamilton offered three hundred pounds for the same purpose. The Tories exclaimed against this event as a party duel: they treated Macartney as a cowardly assassin, and affirmed that the Whigs had posted others of the same stamp all round Hyde Park, to murder the Duke of Hamilton, in case he had triumphed over his antagonist, and escaped the treachery of Macartney. The Whigs, on the other hand, affirmed, that it was altogether a private quarrel: that Macartney was entirely innocent of the perfidy laid to his charge: that he afterwards submitted to a fair trial, at which Colonel Hamilton prevaricated in giving his evidence, and was contradicted by the testimony of divers persons who saw the combat at a distance.

‡ At the end of the autumn, the Duke of Marlborough embarked for the Continent, and proceeded by way of Antwerp and Aix-la Chapelle, accompanied by his Duchess, to visit his principality of Mindelheim, being every where received with the highest honours. This was regarded as a sort of compromise with the ministry, for on his departure from England, the prosecutions instituted against him as a public defaulter and delinquent, were stayed by the queen's order, as was also a suit at law commenced against him for arrears due to the builders of Blenheim-house, the contracts for which had been made in the Queen's name. He resided abroad during the remainder of this reign.

§ By this famous treaty the Protestant succession was recognized by France, and the Pretender compelled to depart that kingdom: the union of the two monarchies of France and Spain was provided against by mutual and solemn renunciations; the harbour of Dunkirk was demolished, and the fortifications razed; Acadie, Hudson's Bay, Newfoundland, and St. Christopher's, ceded in full right to England. Naples, Milan, Sardinia, and the Spanish Netherlands, were yielded to the Emperor, together with Landau, Brisac, and fort Kehl, on the side of Germany. Sicily, by the particular and partial interposition of the Queen of England, was forcibly disjoined from Naples, and transferred to the Duke of Savoy, with the regal title; the eventful succession to the crown of Spain being also in default of descendants from the reigning monarch, vested in the House of Savoy. The extreme solicitude of the Queen to obtain terms of advantage for the Duke of Savoy, is strikingly apparent throughout the negociation. Some of these propositions, nevertheless, were so palpably unreasonable, particularly that which required a cession of part of the ancient domain of France, as to be peremptorily and indignantly rejected by the court of Versailles, which granted, not without reluctance, to Savoy, the fortresses of Exilles, Fenestrelles, and the valley of Pragelas, with a considerable tract of the country beyond Mount Genevre.

Divine Providence, I depend upon the loyalty and affection of my people; I want no other guarantee."

At the latter end of the session, a royal message was sent to the House of Commons, acquainting them with the incumbrances under which the civil list now laboured; and a grant for the sum of 500,000*l.* was moved to discharge the debts of the crown. The friends of the Earl of Godolphin, recently deceased, expressed their astonishment at this demand; and Mr. Smith, late Chancellor of the Exchequer, averred, "that to his certain knowledge the debts on the civil list did not, in August, 1710, amount to 150,000*l.*"—a trifling sum, when the annual appropriation of one hundred thousand pounds towards the expence of the war, the charge of maintaining the palatines, of building Blenheim-house, &c. were taken into consideration. It was intimated that the statement was deceitful, and that the real object was to secure a large sum, in order to influence the approaching general election; and it was urged to be a most dangerous precedent for the House to grant such a demand, as the same compliance would be expected by all future Princes. The motion, however, was finally carried in a thin house.

Addresses were also presented to the Queen by both Houses, humbly beseeching her Majesty to use the most pressing instances to obtain the removal of the Pretender from Lorraine, whither he had recently retired, not without the secret approbation of the court of London. On the 16th of July, 1713, the Parliament was prorogued, and soon after dissolved by proclamation.*

The Lord Treasurer now stood in the singular predicament of being equally hated by the Whigs and Jacobitical Tories; by the former for having done too much, and by the latter too little, for the Pretender's interest. Oxford and Bolingbroke, the two principal leaders of the administration, had been long at variance, and the dissension between them now became open and public.

The indiscreet interference of the Elector relative to the negociations with France, and the memorial or remonstrance presented by his Ambassador in London against the project of peace, had given extreme offence to the Queen; and from this period she appears to have entertained frequent discourses on the subject of her brother's restoration; and even expressed herself at times, though with great caution, in terms favourable to it. The Whigs also were incessant in their exclamations that the present ministers were forming deep and dangerous designs against the Protestant succession and in favour of the Pretender.†

The characters of the great leaders, Oxford and Bolingbroke, however opposite, were equally adapted to impress the idea that extraordinary designs and projects were in agitation. Bolingbroke was a man of an adventurous and aspiring genius—Oxford was full of secresy and of mystery; and he possessed for some years in reality, and still in appearance, an unbounded influence over the Queen.

Since the dismission of the Earl of Wharton from the government of Ireland, that kingdom had been sinking under Tory influence and oppression.—Sir Constantine Phipps, Chancellor of the kingdom, and one of the Lords Justices in the absence of the Duke of Ormond, having the chief management of affairs. The Duke of Shrewsbury, a nobleman respected by both parties, being on his return from France appointed Lord Lieutenant, arrived in Dublin October the 27th, 1713, and immediately checked the insolence and virulence of the predominant faction, by declaring publicly that he was still the same as in the year 1688; and on the birth-day of King William, November the 4th, he celebrated, with great demonstrations of regard and veneration, the memory of that monarch. The Parliament of Ireland meeting, after a new election, on the 25th of November, were told by his excellency the Lord Lieutenant in his opening speech, "that her Majesty, having procured a safe and honourable peace, had nothing now to wish but that her subjects might enjoy the benefits and advantages of it;—that her Majesty had nothing more at heart than the preservation of the rights and liberties of her people, and the settling them upon a lasting foundation by securing the Protestant succession in the House of Hanover." The new Parliament soon manifested itself to be decidedly Whig. They ordered in a bill to attaint the Pretender and his adherents; they took effectual measures to suppress all seditious and Jacobitical publications, which had been of late notoriously countenanced and encouraged; and they resolved upon an address to the Queen for the removal of Sir Constantine Phipps from the Chancellorship. A motion was even made, declaring the Lord Chancellor an encourager of popery, and a friend to the Pretender. This threw the House into so violent a flame, that the adverse parties were near drawing swords. It was at length, and with much difficulty, withdrawn by the mover, Colonel Southwell. On the other hand, the House of Lords, where the Tory interest prevailed, resolved, that the Lord Chancellor Phipps had in his several stations acquitted himself with honour and integrity, and voted a counter-address.‡

The Duke of Shrewsbury, at length, received orders to prorogue the Irish Parliament, and it was suffered to meet no more during this reign. The Lord Lieutenant himself began to be very uneasy at his situation. He knew the Queen's health to be greatly impaired; and, having certain measures to keep, and views to answer, he desired and obtained leave to return to England: the Lord Chancellor Phipps, the Primate Lindsey, and the

* Sprat, Bishop of Rochester, dying at this juncture, was succeeded by Atterbury, late prolocutor of the convocation; as was Compton, of London, by the Bishop of Bristol.—The Earl of Dorset was removed from his government of Dover castle, which was given to the Duke of Ormond; and the Duke of Athol, a notorious Jacobite, superseded the Duke of Montrose as Lord Privy Seal of Scotland, the Earl of Mar being constituted Secretary of State for that kingdom. Nearly at the same time the Privy Seal of England was consigned to the Earl of Dartmouth; Mr. Bromley being appointed to the northern, and Lord Bolingbroke removed to the southern department of office. Sir William Wyndham succeeded Mr. Benson as Chancellor of the Exchequer, the latter going to Madrid as ambassador, under the title of Lord Bingley, on the return of Lord Lexington.

† The Duke of Marlborough, in a letter to M. Robethon, of February 1714, declared himself rejoiced to find, "that the Republic" (i. e. of Holland) "takes the alarm, and begins to wake out of the lethargy it had fallen into since the peace of Utrecht. And he affirms, that the Queen's ill health, and the ministers making such open steps in favour of the Pretender as to leave no doubt of their intentions to place him on the throne, have brought things so near a decision, that, unless the States design to look on and see us lost, and consequently themselves, they could no longer remain inactive." It appears in the course of the letter, that in consequence of his representations, together with those of the other leaders of the Whigs, the States were equipping a great fleet to convoy a large body of forces to England, effectually to assert, in case of need, the protestant succession in the house of Hanover, of which they were the guarantees. This must be considered as a demonstrative proof of the real and zealous attachment of the Duke of Marlborough to the Hanoverian succession; yet the grossness of his political hypocrisy was such, as to incite him to maintain precisely the same exterior to the court of St. Germains. In a confidential conversation with one of the agents of that court, as reported to the Earl of Middleton (November 1711), he solemnly declared, "that nothing should be wanting on his side, as occasions should present—that he thought the King's business could not fail of going forward, and that his religion would not be any hindrance to it." He said, he knew the Princess of Denmark well; that she was a very honest person, easily won and wrought upon, but who at bottom had certainly no aversion from her brother: but she was one that must not be frightened—and that "any external force used would rather do harm than good, both in regard to her and others: whereas, if things were suffered to go on in their own train, the King's business would go on of itself, and he doubted not would come to a happy conclusion."

‡ The two houses of convocation attending at the castle of Dublin to present an address similar to that of the Lords, Mr. Molesworth, afterwards Lord Molesworth, so celebrated for his embassy to Denmark, being at this time a member of the Irish Parliament, and a Privy Counsellor of that kingdom, said aloud in the presence and hearing of the Bishops and clergy: "They that have turned the world upside down are come hither also." Enraged at this sarcasm, the Lower House of convocation sent to the Upper a formal complaint of the words uttered by Mr. Molesworth, which they asserted "to be an intolerable profanation of the holy scriptures, and spoken with a design to cast an odium and aspersion on their graces and Lordships, and the whole body of the clergy; whom they humbly prayed their Lordships to vindicate from this wicked calumny." The Bishops immediately laid this complaint before the House of Lords, who desired a conference with the Commons on this important business, and left with them a copy of the paper delivered by the convocation. But the Commons would take no cognizance of the complaint: and no redress being obtainable in Ireland, recourse was had to a direct representation to the Queen, by whom Mr. Molesworth was removed from the privy council.

Archbishop

Archbishop of Tuam, being in his absence appointed Lords Justices of the kingdom.

At the signing of the treaty of Utrecht, Zinzendorf, Ambassador from the court of Vienna, declared the resolution of the Emperor to carry on the war, and hazard all rather than submit to the prescribed conditions. But in the following summer, (1713,) M. Villars entered Germany with a prodigious army, consisting of 200 battalions and 300 squadrons; and Prince Eugene, who commanded an inferior force, remaining reluctantly inactive within the lines of Etlingen, while the French captured the city of Landau and Friburgh, the Imperial pride began to listen seriously to the overtures of France; and the two Generals being constituted plenipotentiaries, a treaty was towards the close of the year set on foot at Rastadt, and articles of peace finally signed at Baden, March 1714; conformably to which, Naples, Milan, and Sardinia, and the Low Countries, were ceded to the House of Austria. The evacuation of Catalonia was agreed to, and a suspension of arms with Spain; but Charles refused to recognise the title of his rival, King Philip: and the important fortresses of Landau, Strasburg and New Brisac remained with France, with the sovereignty of the province of Alsace. Soon after this were exchanged the ratifications of the treaty between Great Britain and Spain; by which it was stipulated, that the commerce of the two nations should be replaced on its former basis, as in the reign of the late King Charles II.; that the Assiento contract for supplying the Spanish colonies with negroes should be granted to England for the term of thirty years; that no part of the Spanish West Indies should ever be alienated from the crown of Spain to France or any other nation. Gibraltar and Minorca were ceded for ever to England; and Sicily was yielded to the Duke of Savoy, but to revert to Spain in case of a failure of the line of Savoy. The Catalans, who had engaged with zeal, and persevered with fidelity, in the cause of the Archduke Charles, were merely to receive a pardon on submission, and to enjoy, in the treacherous words of the conventional treaty, "the privileges of the King's best-beloved subjects, the inhabitants of the Castiles." These privileges consisted only in some commercial advantages; in return for which they were to be divested of their constitutional liberties. In pursuance of the agreement entered into by their Imperial and Catholic Majesties, Count Staremberg did in fact deliver up Tarragona and Ostalric, and in the month of December 1713, embarked at Barcelona with his troops. The people of that great city resolved nevertheless to defend themselves to the last extremity, unless they were assured of freedom and security. The blockade of Barcelona was commenced, and the Duke of Berwick arrived in June, 1714, from France, to invest the place in due form. The court of Madrid, incensed at the obstinate resistance of the Catalans, talked of nothing but sackings and executions; and sent express orders to M. Berwick, not to receive them on any other terms, after the batteries were once begun, than those of submitting at discretion. This barbarous policy made them furious and desperate. Appealing to Heaven, and hanging up at the high altar of their cathedral the Queen of England's solemn declaration to protect them, the people of Barcelona defended themselves with incredible resolution, till seven breaches were made in the body of the place; their provision also being nearly consumed, while no possibility remained of receiving succours. In this state a formal summons was sent by M. Berwick previously to a general assault; but it was rejected; and after prodigies of valour on the part of the besieged, the city was carried sword in hand with dreadful slaughter. By the good conduct and vigilant efforts of the commander, however, the houses of the inhabitants were preserved from plunder, and the excesses of the soldiery effectually restrained. According to the acknowledgment of the Duke of Berwick, the loss of the besieging army did not amount to less than ten thousand men. On the surrender of the city, the ancient and popular form of government was immediately abolished, and many examples of severity made; though the sanguinary and remorseless revenge of the court was sensibly mitigated by the wisdom and humanity of the hero who achieved the conquest.

In the north of Europe, the war still continued, much to the disadvantage of Sweden. The King of Denmark at length succeeded in the siege of Stade, and in the subsequent reduction of the Duchy of Bremen, and contiguous principality of Verden. In the mean time the czar invaded Finland with a great force, and reduced the whole province, with Abo its capital. Count Steenbock the Swedish General, who had long maintained his ground in Pomerania with great courage and ability, sustained a grievous reverse of fortune, and was compelled to surrender with his whole army prisoners of war. After several years' residence in Bender, the King of Sweden received orders from the Porte to quit the Ottoman territory; the Grand Seignior undertaking to procure him a safe passage to his own dominions: but, with singular obstinacy and rashness, he refused compliance, and fortified himself in the house where he resided. This being carried, after sustaining a regular assault, he was made a prisoner and conveyed to Adrianople; the greater part of the Swedes who had accompanied him to Turkey being sold for slaves. After a variety of romantic adventures, the Swedish monarch returned to his own kingdom.

Towards the conclusion of the year (1713,) the ascendency acquired by Lord Bolingbroke in the cabinet began plainly to appear; and the resignation of the Lord Treasurer was the public theme of conversation. At the end of December the Queen was seized with a severe fit of the gout, from which she recovered very slowly and imperfectly. The public funds fell prodigiously, and there followed a great run upon the bank; but the Queen declaring in a letter to the Lord Mayor her intention to open the Parliament in person on the 16th of February (1714,) the alarm subsided.

A. D. 1714.] On the appointed day, the new Parliament accordingly met; but it was opened by commission, and Sir Thomas Hanmer was chosen speaker without opposition. On the 2d of March, however, the Queen went to the House of Lords, and delivered a popular speech, in which she took occasion to remark, "That there were some who had arrived at that height of malice as to insinuate that the Protestant succession in the house of Hanover was in danger under her government." "Those," said she, "who go about thus to distract the minds of men with imaginary dangers can only mean to disturb the present tranquillity, and bring real mischief upon us." The grand question being brought forward by the Earl of Wharton, whether the Protestant succession was in danger under the present administration, a very warm debate ensued; and the Lord Treasurer Oxford, laying his hand upon his heart, declared "that he had on so many occasions given such signal proofs of his affection to the Protestant succession, that he was confident no member of that august assembly could ever mean to call it in question." The Protestant succession was at length voted out of danger by a small majority, the numbers being seventy-six against sixty-four. Upon this occasion the Earl of Anglesey, who had the reputation of being at the head of the "trimmers," divided with the Whigs. The Earl of Wharton then moved, that an address should be presented to the Queen, to issue a proclamation promising a reward to any person who should apprehend the Pretender dead or alive: to which Lord Trevor proposed to add, "in case of his landing or attempting to land in Great Britain or Ireland." To the motion thus modified, the House agreed; and, on its being presented to the Queen, she replied in the following terms: "My Lords, it would be a real strengthening to the succession in the house of Hanover, as well as a support to my government, that an end were put to those groundless fears and jealousies which have been so industriously promoted. I do not at this time see any occasion for such a proclamation: whenever I judge it to be necessary, I shall give my orders for having it issued."

The next step which the jealousy of the Whigs led them them to adopt, was to persuade the court of Herenhausen, to order Baron Schutz to demand of the Chancellor a writ for the electoral Prince as Duke of Cambridge, with a view to his residence in England, in direct contradiction to the sentiments and policy they had so strenuously defended in the early part of the present reign. It was now the turn of the Tories to oppose; and though it was impossible to deny the writ, the Queen expressed in a letter to the Princess Sophia her disapprobation of the design in terms so pointed and forcible, that it was thought expedient to lay it aside. Her Majesty not only stated "her surprise that an attempt should be made so derogatory from her dignity and royal authority, but her determination to oppose it, however fatal the consequences might be." It appears that the leaders of the Whig party entertained at times schemes and projects highly romantic and extravagant, and that they had, in particular, a plan in contemplation for the Elector to convey himself to England at the head of a body of Hanoverian troops; and if the States General refused to provide ships for the purpose, it was suggested that they might be had from the King of Denmark. Of this proposition the Elector declared his total disapprobation;—and Robethon, in his dispatches to England, treats the whole plan as dangerous, absurd, and impracticable.

The Earl of Oxford, aware of these machinations, moved in the House of Peers a bill "for the further security of the Protestant succession," making it high treason to bring foreign troops into the kingdom. To this it was forcibly objected, that a law against bringing troops into Great Britain to support the cause of the Pretender was unnecessary; since such troops, if foreigners, might be treated as enemies; if natives, might be punished as rebels: and the bill was silently dropped.

It seems to have been a great object with the Elector to procure a royal appanage for his mother the Electress, who complained that she had as yet gained nothing by the English succession but some sheets of parchment. Mr. Thomas Harley, when at Hanover, had flattered the Electoral court that the Lord Treasurer would contribute to this with all his power, acknowledging that nothing could be more just—yet it was never mentioned in Parliament by either Tories or Whigs. On the contrary, the latter were very earnest and importunate in their applications for money to the Elector, who parted with it, as may well be imagined, very reluctantly; and when it was proposed to him to advance a large sum to secure a majority of members at the last general election, he absolutely and very properly refused, saying, "that the court would always have the heaviest purse: that the nation must exert itself, for that he could not save them against their will." The death of the Electress taking place at this period, the Elector of Brunswick was, by an order of the court, prayed for by name in all churches and chapels throughout England, as presumptive heir to the English crown.*

In the month of May, a bill to prevent the growth of schism was introduced, by which Dissenters were, under very severe penalties, prohibited from all interference in the business of education. Of this measure, Lord Bolingbroke was believed to be the chief adviser; but, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the Whigs, the bill, declared by Mr. Walpole, "to be more like a decree of Julian the Apostate than a law enacted by a Protestant Parliament," passed through the House of Commons by a majority of 237 against 126. It was then carried by Sir William Wyndham, its original mover, up to the House of Lords, where it excited one of the most violent and memorable debates which had occurred since the revolution. The motion was supported by Lord Bolingbroke,† and others; and opposed by the Lords Cowper, Wharton, Halifax, Townshend, Nottingham, &c. It is remarkable, that both the great leaders of the administration, Oxford and Bolingbroke, were educated in the principles of nonconformity; and, in allusion to this circumstance, the Earl of Wharton expressed his surprise to see men brought up in the bosom of dissent, become the most zealous champions of the church—and those who had been indebted for their great acquirements to the seminaries described in the bill, most forward for the suppression of them.

A petition from the dissenters to be heard by counsel against the bill was rejected by 72 voices against 66. In the progress of the business a clause was inserted, extending the operation of the bill to Ireland (though the Duke of Shrewsbury, Lord Lieutenant of the kingdom, declared strongly against it) by a majority of 57 to 51 voices: and the general and final motion for passing the bill, was carried by 77 against 72. The royal assent was given, on the 25th of June, to the act, which was to take effect on the 1st of August following: but, on that very day, a reverse of fortune, fatal to the authors of the bill took place—the unfortunate dynasty of the Stuarts expired!

The Queen's constitution was now so entirely broken, that it was evident she approached towards the conclusion of her life; and the ministers of the crown, in the alarming prospect of her dissolution, thought of little else than their private interests and personal safety. Oxford and Bolingbroke were now so exasperated against each other, that they could not abstain from the most indecent and bitter altercation, even in the presence of the Queen. On the 8th of June the Earl of Oxford presented a memorial to the Queen, containing a recapitulation of the principal events of his administration—vindicating his own conduct, and reflecting with great acrimony upon that of his antagonist, whom he charged with endeavouring to enlist a separate party for himself in the House of Commons from the beginning of February 1711. This remonstrance seems to have made no impression upon the mind of the Queen, who was now entirely alienated from the Lord Treasurer. Not a single measure however was adopted at this critical period by the confidential ministers of the crown, from which it could be inferred that they entertained designs inimical to the Protestant succession. On the contrary, attempts having been made to enlist men for the service of the Pretender, a proclamation was immediately issued, promising a reward of 5000*l.* for apprehending the Pretender whenever he should land, or attempt to land, in Great Britain or Ireland. Both Houses voted an address of thanks for this proclamation; and the Commons, as a further and demonstrative proof of their attachment to the Protestant succession, assured her Majesty, "that they would, out of the first aids, grant the sum of 100,000*l.* as a further reward to any who shall perform so great a service to her Majesty and her kingdoms; and also that they would heartily concur with her Majesty in all other measures for extinguishing the hopes of the Pretender, and all his open and secret abettors. At the same time Lord Bolingbroke brought in a bill, denouncing the penalties of high treason against those who should enlist or be enlisted in the Pretender's service. On the 9th of July the session was terminated by a speech from the throne, in which the Queen affirmed, "that her chief concern was to preserve the Protestant religion, the liberty of her subjects, and the tranquillity of the kingdom."

* The Princess Sophia was a woman of excellent understanding highly esteemed for her virtues, and admired for her personal and intellectual accomplishments. She was one of those extraordinary persons over whom time seems to have no power. Walking and conversing with her usual cheerfulness in the gardens of the palace of Herenhausen, she was suddenly seized with an apoplectic fit, and expired in the arms of the electoral Princess.

† Lord Bolingbroke, on the first reading of the bill, declared it to be of the highest importance, since it concerned the security of the church of England, the best and firmest support of the monarchy—both which all good men, and more especially the members of that august assembly, who derive their lustre from and are nearest the throne, ought to have most at heart. Disclaiming in strong language the character of a religious persecutor, he admitted that an indulgence to tender consciences, which the prejudices of education and long habits have rendered scrupulous, might be agreeable to the rules of good policy and humanity; yet he denied that government was from hence under any obligation to indulge a tenderness of conscience to come, or to connive at the propagating of these prejudices, and at the forming of these habits. The evil effect was indeed without remedy, and might therefore deserve indulgence; but the evil cause was to be prevented, and could of consequence be entitled to none: he moved that the bill be read a second time.

On the 27th of July (1714) the Earl of Oxford was unexpectedly divested of the staff of Treasurer; and Bolingbroke found himself elevated to the summit of power. This splendid pre-eminence, however, he enjoyed only for a moment. The Queen, who was perceived to be extremely agitated from the time of the dismission of Lord Oxford, never recovered her composure of mind; but, as though exhausted by incessant fatigue, chagrin, and vexation, she gradually sank into a sort of lethargy, in which she remained several days, deriving no relief from medicine.

A meeting of the privy council being convened, when the Queen was apparently on the verge of departure, the Dukes of Somerset and Argyle entered the council chamber, without any previous summons, to the astonishment of the majority of the members: the Duke of Shrewsbury arose and thanked them for their readiness to assist the council in that critical juncture. They then took their places; and it being represented as of the highest importance that the office of Lord Treasurer should be immediately filled, the Duke of Shrewsbury, already occupying the posts of Lord High Chamberlain, and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, was proposed and unanimously agreed upon as the fittest person for that great trust. The Queen's physicians, on examination, assuring the council that her Majesty was still sensible, the Chancellor and several other Lords were nominated to attend her. On being informed of the recommendation of the privy council, she expressed her entire approbation of it, and, giving with her own hands the Treasurer's staff to the Duke, charged him, "to use it for the good of her people." Her Majesty, after an interval of some hours, relapsing into her lethargic state, the council proceeded by the most vigorous measures to provide for the security of the kingdom. Orders were dispatched to several regiments of horse and dragoons to march towards the metropolis; directions were given for equipping a fleet with all expedition; and an express was sent off to the Elector of Hanover, signifying, that the Queen's life was despaired of; and desiring that he would, without delay, repair to Holland, where he would find a British squadron ready to convoy him to England. Instructions were at the same time dispatched to the Earl of Strafford, ambassador at the Hague, to demand from the States the performance of their engagements, as guarantees of the Protestant succession; and the heralds at arms were kept in waiting in order to proclaim the new King the instant the throne should become vacant. The Queen continued to breathe rather than to live till Sunday morning, August 1, 1714, when she expired in the 50th year of her age, and 13th of her reign. No symptoms of popular tumult or discontent appeared on the proclamation of the successor, but on the contrary it was received with every token of joy; and, whatever might have been intended, it is certain that nothing had been attempted, much less effected by the late Queen and her ministers in favour of the Pretender.*

* In her person, observes Macpherson, Queen Anne "was of a middle stature, and, before she bore children, well made. Her hair was dark, her complection sanguine, her features strong, but not irregular, her whole countenance more dignified than agreeable. In the accomplishments of the mind, as a woman, she was not deficient: she understood music; she loved painting; she had even some taste for works of genius; she was always generous, sometimes liberal, but never profuse. Like the rest of the family, she was good natured to a degree of weakness; indolent in her disposition, timid by nature, devoted to the company of her favourites, easily led. She possessed all the virtues of her father, except political courage; she was subject to all his weaknesses, except enthusiasm in religion; she was jealous of her authority, and sullenly irreconcilable towards those who treated either herself or prerogative with disrespect; but, like him also, she was much better qualified to discharge the duties of a private life than to act the part of a sovereign. As a friend, a mother, a wife, she deserved every praise. Her conduct as a daughter could scarcely be exceeded by a virtue much superior to all these. Upon the whole, though her reign was crowded with great events, she cannot, with any justice, be called a great Princess. Subject to terror, beyond the constitutional timidity of her sex, she was altogether incapable of decisive counsels, and nothing but her irresistible popularity could have supported her authority amidst the ferment of those distracted times."

Chamberlaine speaks of this Princess in still higher terms. "Thus died Anne Stuart," says he, "Queen of Great Britain, and one of the best and greatest monarchs that ever filled that throne. What was most remarkable, was a clear harmonious voice, always admired in her graceful delivery of her speeches to Parliament, insomuch that it used to be a common saying in the mouth of every one, "that her speech was music." Good nature, the true characteristic of the Stuarts, predominated in her temper, which was a compound of benevolence, generosity, indolence, and timidity, but not without a due sensibility of any slight which she thought was offered to her person or her dignity; to these all her actions, both as a monarch and as a woman, may be ascribed; these were the sources both of her virtues and her failings; her greatest blessing upon earth was that entire union of affections and inclinations between her and her royal consort; which made them a perfect pattern of conjugal love. She was a fond and tender mother, an easy and indulgent mistress, and a most gracious sovereign; but she had more than once reason to repent her giving up her heart, and trusting her secrets without reserve to her favourites. She retained to the last the principles of that true religion which she had imbibed early; being devout without affectation, and charitable without ostentation. She had a great reverence for clergymen eminent for learning and good lives, and was particularly beneficent to the poorer sort of them, of which she left an evidence which bears her name, and will perpetuate both that and her bounty to all succeeding generations."

BOOK XXVII.

THE REIGN OF GEORGE I. COMPRISING A PERIOD OF TWELVE YEARS, TEN MONTHS, AND TEN DAYS.

30. GEORGE I.

A. D. 1714.] IMMEDIATELY on the death of Queen Anne, an express was sent off to the Earl of Clarendon, the British ambassador at Hanover, which reached him on the night of August the 5th. Instantly repairing to the palace of Herenhausen, his Lordship entered the chamber of the Elector two hours after midnight, and on his bended knee saluted him "King of Great Britain." This intelligence was received with decorous and dignified serenity.

King George was, at the period of his accession, in the 55th year of his age; having been born the day before the restoration of Charles II. It has been justly observed, that the uniform prudence with which he had conducted himself throughout the conflicts of the late reign, the general respectability of his character, and the auspicious circumstances which attended his elevation, seemed to augur calm and prosperous days. The embers of civil discord and animosity, however, were extinguished only in appearance; and the violent measures which the King was led to adopt soon rekindled the torch of sedition and the flames of war.

Convinced that no danger was to be apprehended, on the death of the Queen, either from foreign or domestic enemies, his Majesty appeared in no haste to leave Herenhausen; and it was not till the middle of September that he arrived in England, which exhibited every where the appearance of satisfaction and tranquillity.* Agreeably to an act passed in the late reign for securing the Protestant succession, the existing Parliament was continued for six months, notwithstanding the demise of the sovereign; and, having been assembled on the 5th of August, the Lords of the Regency, consisting of the seven great officers of state, and certain other persons previously nominated under the hand and seal of the Elector, came to the House of Peers; where the Lord Chancellor Harcourt made a speech in their name, exhorting to unanimity, and a firm adherence to his Majesty's interest. Mr. Secretary Bromley, moving the address of condolence and congratulation in the House of Commons, insisted much on the loss sustained by the nation on the death of the late Queen; but Mr. Onslow observed, that the stress of the address ought to be placed rather on the congratulation than on the condolence; and the House, approving the suggestion, declared to his Majesty, "That the duty they owed to his Majesty and to their country obliged them to moderate their grief; that the Princely virtues of his Majesty gave them a certain prospect of future happiness in the security of the national religion, laws, and liberties; assuring his Majesty that they would support his undoubted right to the imperial crown of this realm, against the Pretender, and all other persons whatsoever." The civil list bill passed with perfect unanimity, clauses being added for the payment of the disputed arrears due to the troops of Hanover; and the sum of 100,000*l.* was voted by the House to any person that should apprehend the Pretender, if he should land, or attempt to land, in any part of the kingdom. In the answer transmitted by the King, he declared, "That it would be the constant object of his endeavours to secure to them the full enjoyment of their religion, laws, and liberties, and to make them a happy and flourishing people." The sum of 1,400,000*l.* having been granted in the last session, by way of lottery, both blanks and prizes bearing a certain interest, such was the state of public credit, that not more than one-twentieth part of the sum had been subscribed. The Parliament now therefore voted an addition of one per cent. to the interest of the capital: and the Lords of the Regency and Privy Council went in a body to the Bank, and subscribed individually large sums to the loan; which had so happy an effect, that in a few days the whole subscription was completed.

Before the departure of the King from Hanover, he had transmitted orders to the Regency to remove Lord Bolingbroke from his post of Secretary of State, and to seal up the doors of his office; and an absolute and decided change of ministry took place immediately on his assumption of the regal power.†

It soon appeared, that measures of great severity amounting to almost a general proscription of the Tory party, had been determined upon by the Whigs, who were now in full and exclusive possession of the government.‡ The Parliament which assembled in March 1715,

* The King of France, of whom alone any jealousy could be entertained, ordered, on the first intelligence of the demise of the Queen, M. d'Ibberville, his envoy extraordinary at the court of London, to declare, in the most explicit language, his resolution to adhere to the terms of the late treaty, and his sincere desire to maintain the most perfect amity and good understanding with the new sovereign. The Pretender, who had repaired from Lorraine to Paris at this juncture, was refused an audience of his most Christian Majesty, and received notice from M. Torcy to return without delay to his former residence at Bar-le-duc. Count Konigseg, the imperial ambassador, in addition to the usual congratulations, offered, in the name of the Emperor his master, any number of troops that might be wanting at this crisis to support the authority of government.

† The Earl of Halifax was made first commissioner of the Treasury, the King refusing to create a Lord High Treasurer; not choosing, as he said, that there should be any greater man in the kingdom than himself. Lord Townshend and General Stanhope were nominated Secretaries of State, and to them was chiefly committed the direction of foreign affairs. The Earl of Nottingham, the only Tory admitted into the new administration, was declared President of the Council, the former council having been previously dissolved. Lord Cowper was re-instated in the high office of Chancellor; the command of the army was restored to the Duke of Marlborough; the privy seal given to the Earl of Wharton; and Lord Sunderland appointed to the government of Ireland; the Duke of Shrewsbury alone, of all the members of the late administration, being received with marks of favour, and he retained his office of Lord Chamberlain.

‡ In the sermon preached at the coronation of the King, October 20, the Bishop of Oxford inveighed strongly against the treaty of Utrecht, which he affirmed had raised the hopes of the Pretender to the highest pitch; asserting also that the peaceable accession of the King was owing merely to the "unexpected death" of the late Queen. In a few places only was the general joy interrupted by any appearance of disaffection. Dr. Sacherevel, on the Sunday preceding the coronation of the King, preached at Sutton Coldfield near Birmingham; and when the loyalists met at a tavern to celebrate the coron-

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

GEORGE THE FIRST.

BORN 1648.—DIED 1716.

1715, was composed almost entirely of Whigs; and the royal proclamation convoking this assembly contained in it the following expressions; "It having pleased Almighty God, by most remarkable steps of his providence, to bring us safe to the crown of this kingdom, notwithstanding the designs of evil men, we do not doubt that our loving subjects will, in the ensuing elections, have particular regard to such as shewed a firmness to the Protestant succession when it was in danger." This was stiled by Sir William Wyndham, "an unprecedented and unwarrantable exertion of the prerogative, and of dangerous consequence to the very being of Parliaments;" for which, having refused to apologise, he was, by order of the House, reprimanded by the speaker, who intimated that it was owing to the extraordinary lenity of the House that he was not committed to the Tower. Sir William, in reply, declared, "that he was neither conscious of offering any indignity to his Majesty, nor of violating the privileges of that House; and that he had therefore no thanks to give those gentlemen, who, under pretence of lenity, had brought this censure upon him."

The attention of the House was, however, soon engaged by greater objects. Official information was received from General Stanhope and Mr. Walpole, that the papers found in the office of the late Secretary Lord Bolingbroke would afford ample ground for impeaching several of the members of the former administration, which they affirmed to be the most wicked and corrupt that had ever presided in this country. This nobleman, who had hitherto preserved the appearance of great serenity, attending and even taking a part, as usual, in the debates of the House of Lords, now precipitately withdrew to the continent. In the beginning of April, General Stanhope laid before the House of Commons all the papers relating to the negotiations of the late ministry with France, which were immediately referred to a select committee of twenty-one persons, whose candour and impartiality may be estimated by the tenour of their declarations during the investigation.* In June, Mr. Walpole, as chairman, made the report, in which the secret preliminaries signed with M. Mesnager, the suspension of arms, the seizure of Ghent and Bruges by the Duke of Ormond, Lord Bolingbroke's journey to Paris, and separate conferences with the French ministry; in fact, all the measures which preceded or facilitated the conclusion of the peace of Utrecht, were stated as highly criminal; and, boldly asserting that to vindicate these measures was in a manner to share the guilt of them, the chairman terminated the report by impeaching Henry Lord Viscount Bolingbroke of high treason. Lord Coningsby, immediately standing up, exclaimed, "The worthy chairman has impeached the hand, but I impeach the head—I impeach Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer of high treason." On the 21st of June General Stanhope impeached the Duke of Ormond of high treason; and the day following, Mr. Aislabie impeached the Earl of Strafford of high crimes and misdemeanors. Such was the temper of the House, that the greater part of these impeachments were carried without difficulty, and almost without a division.†

Of all the charges adduced against the late ministry, the suspension of arms, productive of consequences so disastrous and fatal, was the most serious; but it cannot be pretended that the Duke of Ormond could, or ought, to have exercised any discretion in this case, as his orders were peremptory and positive. The Duke, however, seeing the spirit of faction and revenge so strongly predominate, followed Lord Bolingbroke to the continent; and both these noblemen entered into the service of the court of St. Germains, now removed to Commerci in Lorraine.‡

Conscious of the steadiness of his attachment to the house of Hanover, of the King's real obligation to him, and the knowledge of that obligation, the Earl of Oxford determined to abide the fury of this political tempest; and the impeachment preferred by the Commons being followed by a motion in the House of Peers for his commitment, he rose to speak in his defence, observing, "that the whole charge might be reduced to the negotiation and conclusion of the peace. That the nation wanted a peace (he said) no one would deny; and he averred, that the conditions upon which it was made were as good as the obstinate and perverse reluctance of the allies to concur in the Queen's measures would admit;—that it had been approved by two successive Parliaments; that he had acted by the express commands of his sovereign, without offending against any known law; and, being justified in his conscience, was unconcerned for the life of an insignificant old man." The Earl was attended to the Tower by a prodigious concourse of people, shouting "High church! Ormond and Oxford for ever!" and the riots and tumults which tion day, the rabble assembled in a tumultuous manner, broke the windows of the tavern, and compelled the company to disperse. The popular cry was, "The church and Sacheverel for ever—Down with the Whigs!" If any one cried "God bless King George!" his life was in danger.

* Mr. Boscawen spoke of "the insolence of a set of men, who, having committed the blackest crimes, had yet the assurance to dare the justice of the nation;" Mr. Walpole said, "that he had not words to express the villainy of the last Frenchified ministry;" and Mr. Secretary Stanhope expressed his wonder, "that men who were guilty of such enormous crimes had still the audaciousness to appear in public."

† The governing party, however, thought it not advisable to institute any proceeding against the Bishop of London, the co-adjutor of Lord Strafford, and vested with equal powers as plenipotentiary at the congress of Utrecht. On the contrary, it was said "that this good and pious prelate was joined in the commission only to palliate the iniquity of it under the sacredness of his character." The Bishop himself declared, "that he was kept wholly in the dark in all the negotiations relative to this transaction;" and Mr. Hungerford pleasantly remarked, that he saw it was determined that the Bishop, though in fact equally concerned with Lord Strafford, should be allowed "benefit of the clergy." On a subsequent occasion, nevertheless, when the storm had blown over, this prelate affirmed in debate, "that the Utrecht treaty was just and honourable, and that he himself drew up the instructions of the embassy;" on which Lord Coningsby reminded him of his former plea of ignorance, and asked "how his Lordship could pretend to have been kept entirely in the dark as to this business?" to which no answer was made.

‡ On his arrival in France Lord Bolingbroke apologised in a letter to Lord Lansdowne for his abrupt departure: "You will," said he, "excuse me when you know that I had certain and repeated information, from some who are in the secret of affairs, that a resolution was taken by those who have power to execute it, to pursue me to the scaffold. Had there been the least reason to hope for a fair and open trial, after having been already prejudged unheard by two Houses of Parliament, I should not have declined the strictest examination. I challenge the most inveterate of my enemies to produce one instance of a criminal correspondence, or the least corruption of any part of the administration in which I was concerned." Though Lord Bolingbroke suffered himself to be engaged, by earnest solicitation, in the service of the Pretender; and even accepted the seals as Secretary of State to that shadow of a King, while, as he expresses it, "the smart of a bill of attainder tingled in every vein;" on perceiving the hopeless condition of his affairs, and the weakness and distraction of his counsels, he willingly received in about six months his dismission from this unenviable pre-eminence. On leaving the Pretender's service, he had articles of impeachment formally exhibited against him, branched out into the several heads of treachery, incapacity, and negligence: to which he made an elaborate reply, expressing at the close of it his obligation to the Pretender "for cutting by this means that Gordian knot asunder by which he had conceived himself for ever bound to his interests, and which would have effectually precluded every idea of making his peace at home,"—an event which from this time became the object of his incessant intrigues and solicitations. 'We must," says the Duke of Berwick, in his Memoirs, "be entirely deprived of common sense not to see that the 'King' committed an enormous fault in dismissing the only Englishman capable of conducting his affairs. I owe him the justice to declare, that he omitted nothing that was in his power to do. He moved heaven and earth to obtain succours, but the court of France did nothing but amuse him." The Duke of Ormond, who was much more in earnest in his attachment to the exiled family, and who disdained to court a reconciliation with that country by which he considered himself as treated with the highest injustice and ingratitude, retained, during the remainder of his life, his station in the Pretender's court, around the cheerless and contracted circle of which he alone reflected some scattered rays of lustre. Previously to his departure from London, he visited, for the last time, the Earl of Oxford, who dissuaded him from flying with as much earnestness as he entreated Oxford to make his escape. He at length parted from the Earl with these words: "Farewell, Oxford without a head!" To which Oxford replied, "Farewell, Duke without a duchy!"—That the King had originally no intention of proceeding to these fatal extremities might, in defect of other proofs, be collected from the mode of Ormond's dismission; as, on the day succeeding his landing at Greenwich, a message was delivered to the Duke by Lord Townshend, "that his Majesty had no farther occasion for his services as Captain-General, but would be glad to see him at court." This nobleman was also nominated of the privy council. The impeachment of Ormond was distinguished from the rest by the closeness of the division, being carried, in a House of 425 members, by a majority of forty-seven voices only.

ensued in various parts of the kingdom, fully justified the expression of the Earl of Anglesea in the debate of this day, "that it was to be feared such violent measures would make the sceptre shake in the King's hands." For this remark, however, the House insisted upon his making an apology.

At the time that the articles of impeachment were exhibited against the Earl of Strafford, that nobleman complained of the arbitrary and illegal seizure of his papers; and desired a competent time to prepare for his defence—requiring for this purpose duplicates both of such as had been laid before the committee of secrecy and of those remaining in the hands of government. This request was wholly opposed, until the Earl of Ilay observed, "that in all civilized nations, all courts of judicature, 'the Inquisition excepted,' allowed the persons arraigned all that was necessary to their justification; and that the House of Peers of Great Britain would not, he was persuaded, in a case of this nature, do any thing contrary to that honour and equity for which they were so justly renowned throughout Europe." The House at length resolved that the Earl should be allowed copies of such papers as he might have occasion to use in his defence. Bills of attainder, in default of personal appearance, passed against the Duke of Ormond and Lord Viscount Bolingbroke; their names and armorial bearings were erased from the rolls of the Peerage by order of the House; and the Duke's achievement as Knight of the Garter was taken down from St. George's chapel at Windsor.

The session was protracted to the end of the summer; but it does not appear that the anger of the House had suffered any abatement.—"Your Commons," said the Speaker, in his address to the King, "could not see, without the utmost indignation, the glories of her late Majesty's reign tarnished by a treacherous cessation of arms; the faith of treaties violated; that ancient probity, for which the English nation had been justly renowned throughout all ages, exposed to scorn and contempt. Such was the condition of the kingdom when it pleased the divine Providence to call your Majesty to the throne of your ancestors, under whose auspicious reign your Commons behold with pleasure the glory of the Plantagenets, your Majesty's royal ancestors, revive, and have an unbounded prospect of the continuance of this happiness to the latest posterity."

The Earl of Halifax had reluctantly acquiesced in the system of that administration of which he was looked up to as the head; and he was consequently regarded by the zealots of Whiggism as deficient in vigour and spirit, if not secretly attached to the Tories." This nobleman was greatly disgusted at the unexpected ascendency acquired by Lord Townshend; and the disapprobation which he expressed of these violent proceedings, was liable to the suspicion of its being in some degree personal. An universal expectation of his resignation prevailed, when he suddenly expired, after a few days' illness, in the vigour of his age, May 19th, 1715.* His Lordship was succeeded as first commissioner of the Treasury by Mr. Walpole.

By the late extraordinary proceedings, the partisans of the Pretender were incited to exert themselves with great vigour and activity; and it was determined at one and the same time to take up arms in both kingdoms against the government. In the month of September, the Earl of Mar set up the standard of rebellion, and proclaimed the Pretender, under the stile and title of King James III. at Castletown in Scotland, and soon collected an army of 10,000 men. The vigilance of the government in a great measure rendered abortive the designs concerted by the adherents of the house of Stuart on the south of the Tweed. The Habeas Corpus Act being suspended, several noblemen were committed to the Tower, amongst whom were Lord Lansdowne and the Earl of Jersey, who had engaged to join the Duke of Ormond on his intended landing in the west; Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Harvey, and various other members of the Commons, were seized, and committed to close custody; the bail of the Duke of Somerset, father-in-law to Sir William Wyndham, was peremptorily refused; and the Duke himself, for some expressions of resentment, was removed from his place of master of the horse.

The Earl of Derwentwater and Mr. Foster, however, appeared at the head of a considerable armed force in Northumberland, hoping to surprise the town of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, where they expected to find ample supplies of arms and stores, and to be joined by very many of the lower order of inhabitants: but the well-affected, both of the church and dissenters, formed themselves into a town guard of 700 men, and another corps of 700 keelmen, principally dissenters, were also embodied for the defence of the place; so that this design, the success of which would have rendered them very formidable, proved abortive. Thus disappointed, the rebels suddenly altered their route, and advanced northward to Kelso, where they were joined by a body of Highlanders; and again entering England by the western border, proclaimed the Pretender at Warkworth, Penrith, Lancaster, and other places, in their progress to the southward. On their arrival at Preston, November 12, they were attacked by the King's forces under the Generals Willes and Carpenter, who, investing the town on all sides, compelled them to surrender at discretion. On the same day a bloody battle was fought, between the Earl of Mar and the Duke of Argyle, at Sheriff-moor, near Dumblaine in Scotland. Apprised of the intention of the Earl of Mar to cross the Forth, in order to join the insurgents in the Lowlands, the Duke hastened to secure the passes of that river, which he himself crossed at Stirling, and immediately took possession, with a force not exceeding 4000 men, of the heights of Dumblaine. The Earl of Mar now advanced to the attack; the clans of Clanronald and Glengary marching in the van. Clanronald, who led in person the right wing, was killed at the first onset, which occasioned a sudden pause; but Glengary, who succeeded to the command, stepping forward, waved his bonnet, and cried three or four times aloud, "Revenge;" On this the men rushed down upon the royalists, sword in hand, with such irresistible impetuosity, that the left wing of the King's army was in a short time entirely broken; and General Whetham, who commanded it, carried the news of his own defeat with incredible expedition to Stirling—declaring the ruin of the whole army to be inevitable. The Duke of Argyle, who commanded the right wing in person, charged, and drove the enemy before him, about two miles, though they repeatedly attempted to rally. On his return from this pursuit, he was unexpectedly confronted by the victorious rebels on their return from the pursuit of Whetham; and each army found itself possessed of the station occupied, in the early part of the engagement, by its adversary. In this posture they remained till evening, when the rebels returned to Ardoch, and the Duke to Dumblaine; and next day, marching back to the field of battle, he carried off the wounded, and several pieces of cannon left by the enemy. Though the combat was thus indecisive, all the honour as well as advantage rested with the Duke of Argyle, who, with an inferior force, had entirely disconcerted the schemes of his antagonist. Various successes were obtained also by the royalists in the northern parts of Scotland, where the loss of Inverness was severely felt by the rebels; and Argyle having been joined by large re-inforcements, it was with difficulty that Mar kept the field till the arrival of the Pretender in person, who landed at Peterhead the 26th of December, and immediately issued various proclamations; one of which was for summoning a convention of the estates; a second ordering all fencible men to repair to his standard; and a third fixing a day for his coronation. He cherished, however, no sanguine hope of success;* and, in a short time, the folly and rashness of the enterprise became so apparent, that, on receiving intelligence of the approach of the Duke of Argyle, he resolved to embark on board a French ship lying in the harbour of Montrose, (February 4, 1716,) accompanied by the Earls of Mar and Melfort, which, stretching over to Norway, in order to avoid pursuit, and coasting along the shores of Germany and Holland, arrived in five days at Gravelines. The rebel army, retiring northward, quietly dispersed without making any farther effort, or receiving the slightest molestation from the royalists.†

* Though the abilities of the Earl of Halifax as a statesman and financier were unquestionably great, he is perhaps still more known to posterity as a most munificent patron of literature; maintaining in this respect an illustrious rivalship with the Earl of Oxford, the head of the opposite state faction: in the lapse of a century, these noblemen have had, in this view, neither equals nor successors.

The rebellion in both kingdoms was thus happily and speedily suppressed; but the clemency of the King did not appear so conspicuous as might have been expected. The Lords Derwentwater, Nithisdale, and Nairne, with several other noblemen, being tried in Westminster hall, received sentence of death. Earnest intercession was made for the condemned Lords; and the Countesses of Derwentwater, and Nithisdale, and Lady Nairne, threw themselves at the King's feet, and with affecting and urgent supplications implored his mercy; but no mitigation of the sentence could be obtained. In consequence of divers petitions presented to the House of Peers, a motion was made, and carried by a majority of five voices, "that the House should address the throne to reprieve such of the condemned Lords as should deserve his Majesty's mercy;" but to this address the King answered, "that on this and all other occasions he would do what he thought most consistent with the dignity of the crown and the safety of his people." The Earl of Nottingham, who had supported the motion, so far incurred the displeasure of the court, that he was within a few days removed from his office of president of the council, and his brother the Earl of Aylesford from the Chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster.‡

Many of the lower classes of the people also fell a sacrifice to the fatal delusion of those mistaken principles which led them to engage in this revolt, which might in all human probability, have been easily prevented by the adoption of a more equitable and generous policy. The King was, notwithstanding, of a disposition by no means harsh or implacable: on the contrary, it was with extreme hesitation and reluctance that he concurred in the measures which he was assured were necessary to his safety.

A. D. 1716.] The ministry, perceiving, and probably resenting, the general discontent and disaffection of the people, now found or imagined the necessity of adopting a powerful measure for the preservation of the public safety. This was the introduction of the famous septennial bill, in the session of 1716, by which the Parliament not only assumed a power of prolonging the duration of future Parliaments, but even its own; and having been elected by the nation for three years, they elected themselves for four years more. It has, however, been truly urged in its favour, that it was agreeable to the sentiments of a great and respectable part of the nation, who had long seen and deplored the evils attending the frequent recurrence of Parliamentary elections under the corrupt, though long established, modes of election; and who were convinced of the danger which must eventually have arisen from the dissolution of the present Parliament at a juncture so critical. The bill, which originated in the House of Peers, was opposed with great ability by several noblemen, particularly by the Earl of Nottingham, who had now quitted his connection with the Whigs.§

The question of commitment being at length put, it was carried in the affirmative, after a violent debate, by 96 voices against 61. Thirty Lords, however, entered their protest, at the head of whom were the Dukes of Somerset and Shrewsbury. When this bill was transmitted to the Commons, it had to encounter an opposition still more formidable. No sooner was it announced to the House, by two of the judges sent from the Peers, that their Lordships had passed a bill for enlarging the time of the continuance of Parliaments, to which they desired their concurrence, than Lord Guernsey moved to reject the bill without reading it. The House, however, determined by a great majority to receive it; the bill was read a first and second time; and, after a long and animated debate, the motion for its commitment was carried, by 284 against 162.

Whilst this memorable bill was pending, various petitions were presented against it; but it was finally passed, by 264 votes against 121; and soon afterwards received the royal assent; the King expressing in his

* "For me," said he in a speech addressed to his friends convened in council, "it will be no new thing if I am unfortunate: my whole life, even from my cradle, has shown a constant series of misfortunes; and I am prepared, if so it please God, to suffer the threats of my enemies and yours."

† When the Earl of Mar arrived at Paris, he published a narrative of his expedition into Scotland; in which he declared, "That, a month before the chevalier landed, the resolution was taken of abandoning Perth, in consequence of the total failure of their expectations. Instead of the wild incursion into England, he had imagined that Mr. Forster would have co-operated with him in the south of Scotland; and had actually detached 1500 men across the Forth to join him. The vigilance of the government had prevented any insurrection in the west, where the Duke of Ormond, after actually landing incognito, was immediately compelled to retreat. They were wholly disappointed in their expected supplies of men and ammunition from France. The Duke of Berwick positively refused to repair to Scotland to take the chief command; and it is plainly intimated that the conduct of Lord Bolingbroke, at this time entrusted by the chevalier with the principal management of his affairs, was in the highest degree insidious." It is evident, that the chevalier had too little sense or sagacity to avail himself of the talents, or derive advantage from the counsels, of Lord Bolingbroke; and that Lord Bolingbroke had too much pride, and too little either of zeal or of hope, to take any pains to accommodate his conduct to existing circumstances.

‡ In the last declaration of the Earl of Derwentwater, a young nobleman whose virtues and accomplishments made him the object of general regard and compassion, he apologised for suffering himself to be persuaded, though with difficulty, to the disingenuous expedient of pleading guilty upon his trial, in the flattering hope of obtaining a pardon, knowing that his intentions were ever strictly honourable and disinterested—though, had the Prince who governed granted him life, he professed that he should have thought himself under an obligation never more to have taken up arms against him.

§ His Lordship observed, "that frequent Parliaments were the essence of the English constitution, and were sanctioned by the practice of ages; that the members of the Lower House were delegated by the body of the nation for a certain term of years, at the expiration of which they were no longer the representatives of the people; that by thus lengthening, at their own pleasure, the duration of their own authority, they deprived the people of the only remedy which the wisdom of our ancestors had provided against the ignorance and corruption of those who might be tempted to betray the trust reposed in them; that as to the pretence of adding energy or stability to the foreign transactions or projected alliances of government, what Prince or state could rationally entrust us with the care of their interests, when we appeared so ready to abandon our own? that the preamble of the bill itself might suffice to deter them from entering into engagements with our government, when they understood by it that the Popish and Jacobite faction was so powerful as to threaten destruction to the present establishment; and that the government acknowleded its weakness to be such, as to make so extraordinary a provision necessary for its safety, when it appeared that the nation was not to be trusted, and that the affections of the King's subjects were restricted within the limits of the House of Commons. He affirmed that a long Parliament would encourage every species of corruption in every class of the community; that the value of a seat would bear a determinate proportion to the legal duration of Parliaments, and the purchase would rise accordingly; that a long Parliament would both enhance the temptations, and multiply the opportunities, of a vicious ministry, to undermine the integrity and independency of Parliaments far beyond what could occur if they were short and frequent; that the reasons urged for prolonging the duration of this Parliament to seven years would probably be as strong, and by perseverance in the same impolitic conduct, might be made much stronger before the end of that term, for continuing and even perpetuating their legislative power." On the other hand, Lord Carteret, who, though young as a statesman, was one of the ablest speakers in support of the bill, "acknowledged that frequent Parliaments are a great security of the people's rights and liberties; but he observed that this bill was not against frequent meetings of Parliaments, but only against frequent elections; that they ought maturely to weigh and consider what was suggested in the preamble of the bill; that there is a restless Popish faction, designing and endeavouring to renew the rebellion within this kingdom; that of all rebellions, this last was the most monstrous and unnatural,—for all others were carried on under pretences of liberty, whereas the last was a rebellion for slavery. That as to our allies abroad, though he could not affirm that they expected this bill, yet it was reasonable to suppose that they would rejoice to see it pass into a law, having found, by sad experience, that great changes may be made in the best concerted measure by different Parliaments, inflamed by different ministers; that, in short, this bill would fix the King and the present happy establishment on a lasting foundation, and therefore he was for committing it."

speech at the conclusion of the session (June 26) the satisfaction he felt at the prospect of a "settled government," supported by a Parliament which had shown such zeal for the prosperity of their country, and the Protestant interest of Europe. His Majesty now feeling himself in a state of perfect security, and having been, by an act passed in the course of the last session, relieved from the embarrassment of a clause in the act of settlement restraining him from leaving the kingdom without the consent of Parliament, determined to revisit his dominions in Germany.

Louis XIV. had terminated his reign and life, September 1, 1715. He was succeeded by Louis XV. an infant only five years of age, and the government of the kingdom was now vested in the hands of the Duke of Orleans, Regent of France. This Prince, who, in case of the death of the infant monarch, had just pretensions to the throne of France, dreaded, notwithstanding the act of renunciation, the competition of the King of Spain. The situation of the King of England, who had also the designs of a restless rival to oppose, being analogous to that of the Regent, they eagerly concluded a treaty of friendship and alliance, to which the States General, after some hesitation and delay, acceded. This treaty was signed at the Hague, January 1717, by Lord Cadogan, l'abbé Dubois, and pensionary Heinsius. In England, it excited much murmur and surprise; nor would the nation believe that the Protestant succession could derive any additional security from the guarantee of France.*

The affair, however, which principally engaged the King's solicitude at this period, was the recent cession of the Duchies of Bremen and Verden by Denmark, who had conquered them from the Swedes; and for which Denmark was to receive a certain equivalent in money from Hanover. Exclusively, however, of this pretended equivalent, the King of England, as Elector of Hanover, undertook to guarantee to Denmark the Duchy of Sleswic, conquered by that power from the Duke of Holstein, the ally of Sweden, and son of Hedwig Sophia eldest sister of Charles XII.—his Danish Majesty thus parting with one-half of his conquests, to establish a permanent property in the other. The ratifications of the treaty by which these duchies were ceded to Hanover were exchanged July 1715, and the duchies actually delivered into the possession of his Britannic Majesty October 15th next ensuing; on which day, agreeably to an express proviso of the treaty, war was declared by King George, in his electoral capacity, against Sweden. This whole transaction the King of Sweden regarded as a flagrant injury and insult: and little regarding, in the vehemence of his anger, the distinction arising from the twofold character sustained by his adversary, as King of England and Elector of Hanover, and well knowing that, in the mere capacity of Elector, he would not have ventured to gratify his ambition so much at the risque of his safety, he directed all the efforts of his vengeance against the English nation, who appeared to him to countenance this usurpation.

During the summer of the same year (1715) Sir J. Norris sailed with a strong squadron to the Baltic, for the protection of the national commerce, which had suffered extremely from the hostile resentment of the Swedes. The purposes of this armament were, however, much more of a political than a commercial nature; for by a memorial presented in the month of October to the court of London, the Swedish ambassador complained "that the English squadron had actually joined the Danish fleet in the attack upon the island of Rugen, 'in consequence of the late cession of Bremen and Verden,' contrary to the treaties subsisting between the two nations." The King of Sweden was himself at this time besieged in the city of Stralsund; to the reduction of which that of the isle of Rugen was considered as preparatory. Rugen was taken; and the Swedish monarch made his escape with extreme personal hazard, in the night preceding the surrender of Stralsund. A disposition much less inflammable than that of Charles XII. might be easily supposed roused into resentment by such treatment. In the succeeding summer also (1716) Sir John Norris had again appeared in the Baltic, openly acting in conjunction with the Danes. At this period, therefore, with a view to gratify his hatred and revenge against the King of England, the King of Sweden was deeply engaged in negotiations and intrigues with the English mal-contents; and a project was formed for the invasion of the kingdom, by that monarch, at the head of a large body of forces. The King of England, who had received information from various quarters, of this conspiracy, on his return from the continent caused the Swedish ambassador, Count Gyllenburg, to be arrested. At the same time Baron Goertz, the Swedish resident in Holland, was arrested, at the requisition of the King, by order of the States; and in the papers of these two noblemen, was found ample proof of their secret machinations. The foreign ministers were not a little alarmed at this extraordinary procedure; and the Marquis de Monteleone, the Spanish ambassador, in particular, expressed his astonishment and regret that no other mode of preserving the peace of the kingdom could be devised, than by arresting the persons of ambassadors, and seizing their papers—the sacred repositories of their masters' secrets. The Secretary of State, Mr. Methuen, stated the urgent necessity which had impelled the King his master to adopt a measure so contrary to his inclinations: and Baron Goertz openly avowed the whole project of the invasion, of which he acknowledged himself the author, and which he said "was amply justified by the conduct of the King of Great Britain, who had joined the confederacy against the King of Sweden without having received the least provocation —who had assisted the King of Denmark in subduing the Duchies of Bremen and Verden, and then purchased them of the usurper—and who had, in the course of this very summer, sent a strong squadron of ships to the Baltic, where it joined the Danes and Russians against the Swedes." The states of Holland not venturing to detain the Baron long in confinement, he prosecuted his designs with great increase of zeal.

Parliament met on the 20th of February (1717) when the King declared to the two Houses the alliance recently concluded with France and the United Provinces, and stated the actual danger of an invasion from Sweden; and in a short time copies of the letters which had passed between the ministers Gyllenburg and Goertz were laid before them;† and a royal message

* This treaty with France was preceded by two others—the first a defensive alliance between the Emperor, Great Britain, and Holland, signed November 1715, by which all differences relating to the Dutch barrier was accommodated, and the Protestant succession in the house of Brunswick guarantied by the Emperor: the second a defensive alliance between England and the Emperor, signed May 1716, by which the quota of troops to be furnished on each side, in case of necessity, was fixed, and the Protestant succession anew guarantied by the Emperor. This treaty was never formally communicated to Parliament, and appears to have been chiefly designed as a political manœuvre to quicken and facilitate the negotiations then depending with France.

† Of the dangerous nature of this correspondence a few passages may be selected as proofs. October 1716, Gyllenburg writes, "There is no medium. Either Bremen or the Hanoverian must be sacrificed. The latter is not so difficult, considering the general discontent. Ten thousand men would be sufficient. The mal-contents require but a body of regular forces, to which they may join themselves. That body being transported in the month of March, when the easterly winds reign, and when it will not in the least be dreamt of, will cause a general revolt."——November 1716, "I should believe, that if the preliminary concerning Bremen was settled, we might come to an agreement in relation to what they ought to help us to take from the czar by way of reprisal for our losses in Germany. On the other hand, if we do not submit to them, your excellency may be assured, that as well to justify their past actions, as to force us to a compliance, they will prevail upon the 'mercenary Parliament' which they have at present to take vigorous resolutions, and even to declare war against us. This is what we must expect. The English ministers do not mince the matter; and they have already made it appear that they will stick at nothing. They are all furious persons. Sunderland, who is in a manner at the head of affairs, has got all the interest he has with the King of England by having consented to what has been done against us; and, being beside our enemy, is at present at Hanover to take his instructions from the Germans: and your excellency may depend upon it he will execute them with all the boldness imaginable.

sage was delivered in the month of April to the House of Commons, by General Stanhope, informing the House of the danger which still impended over the nation from the designs of Sweden, and demanding an extraordinary supply, to enable him to make good such engagements as it might be necessary for him to contract with other powers, in order effectually to avert it. A supply of 250,000*l.* was accordingly voted, but by a majority of four voices only, and not without vehement debate and opposition, chiefly in consequence of an alarming division in the administration, and the eventual secession of various of its members distinguished equally by eminence of station and ability—amongst whom Lord Townshend, some time Secretary of State, and lately appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and Mr. Walpole, first commissioner of the Treasury, appeared most conspicuous. The message was declared, by Mr. Shippen, to be unparliamentary and unprecedented: penned, he supposed, by some foreigner totally unacquainted with their accustomed forms of procedure, and their invariable usage of granting money only on estimate, and for certain specified services. And he asked, what glorious advantages were to be obtained for England, which made it necessary to incur this expence, and to encounter this danger? Mr. Hungerford ridiculed the idea of courting, and much more of purchasing, foreign alliances; and said, that a nation so lately the terror of France and Spain was surely able to defend itself, in any cause which called for national exertion, from the attack of so inconsiderable an enemy as Sweden. General Stanhope, in the warmth of debate, happening to assert, "that none could refuse compliance with this message, but such as were not the King's friends," much offence was taken, by many members far removed from the suspicion of disaffection; and Mr. Lawson, member for Cumberland, observed, "that he was surprised to hear such unguarded expressions fall from so respectable a person; and that if every member of the House who used freedom of speech must be accounted an enemy to the King, whenever he happened to disapprove of the measures of his ministers, he knew no service they could render to their country in that House; and it were better at once to retire to their country seats, and leave the King and his ministers to act entirely at their discretion."

In conclusion, though the subsidy was granted, the dissatisfaction of the House was strongly apparent; and the fact itself remained indisputable, that the Germanic politics of the King had embroiled the kingdom of Great Britain in a dangerous contest, not only with Sweden but Russia. Before the rising of the Parliament, however, the King informed the two Houses, in person, by a speech from the throne, that a powerful fleet under Sir George Byng had safely arrived in the Baltic, and that the danger of an immediate invasion was now removed.

The debate on the supply was the prelude to a great and almost total change in the ministry, which had been for some time past agitated by great internal animosities. On the very evening of the day on which the discontented party had distinguished themselves by their public and Parliamentary opposition to the measures of the court, Lord Townshend was dismissed from his government of Ireland; and, on the next morning, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Methuen, and Mr. Pulteney, delivered in their resignations. Also, in a short time, the Earl of Oxford relinquished his seat at the head of the admiralty, and the Duke of Devonshire at the board of council—Lord Cowper, with difficulty, consenting to retain possession of the great seal.* To the astonishment of the nation, Stanhope, divesting himself of his military character, now assumed the gown of Chancellor of the Exchequer; and a general of horse was, for the first time, placed at the head of the Board of Treasury. The Earl of Sunderland was constituted Secretary of State in his room; his colleague being the celebrated Addison. The Earl of Berkeley succeeded the Earl of Orford, and the Duke of Bolton Lord Townshend—the office of Lord Chamberlain, vacated by the last promotion, being conferred upon the Duke of Newcastle. The Duke of Kingston had, some months previously to these political changes, been constituted Lord Privy-Seal in the room of the Earl of Wharton, deceased; and the Duke of Roxburgh appointed Secretary of State for Scotland.†

During the present session, a very short time previously to his resignation, Mr. Walpole had exhibited a signal proof of his financial ability in the introduction of the memorable bill for the reduction of the public debt; which, amongst other regulations, enacted, that all the public funds redeemable by law, and bearing higher interest than five per cent. be redeemed according to the respective provisoes of clauses of redemption; and that the irredeemable annuities, with consent of the proprietors, be converted into an interest, or perpetual annuity, not exceeding five per cent. per annum, redeemable by Parliament. By this bill the joint surpluses arising as well from the proposed reduction of interest from six to five per cent, as from the excesses of the several taxes appropriated to the payment of the interest, were solemnly declared to be solely and unalienably applicable, under the denomination of a sinking fund, to the discharge of the principal of the public debt contracted previous to the 25th of December, 1716. It has been justly observed, that, "had this plan been as steadily prosecuted as it was wisely concerted, the nation would have been soon relieved from her pecuniary difficulties: for as, in consequence of the progressive redemption of the debt, the surpluses must increase with accelerated rapidity, it operated, so long as it was allowed to operate, with a marvellous and almost magic energy."

Riots and tumults, the natural consequences of the measures adopted by the present ministry, broke out from time to time in various parts of the kingdom with alarming symptoms of disaffection and violence. Oaken boughs worn on the 10th of May, and white roses on the 10th of June, the birth-day of the Pretender, were the ostentatious badges of the party. The spirit of disloyalty and sedition, however, seemed to display itself at this period with more conspicuous malignity at the imaginable. Your excellency therefore will find we ought to make use of this opportunity to enter into measures against people who certainly will not do any thing by halves. We must either ruin them, or be undone ourselves—that is, if it be in their power to bring it to pass. My friends are now in town. An express which came to them yesterday from the Pretender will put them in better condition for forming a plan. To-day they are going about it." Baron Goertz writes to Count Gyllenburg, December 11, 1716: "As I run no risque with you, Sir, I will freely tell you, that, even before my departure from Sweden, we were already, on our side, disposed to this expedition. It is easy to believe that those dispositions are since increased, in proportion as the animosity of the court where you are hath continued increasing. There is therefore now no other question, but of the means to satisfy our just desire of revenge. For several months past we have had some preliminary negotiation upon these matters with the court of Avignon. Which way can the King of Sweden better secure to himself the recovery and possession of the said duchy (viz. Bremen) than by reducing King George to be nothing more than an elector of the empire?" Again, January 1717: "Assure your friends, that the expedition to England does at present take up all our thoughts and attention.—Tell me whence proceeds the good disposition wherein Walpole seems to be?"

* Great endeavours were made to detach Walpole from his party—the King himself condescending to urge his continuance in office with extreme earnestness; but his resolution was not to be shaken.

† Mutual resentment and aversion from this time succeeded to the friendship which had formerly subsisted between Stanhope and Walpole. In a debate which took place soon after the change of administration, Stanhope observed, "that, conscious of his incapacity for the affairs of the Treasury, he had accepted of this employment, so remote from his studies and inclination in obedience to the King's commands; that, however, he would endeavour to make up by honesty, application, and disinterestedness, what he wanted in ability and experience; that he would content himself with the salary and lawful perquisites of his office; and, though he had quitted a better place, he would not quarter himself upon any body to make it up; that he had no brothers, nor other relations, to provide for: and that, upon his first entering into the Treasury, he had made a standing order against the late practice of granting reversions of places." Mr. Walpole, touched with these inuendoes, replied with great asperity; and so bitter an altercation ensued, that the House was obliged to interpose its authority in order to prevent any disastrous consequences. Mr. Hungerford remarked, that "it became the members of that House, after the oriental fashion, to avert their countenances while these two great men, the fathers of the state, were thus exposing each other's nakedness."

city of Oxford than perhaps any other place; insomuch that it was deemed necessary by the government to station there a considerable military force, between whom and the youth of the University frequent occasions of quarrel arose; some of which were of sufficient magnitude to come under judicial cognizance.

The Prince of Wales, who had been constituted guardian of the realm during the absence of the King, had conducted himself with such prudence, and had acquired such popularity as to excite the serious umbrage of the monarch, by whom he was never again entrusted with the reins of government. On the return of the King, numerous addresses of congratulation were presented; amongst which, one from the University of Cambridge, particularly noticing the suppression of the late rebellion, was most graciously received. At a meeting of the Vice-Chancellor and heads of houses in Oxford, a motion being made for the same purpose, it was rejected with marked indignation. The cry of 'the Church and Sacheverel' seemed still to retain considerable efficacy and influence over the multitude; and the dwelling-houses and meeting-houses of the Sectaries were the favourite objects of the popular vengeance. The House of Commons consequently presented an address to the King, in which they stated, "that great numbers of his Majesty's deluded subjects had assembled in a tumultuous and rebellious manner, had committed great disorders, and done great injuries to others of their fellow-subjects and fellow Protestants; and they declare it to be their indispensable duty to express their utmost abhorrence of all such traiterous proceedings, and their highest resentment against the authors and promoters of them; and beseech his Majesty, that the laws now in force may be put in speedy and vigorous execution against them. And they further desire that, in justice to those who for their zeal and firm adherence to his Majesty's government have been sufferers in the said tumultuous and traiterous disorders, his Majesty would be graciously pleased to direct an exact account to be taken of the losses and damages sustained by such sufferers, in order that full compensation may be made; and assuring his Majesty, that all the expenses so incurred shall be made good out of the first aids granted by Parliament." The King replied, that he would give immediate directions for putting in execution the several matters so justly recommended to him." This was followed by a very loyal address from the dissenters themselves, acknowledging the seasonable protection granted them by government, and expressing a grateful sense of his Majesty's gracious answer to the address of his faithful Commons in favour of those whose sufferings they so justly impute to the zeal displayed by them for his Majesty's person and government. To this address his Majesty replied in the most gracious terms, assuring them of his royal protection and a full compensation for all their sufferings.*

The Earl of Oxford, having remained two years in the Tower, was now encouraged, by the defection of his most powerful adversary, Mr. Walpole, to petition the House of Lords that his imprisonment might not be indefinite. The house, in consequence, appointed an early day for his trial in Westminster-hall; for which the most solemn and magnificent preparations were made. The articles of the impeachment having been read, Sir Joseph Jekyl stood up as one of the committee of managers, in the name of the Commons of England, to make good the first charge; on which Lord Harcourt rose and observed, "that the articles of the impeachment being numerous, and two of them only extended to the charge of high treason, it was superfluous to enter into the investigation of the rest till these had been decided upon; for, supposing him guilty of all, the utmost their Lordships could inflict, or the earl could suffer, would amount to no more than the forfeiture of life and estate." The Commons affected to resent what they stiled an encroachment upon their privileges, and peremptorily refused to proceed in the order prescribed by the Lords. The Lords on their part haughtily refused "a free conference" on the subject, as demanded by the Commons: and on their non-appearance at the subsequent adjournment of the court, the Earl was acquitted; as was generally believed, with the secret approbation and concurrence of the crown. The Commons, however, presented an address to the King, desiring that he might be excepted out of the intended act of grace; by which they expressed at once their sense of the Earl's demerit, and their contempt of their Lordships' sentence of acquittal. The act of grace accordingly passed with this and some other exceptions; and Oxford, to preserve some appearance of consistency, was forbidden to present himself at court; but no attempt was at any time made to revive the proceedings against him.† The session of Parliament terminated July 15.

In the spring of this year, the minister of Russia had presented a memorial to the court of London, setting forth the solicitude of the czar to conclude a treaty of amity with his Majesty, and to guarantee the Hanover succession; saying, "that it was not the fault of his Czarish Majesty that the said negociation was not brought to a happy conclusion; although his Czarish Majesty has lately observed, that several contrary steps have been taken by your Majesty's ministers in many foreign courts, particularly at the court of Vienna, and those of Denmark and Prussia, as well as at the diet of Ratisbon, though his Czarish Majesty had given no cause for such measures; notwithstanding that he had sufficient reasons to be upon his guard, and to provide for his own security, considering the general report, and the particular advices he had from many places, that your Majesty is negociating a separate peace with Sweden, in which you promise your assistance against his Czarish Majesty, upon the condition of the cession of Bremen and Verden, as it plainly appears by the letter lately published by the Swedish minister." An answer was delivered to this memorial, dated April 2, 1717, which says,—"As to the complaints contained in that memorial of the steps which his Majesty may have taken at several courts in Germany with regard to the Russian troops in the empire, granting it to be true that the British ministers had acted with vigour at the said courts in order to procure the evacuation of the said troops, his Czarish Majesty ought not to be in the least surprized at it, considering the strict union which has so long subsisted between Great Britain, the Emperor, and the empire; which union has been confirmed and strengthened the last year by a new treaty of alliance and guarantee between the Emperor and the King." The breach between the courts of London and St. Petersburgh became every day more public; and the animosity of the Czar being raised to the highest pitch, he at length acceded to the preliminaries of a convention, through the intervention of Baron Goertz, with his inveterate rival the King of Sweden, with whom he had been nearly twenty years at war, and assented to the project of elevating the Pretender to the throne of Great Britain. When the King of England passed through Holland, on his return from Hanover, (January 1717,) the Czar Peter was at the Hague; but the two monarchs were mutually indisposed to a personal interview. A conference between the Czarish Majesty and Baron Goertz took place soon after at Loo, in which the foundation was probably laid of the good understanding which was in a short time established between Sweden and Russia.

The good fortune of the King of England, however,

* At this period the riot act passed for the prevention of similar disorders, declaring it to be felony for more than twelve persons to remain assembled more than one hour after its being publicly read by the magistrate; and by the salutary operation of this law the internal tranquillity of the kingdom was in a great degree restored and established.

† By virtue of this act of grace, the Lords Carnwath, Widrington, and Nairne, with many other persons of distinction concerned in the late rebellion, were discharged. Lord Nithisdale had previously effected his escape; the Earl of Derwentwater and Lord Viscount Kenmure only suffering the utmost rigour of the law. The prison doors throughout England and Scotland, were now at length thrown open, and the wretched captives immured in the castles of Lancaster, Chester, Carlisle, Edinburgh, and Stirling, were set at liberty. Great numbers, however, had previously been sent as slaves to the plantations, or had silently expired in their dungeons.

which throughout his life was remarkable, soon delivered him from all apprehensions, by the death of the King of Sweden, who was killed in the trenches before the fortress of Frederickshall in Norway, November 30, 1718, O. S.; an event which produced great political convulsions in Sweden, in the first shock of which Baron Goertz lost his head on the scaffold.

Parliament again met in November, 1717; when the King assured the two Houses that his endeavours to preserve the public tranquillity had not been unsuccessful; and that he had reason to believe they would in the end produce their full effect. A considerable reduction of the army was in consequence proposed on the part of the ministers, who contented themselves with moving for 18,000 men only for the service of the ensuing year. Even this force was deemed by the opposition unnecessary, and a fruitless effort was made to limit the number to 12,000. Mr. Walpole, in particular, declaimed with much energy on the danger of a standing army in a free country; and Mr. Shippen used such strong language, that he was committed to the Tower. —In the course of the session another remarkable debate took place on the introduction of the annual bill for the prevention of mutiny and desertion: when Mr. Walpole again appeared as the champion of the rights and liberties of a great and high-spirited nation determined to live or to die free. Martial law was declared by him, and many others in the House, to be a law unknown to our constitution, destructive of our liberties, and not endured by our ancestors; and it was moved that the offences committed by the soldiery be cognizable and punishable by the civil magistrate. On the clause, whether courts-martial should punish mutiny and desertion with death, it was carried in the affirmative by 217 voices against 229. Upon this occasion Mr. Walpole used the memorable expression, "He that is for blood shall have blood." In the Lords, where the debate was renewed with equal vehemence, the bill finally passed by a majority of 88 against 61 voices.*

The session of Parliament closed March 21; a few days previously to which, the King, by message, informed the House of Commons, "that he had reason to judge, from the information he had lately received from abroad, that an additional naval force would be necessary;" and an address was moved and presented, assuring his Majesty "that the House would make good such exceedings as his Majesty in his royal wisdom should deem necessary for the purpose of giving effect to his unwearied endeavours to preserve the peace of Europe." No division on this motion took place, Mr. Walpole alone observing, "that this pacific address had violently the air of a declaration of war."

A new and interesting scene now began to open, and the designs of the court of Herenhausen gradually unfolded themselves. Though Bremen and Verden had been several years in the actual possession of the King of England, the investiture of those duchies by the Emperor was still wanting to complete the validity of the purchase. This, therefore, had been for some time past the grand object of the attention and solicitude of the English court; and as the Emperor, notwithstanding the recent renewal of treaties, affected delay, indicated much reluctance to comply with the eager applications of the English monarch, means were to be devised to obviate his objections, or at least to convince his Imperial Majesty how much it concerned the interests of the court of Vienna not to insist too strongly or pertinaciously upon them. By the treaty of Utrecht, the kingdoms of Naples and Sardinia were ceded to the House of Austria, together with Milan and the Low Countries: and the island of Sicily, with the title of King, to the Duke of Savoy. This was a subject of bitter chagrin to the Emperor, who was anxiously desirous to annex to his other Italian dominions that opulent and extensive island, from time immemorial connected with the neighbouring kingdom of Naples, from which it had been so recently disjoined by an act of political violence. The intrigues of the court of Vienna to this purpose were well known to the Hanoverian cabinet; and, so long since as November, 1716, Secretary Stanhope, speaking of the situation of Victor Amadeus of Savoy, in a dispatch to Lord Townshend from Hanover, used these words: "He will think himself very happy if the King can secure his peace with the Emperor at the expense of Sicily; so that we may boldly offer Sicily to the Emperor, and may, I hope, secure his assistance for these northern affairs." On the other hand, Spain was no less dissatisfied with the situation in which she was left by the treaty of Utrecht than the Emperor. Her pride was deeply wounded by the forcible dismemberment of her monarchy, though the experience of a century had shewn how little accession of strength she really derived from the possession of those detached and remote provinces, or rather how great an increase of weakness. Cardinal Alberoni, Prime Minister of Philip V. a man of a lofty and aspiring genius, which delighted to form bold and dangerous projects, at this time entertained the chimerical hope of re-uniting to the monarchy of Spain the kingdoms and provinces of which she had been divested; and the Emperor, being actually engaged in a war with Turkey, the Cardinal embraced the opportunity to equip a formidable armament, which sailed from Barcelona, July 1717, and, landing at Cagliara, the capital of Sardinia, soon made an entire conquest of the island; pretending, as a reason for this invasion, the previous violation of the most positive engagements on the part of the Emperor.†

The war carried on against the Ottoman Porte by the Emperor was occasioned by the ambition of the Sultan Achmet III. to recover possession of the Morea, ceded to the Venetians by the treaty of Carlowitz. The court of Vienna, actuated by the lofty genius of Prince Eugene, first remonstrated against so flagrant a violation of that treaty of which she was one of the chief contracting parties and guarantees; and then openly commenced hostilities in defence of the rights of her ally. The immense but undisciplined armies of the Turks were found unable to cope with the superior skill and extraordinary talents of the Imperial General, who, in the course of this new war, fully sustained the glory he had formerly acquired in the fields of Zenta. Crossing the Danube in the sight of the enemy, he gained a complete victory (A. D. 1716), at Peter-

* An extraordinary incident happened in the month of March this year, (1718) on the trial and execution of James Shepherd, a youth under nineteen years of age, for a singular and atrocious design upon the life of the King. He had imbibed from his childhood the highest principles of monarchial right; and regarding the present sovereign as an unjust invader of the crown, he formed a cool and deliberate resolution to assassinate him. On the 24th of January he left a letter at the house of Mr. John Leake, a non-juring clergyman, in which he declared his belief, from the discontents visible throughout the kingdom, that, if the Prince now reigning could be removed, the King might be settled on the throne without loss of blood. In order to effect this, he professed his readiness, should it be thought advisable to trust one so young, to convey letters of invitation to his Majesty, then in Italy; and on his arrival in England "I will," said he, "smite the usurper in his palace." He acknowledged, nevertheless, the temerity of his attempt, and the probability of his suffering a cruel death; which, that he might the better support, he desired, from the period of his return to England to that of making the attempt, to receive every day the holy sacrament from one who, that he might be exempt from any participation in the danger, should be entirely ignorant of the design. Leake, alarmed at the contents of the epistle, gave immediate information to the magistrates; and, on Shepherd's again repairing to the house, he was apprehended. On being examined at the office of Lord Sunderland, he avowed himself, without hesitation, the writer of the letter, glorying in his design, which he affirmed had been for three years past in his contemplation. On his trial he disdained to make any defence, but acknowledged the truth of the depositions, and declared, that he died a willing martyr to his principles. At the place of execution he was attended by one Orme, a non-juring priest, who gave him public absolution; for which daring insult on the government, he was taken into custody, but soon afterwards discharged, nothing further being proved against him. Shepherd died with undaunted and heroic firmness, leaving to mankind an instructive and memorable example in how dreadful a degree the most admirable qualities of the human mind may be perverted and depraved by a fatal conjunction with speculative errors.

† It should be remarked that no definitive treaty had taken place between Spain and the Emperor since the war of the succession, nor had the respective titles of these rival potentates been as yet reciprocally and formally acknowledged.

waradin;—the grand visir, Ali Coumourgi, and almost all the pachas and agas who commanded under him, with the flower of the Turkish army, perishing in the battle, which was immediately followed by the siege and capture of Temeswar, and the reduction of a great part of Walachia. Early in the following campaign Eugene invested Belgrade; and an immense army of 150,000 men being assembled by the new grand visir, Astchi Ali, for its relief, encamped on the heights surrounding that city in the form of an amphitheatre, through the openings of which flow the rivers Save and Danube: so that the besiegers were themselves in a manner besieged. The Imperial General did not await the attack; but, marching out of his entrenchments, charged the enemy with such impetuosity that they were again totally defeated with the loss of their camp, artillery, and baggage—the field being covered with a countless multitude of the slain. Belgrade surrendered the next day; and the Sublime Porte, being thrown into the utmost consternation by these repeated disasters, immediately set on foot a negociation, which, under the mediation of the maritime powers, terminated in a pacification signed at Passarowitz, September 1, 1718. Conformably to the terms of this treaty, the conquests acquired by the heroic valour and high fortune of Prince Eugene remained with the Emperor; while, on the other hand, the Turks were suffered to retain the Morea, the successful invasion of which constituted the original pretext for the court of Vienna to interfere as a party in the war. The duplicity of Spain, during these transactions, was so gross as to excite the indignation of all Christendom. The Catholic King had given strong and repeated assurances to the Pope, that he would not undertake any thing against the Emperor whilst his army should be employed in so religious a cause, and would even aid the Venetians with a squadron of men of war. The ships so sent did not however arrive in the Levant till the season for action had elapsed; and the circular letter or manifesto of M. de Grimaldi openly avowed, "that his Catholic Majesty looked upon the war with the Turks to have opened to him a gate of revenge in recovering those territories which had been usurped from him by the Archduke." On this, a sort of counter-declaration was published by the Cardinal Paulucci, Secretary to the Pope, to clear his holiness from the imputation of any collusion in this affair; and expressive of vehement resentment at the violation of faith in his Catholic Majesty, for whose neutrality during the Turkish war the pontiff had pledged himself in the most solemn manner. The Emperor loudly complaining of this attack, while his armies were combating the common enemy of the Christian faith, and the King of Spain professing a willingness to submit the justice of his quarrel to equitable arbitration, the King of England, and the Regent of France, in concert with the States General, undertook the accommodation of these differences. Conferences being opened with the court of Vienna, the famous Quadruple Alliance was at length concluded, July 1718, at London, between these formidable powers, by which it was determined that Sardinia, now actually in the possession of Spain, should be transferred to the house of Savoy, and Sicily, a more valuable possession, ceded in exchange to the Emperor. In vindication of this arbitrary and violent measure, the following very extraordinary reason is assigned in the preamble of the treaty: "the powers by which the treaty of Utrecht was set on foot believe that article, viz. 'the cession of Sicily to the house of Savoy,' which is not essential to the treaty, may justly be altered, even without the consent of the parties concerned, as it tends to the perfection of the treaty." The pretensions of Spain were altogether disregarded; only it was stipulated that the succession to the Duchies of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, claimed by the Queen of Spain as heiress of the houses of Medici and Farnese, should devolve upon her eldest son, in case of a failure of male issue: and three months only were allowed to the parties interested in these cessions to declare their acceptance or rejection. The Regent of France, from his eager desire to secure the friendship of England, and from personal animosity to the King of Spain, entered entirely into the views of the English monarch upon this occasion; yet he retained at the bottom all the Bourbon prejudices against the house of Austria. The principal obstacle to the alliance concluded A. D. 1716-17, between Great Britain and France, was the unwillingness of the Regent to assent to the expulsion of the Swedes, the ancient enemies of the Imperial house, from Germany; and he at no period discovered any further indifference respecting the political interests of the country which he governed, than a regard to his own interest and the great objects of his personal ambition, rendered absolutely requisite. Spain was little disposed to acquiesce in this settlement. The propositions of General Stanhope, the English Secretary of State, who was invested with the character of ambassador extraordinary to the court of Madrid on this occasion, were refused with disdain. A still more formidable armament than that which had last year effected the conquest of Sardinia was now fitted out, by the indefatigable exertions of Cardinal Alberoni, destined for the invasion of Sicily; his Sicilian Majesty having concerted his own measures with the court of Vienna, and wisely resolving to submit to terms which he would in vain attempt to resist. The Spaniards having landed their forces, consisting of 30,000 men, flattered themselves with the speedy reduction of this rich and beautiful island; but the King of England relying on the acquiescence of his Parliament, though England had no imaginable motive to interfere in these distant scenes of contention, caused a formidable fleet to sail for the Mediterranean, under the command of Sir George Byng, with peremptory orders to attack the Spanish fleet if engaged in any hostile enterprise against Naples or Sicily. The British Admiral, on his arrival off Cadiz, transmitted by his Secretary a copy of his instructions to the Cardinal, who perused them with great emotion; and throwing the paper passionately on the ground, in the spirit of rashness and folly, returned for answer, "that the Chevalier Byng might execute the orders he had received from the King his master." The Admiral, proceeding therefore on his voyage, cast anchor with his whole fleet in the bay of Naples, where the magnificence of the spectacle drew immense multitudes of people to the surrounding shores, which resounded with acclamations. On receiving intelligence from Count Daun, the Viceroy, that Messina, the capital of Sicily, was reduced to the last extremity, he again weighed anchor, and on the 9th of August, 1718, came in sight of the Faro of Messina; and dispatched his own captain with a message to the Marquis de Lede, commander of the Spanish forces, proposing a cessasion of arms in Sicily for two months, that the powers of Europe might have an opportunity to concert measures for restoring a lasting peace; declaring at the same time, that, should this proposal be rejected, he should, in pursuance of his instructions, use all his force to prevent further attempts to disturb the dominions the King his master had engaged to defend. The Spanish General answered, "that he had no power to treat of an armistice, but should obey his orders, which were to reduce Sicily to the dominion of his master the King of Spain." On the 11th of August the Spanish fleet, consisting of twenty-seven sail of the line, was descried off the coast of Calabria, lying to in the order of battle: and though, on the approach of the British squadron, they bore away, apparently with the view of maintaining a running fight, the superior manœuvres of the English commander soon brought on a close action, which, before sun-set, terminated in the almost total destruction of the Spanish fleet—Don Castanita, the Commander-in-chief, and three other Admirals, being captured. Captain Walton being detached by Sir George Byng with five ships of the line in pursuit of a division of the Spaniards much superior in force, acquainted the English Admiral with the event of his undertaking in the following memorable letter: "Sir, we have destroyed all the Spanish ships and vessels which were upon the coast, the number as per margin." Upon inspecting the margin of this laconic epistle, no fewer than thirteen ships of war of different descriptions were found comprised in it.—In reward of this great victory, Sir George Byng was raised to the dignity of the Peerage, by the style and title of Viscount Torrington, and received other distinguished marks of the royal favour. The court of Madrid exclaimed in the most bitter language against the conduct of England, as contrary to the law of nations, and a flagrant violation of the most solemn engagements; and orders were issued at all the ports of Spain and the Indies for making reprisals upon the English—a blow most severely felt by the mercantile part of the community; which, since the grant of the Assiento, had carried on a most lucrative commerce with the Spanish colonies in America. In consequence of this procedure, war was formally declared by England against Spain, which was soon followed by a like declaration on the part of the Regent of France. To this decisive measure the Duke of Orleans was incited, not merely by a desire to maintain inviolate his engagements with England, but by a recent provocation on the part of Spain of the most serious nature. France abounded with mal-contents, and the Regent had many enemies, who either wished his removal, or were interested in the execution of the late King's will—assigning the Regency to his legitimated son, by the celebrated Madame de Montespan, the Duc de Maine. These mal-contents were favourably heard at the court of Madrid; and the Prince de Cellamare, the Spanish Ambassador at Paris, was ordered to treat with them. A plot was soon formed, and a great number of persons of rank and distinction were involved in this conspiracy. The project was, to seize the Regent, when engaged in one of those parties of pleasure which were frequent with him in the vicinity of Paris. The King's person was at the same time to be secured, and orders were to be issued to the governors of the different provinces and towns to assemble the Parliaments for settling the government, whilst the States of the kingdom should meet and make a final determination of matters. At this juncture, the Regent received from the King of England an intimation that some attempt was contriving against his person and government. This notice, though general only, was of great use in exciting the vigilance of the Regent and his ministers, who from that time kept a very strict watch over all suspected persons, particularly the Duke and Duchess of Maine, and the Prince de Cellamare. At length the whole affair was discovered. The Ambassador of Spain had entrusted his dispatches, containing intelligence of the most secret and important nature, to the Abbe de Portocarrero, and a son of the Marquis de Monteleone. These emissaries set out from Paris in a chaise, and had not proceeded two leagues before the carriage broke down. On this occasion the Abbe shewed much more concern for his portmanteau than for himself, and he had the indiscretion to protest that he would not have lost it for a hundred thousand pistoles. The driver of the voiture, astonished at this declaration, gave notice, on his return to Paris, to the police, of what he had seen and heard. The Spaniards being pursued, were overtaken and seized at Poitiers. The whole conspiracy being thus detected, the Prince de Cellamare was arrested, and his papers secured. Soon after he was conducted under a guard to the frontier. The Marquis de Pompadour, and several other persons of note, were committed to different prisons. The Duc de Maine was sent to Dourlens, the Duchess to Dijon, and the Cardinal de Polignac was ordered to his Abbey of Auching, where he remained under confinement. The declaration of war on the part of the Regent was accompanied by a manifesto, stating the causes of the rupture, and concluding as follows:—"We now see with horror what it was which made the minister of Spain inaccessible to all projects of peace. He would thereby have seen all the odious plots which he formed against us prove abortive. He would have lost all hopes of laying this kingdom desolate, of raising up France against France, of having the management of rebels among all the orders of the state, of kindling a civil war in the bosom of our provinces, and, in fine, of becoming to us the scourge of Heaven, by putting in execution those seditious projects, and springing that mine which was to serve as a prelude to the conflagration. What a recompense is this to France for the treasures and blood of which she has been so profuse for the sake of Spain."

Parliament again met * November 1718; when the King declared, "that the court of Spain had rejected all his amicable proposals, and had broken through their most solemn engagements for the security of the British commerce. To vindicate therefore the faith of his former treaties, as well as to maintain those he had lately made, and to protect and defend the trade of his subjects, which had been violently and unjustly oppressed, it became necessary for his naval forces to check their progress. That, notwithstanding the success of his arms, that court had lately given orders at all the ports of Spain and the West Indies, to fit out privateers against the English. He said he was persuaded a British Parliament would enable him to resent such treatment; and he assured them his good brother the Regent of France was ready to concur with him in the most vigorous measures." An address of thanks and congratulation, in reply to the royal speech, having been proposed, it was urged, that such address might be attended with the most serious consequences, as stamping with the approbation of Parliament measures which, upon examination, might appear equally contrary to the law of nations and the interest of Great Britain; and it was moved in the House of Peers, by Lord Strafford, that the instructions of Admiral Byng might be laid before the House. Earl Stanhope replied, that there was no occasion to submit the Admiral's instructions to public discussion, as the treaties, of which the late sea-fight was a necessary consequence, had already received the approbation of Parliament. He accused the court of Spain of a violation of the treaty of Utrecht, in attacking the Emperor while he was engaged in a war against the common enemies of Christendom; added, that it was high time to check the growth of the naval power of Spain, in order effectually to protect the British commerce, which had been violently oppressed by the Spaniards; and declared, "that in this whole affair his Majesty had acted by the advice of his Privy-Council, of which he was one; that he thought it an honour to have been one of the advisers of the late measures, and was ready to answer for them with his head." In the Lower House Mr. Walpole inveighed strongly against the measures in question; and affirmed, that to sanction them by the proposed address, would answer no other purpose than to screen from punishment the ministers of the crown who had dared to plunge the nation into a war with Spain, of which they now wished to relieve themselves from the responsibility. The conduct of the ministry was contrary to the laws of nations, and a breach of solemn treaties. The address, however, was carried in both Houses, the number in the Upper House being 83 against 50, and in the Lower 210 against 155.

On a subsequent message from the King (December 17,) that he had found it necessary actually to declare war against Spain, the debate was renewed with fresh vigour. The supplies necessary for the national defence in this exigency were however voted with zeal and unanimity; but the declaration of war was not attended with those acclamations which had distinguished the commencement of the two former wars against France.†

Earl

* During the recess, several alterations had taken place in the offices of government. The Earl of Sunderland had been promoted to the head of the treasury, in the room of General Stanhope, who resumed his post of Secretary of State; having been created a Peer of the realm, under the title of Earl Stanhope. Mr. Addison, who is said to have been found essentially deficient in the requisite qualifications for his situation, resigned at the same time, under colour of ill health and the fatigues of office, to Mr. Craggs; Mr. Aislabie was appointed to the Chancellorship of the Exchequer; and the Great Seal of England, recently relinquished by Lord Cowper, was transferred to Lord Chief Justice Parker, created Earl of Macclesfield.

† About this time, the attention of the public was excited in an uncommon

Earl Stanhope presented to the House of Lords, in December, a bill for the repeal of the occasional conformity and schism acts passed under the late administration; and also such clauses of the test and corporation acts as operated to the exclusion of Protestant dissenters from civil offices. The latter part of the bill encountered violent opposition; and, after a long debate, the House agreed to leave out the clauses respecting the corporation and test act; in which state it was transmitted to and passed by the Commons; and in the royal speech, at the close of the session, his Majesty expressed the highest satisfaction at this signal instance of legislative wisdom and moderation.*

Previously to the prorogation, a bill was brought in, under the sanction of the government, for limiting the peerage, by restraining the crown from enlarging the present number of Peers by more than six new creations—the King by message declaring, "that he had so much at heart the security and constitution of Parliaments in all future ages, as to be willing that his prerogative should not stand in the way of so great and necessary a work." This was generally considered as a measure not so much of policy as resentment on the part of the crown, eagerly and intemperately desirous to excite the chagrin and diminish the political importance of the Prince of Wales; who had highly offended the court by the support he had for some time past given to the opposition. The court influence, however, was at this juncture deemed not sufficiently powerful to carry this project into effect: and the bill was withdrawn, in order to its revival in the ensuing session. On the 18th of April, 1719, the Parliament was prorogued; and early in May, the King, accompanied by Lord Stanhope and many other persons of distinction, set out on his second journey to his foreign dominions.

The Irish Parliament assembled on the 1st of July; and the Duke of Bolton (Lord Lieutenant) in his speech, strongly urged the necessity of guarding against the designs of the disaffected. An act was passed to relieve the dissenters from certain penalties inflicted by the existing laws; but the repeal of the sacramental test, to which the King had extended his views, could not be obtained.

Cardinal Alberoni had by this time formed a rash and romantic project for the restoration of the Pretender, who had recently quitted his residence at Urbino in Italy. Repairing to Madrid, the latter personage was received there with all the honours due to the King of Great Britain; and a new armament was equipped at Cadiz, on board of which 6000 regular troops, with arms for a much larger number, were embarked, under the command of the Duke of Ormond. Scarcely, however, had they reached Cape Finisterre, when they were dispersed and shattered by a violent tempest. Two frigates only, with the Earls Marechal and Seaforth, and the Marquis of Tullibardine, and 300 Spanish soldiers on board, arrived, (April 1719) on the northern coast of Scotland, where they were joined by some clans of Highlanders. On the approach of the royal troops, the Highlanders, after a futile attempt to defend the pass of Glenshiel, dispersed, and the Spaniards surrendered themselves prisoners of war.

In consequence chiefly of the exertions of Sir George Byng, and the powerful assistance which the imperialists derived from the English fleet, the Spaniards were reduced to the humiliating necessity of evacuating, and relinquishing their pretensions to, the islands of Sicily and Sardinia. Lord Cobham, with a considerable force, made a descent on Spain, and took Vigo; two line of battle ships, several vessels on the stocks, and a great quantity of naval stores, were totally demolished by a detachment of French soldiers and English sailors acting in conjunction at Port Antonio on the coast of Biscay; preparations also were made for an expedition against Spanish America; and an army of French, which had penetrated into Spain under the Duke of Berwick, reduced the towns of Fontarabia and St. Sebastian. Thus the court of Spain found itself attacked on all sides, with no resource left but to accede, however reluctantly, to the terms of the quadruple alliance. The disgrace of Alberoni immediately followed; and he was ordered to quit the kingdom in three weeks.

King George was no less successful in his political negociations than in his warlike exertions. Supported by the presence of an English fleet in the Baltic, the English Ambassador deluded Sweden with promises to assist in wresting from Russia, Livonia and the other conquered provinces. The Czar, incensed at the conduct of the Swedish government, sent a powerful armament to the gulf of Bothnia; and landing 40,000 men in different parts of the kingdom, carried havoc and destruction into the unfortunate and devoted country, destroying eight towns and a great number of villages. Thus Sweden had no alternative but to throw herself into the arms of Britain. In the month of July, a provisional treaty was concluded, and ratified in November; agreeably to which Bremen and Verden were ceded to Hanover, at the expense of a million of rix dollars—a greater sum than the revenues of that electorate were generally found competent to discharge. The Kings of Poland, Prussia, and Denmark, under the mediation of Great Britain, agreed at the same time to a suspension of arms, which was speedily followed by definitive treaties of peace. His Polish Majesty contented himself with a simple recognition of his right to the crown; the King of Prussia acquired Stetin, and the eastern Pomerania, on the payment of two millions of rix-dollars; and Denmark was allowed to retain possession of Sleswic, on the restitution of the western Pomerania and the city of Wismar, with its surrounding district. The Czar alone, harassed Sweden with repeated descents, and absolutely refused to listen to the mediation of Britain.

On the 23d of November, the Parliament was opened by a popular speech, in which his Majesty (having returned from the Continent) congratulated the two Houses on the present happy posture of affairs. Dutiful and loyal addresses were returned. Two days after the commencement of the session, the bill for limiting the peerage was again introduced. Its object being in unison with the feelings, and favourable to the power and grandeur of the peerage, it passed the House by a great majority of voices; but on its transmission to the Commons it met with a very hostile reception;† and uncommon degree by a sermon preached before the King at the Chapel Royal, by Dr. Benjamin Hoadley, Lord Bishop of Bangor, "On the nature of the kingdom of Christ." As the foundation of his discourse, the Bishop selected the famous declaration of Christ to Pilate, the Roman procurator—"My kingdom is not of this world;" and his direct and undisguised object was, to prove "that the kingdom of Christ, and the sanctions by which it is supported were of a nature wholly intellectual and spiritual—that the Church, taking the term in its utmost latitude of signification, did not, and could not, possess the slightest degree of authority under any commission, or pretended commission, derived from him: that the church of England, and all other national churches, were merely civil or human institutions, established for the purposes of diffusing and perpetuating the knowledge and belief of Christianity; which contained a system of truths, not in their nature differing from other truths, excepting by their superior weight and importance; and which were to be inculcated in a manner analogous to other truths, demanding only, from their more interesting import, proportionably higher degrees of care, attention, and assiduity, in the promulgation of them." On the meeting of the convocation, a committee was appointed to examine this publication; and a representation was quickly drawn up, in which a heavy censure was passed upon it, as tending to subvert all government and discipline in the church of Christ, to reduce his kingdom to a state of anarchy and confusion, to impugn and impeach the royal supremacy in matters ecclesiastical, and the authority of the legislature to enforce obedience in matters of religion by civil sanctions. A sudden stop, however, was put to these proceedings, by a royal prorogation; and from this period the convocation has never been convened but as a mere matter of form, and for the purpose of being again prorogued. The controversy, thus commenced, was carried on for several years with great ability and animation on both sides.

* No subsequent attempt during this reign was made in Parliament for the repeal of the test; for the King declared to Lord Barrington, who was at this time accounted the head of the dissenters, "that he was assured by the ministers there were no hopes of carrying this point; and he was persuaded the dissenters were too much his friends to insist upon a thing which might be infinitely prejudicial to him without doing them any essential good."

† Mr. Walpole particularly distinguished himself by his opposition and, in the result, after a long, and violent debate, and notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the court, it was rejected by a majority of 92—or 269 against 177.

In the course of this session, the celebrated declaratory bill, for the better securing the dependency of Ireland upon the imperial crown of Great Britain, was introduced and passed; in which the supremacy of the appellant jurisdiction of the English House of Peers, and the right of the English Parliament to make laws to bind the kingdom of Ireland in all cases whatsoever, were asserted in a high tone, in consequence of the refractory spirit which had lately displayed itself in various instances in that kingdom.* This session of Parliament was also rendered memorable by the introduction of the famous South-Sea bill by Mr. Aislabie, Chancellor of the Exchequer, which, after long and able discussion, received the royal assent (April 7, 1720).† Early in June, the session closed, and the King declared his intention again to visit the Continent.

About this period, the Earl of Stair, who had for nearly six years past served his country with distinguished ability as Ambassador at the court of Versailles, was unexpectedly recalled. He had been for some time not upon very cordial terms with the present ministers, with whom, as appears, he had recently and zealously interceded in vain for the pardon of the Earl of Mar; who had been amused and deluded with false hopes of obtaining it. The immediate cause of his recal, however, was a political difference of a somewhat serious complexion, which arose between him and the Lords Sunderland and Stanhope, respecting the famous Law, who had been raised by the Regent to the Comptroller-Generalship of the Finances, and whose credit at the French court, from the knowledge of his mischievous designs, the Ambassador had laboured to subvert.

Previously to the recess of Parliament, an apparent reconciliation had taken place between the King and the Prince of Wales, chiefly through the intervention of Mr. Walpole. This was followed by a sort of coalition of parties; in consequence of which Lord Townshend was, before the King's departure, declared President of the Council; Mr. Walpole accepted the post of Paymaster of the Forces; and Mr. Methuen that of Comptroller of the Household. The government of the kingdom was vested, as before, in the council of Regency, to which were now added Lord Townshend and the Duke of Devonshire.

The negociation with Sweden, Denmark, and Prussia, had been far advanced when the King left Germany; and Lord Carteret, Ambassador at Stockholm, laboured with such assiduity and success, that in the month of January, 1720, he had signed a treaty of alliance offensive and defensive with the Swedes, containing twenty-one articles; conformably to the tenor of which his Britannic Majesty stipulated not only to furnish the powerful succours therein specified, but to engage his friends and allies to contribute by subsidies and auxiliary troops, "ad coercendem Czarum Russiæ" —the express words of the treaty—and the King of Great Britain, "as a strong mark of his friendship," promised that the war in which he was now engaged with Spain should not prevent his sending, the next spring, a squadron sufficient to stop the progress of the Czar. In this, as well as in the former treaty, the losses sustained by the English commerce, in consequence of the depredations of the Swedes, which formed the only plausible pretext for involving Great Britain in this northern quarrel, were passed over entirely unnoticed. A very indignant memorial was presented to the court of London by M. Bestuchef, minister of Russia; but as the policy now adopted, of counteracting the ambitious projects of Russia, and rescuing Sweden from the destruction which threatened her, was upon the whole rational and just, the successive treaties with that power were approved and applauded by the English nation.

Sir John Norris, with the English fleet, entered the Baltic in April, and immediately formed a junction with that of Sweden. The Russians, aware that the English Admiral had instructions similar to those under which Sir George Byng had lately acted, retired into their ports, where it was not judged expedient to attack them.

A. D. 1720.] The South-Sea act which had been passed in the last session, proved infinitely more alarming in its operations and consequences than its most determined opposers could have imagined. No sooner had the royal assent been given to the bill, than the most artful and insidious methods were put in practice to delude the public with the notion of the vast emoluments eventually to be derived from the commercial intercourse, which it was pretended would, with the consent of the court of Madrid and as an equivalent for the cession of Gibraltar and Minorca, be established with the Empires of Mexico and Peru. The successive sub-to this bill. He compared the two Houses of Parliament to the temples of Fame and virtue; and observed, "that among the Romans the former was placed behind the latter, to denote that fame was no otherwise attainable than by virtue. But, if the present bill passed into a law, one of the most powerful incentives to virtue would be taken away. He affirmed that this bill would not only operate as a discouragement to merit, but would endanger the constitution; that the Peers were already possessed of sufficient privileges; but that the proposed limitation of their number would prodigiously enhance their authority, and in time reduce the Commons to their ancient state of feudal dependency; that he was astonished their Lordships could presume to send such a bill to that House, or that they could flatter themselves it would ever receive their concurrence, or expect that they would voluntarily exclude themselves and their posterity from the honours of the peerage. And he thought it a very injurious and ungrateful return in one who had himself been advanced to a participation of those honours for his public services, to endeavour, on his admission to the House of Peers, to bar the door against future claimants. Besides this, he declared, on adverting to the clause which assigned to twenty-five Scotch Peers hereditary seats in lieu of the sixteen elective ones, that the bill was a manifest violation of the act of union, and would endanger the entire dissolution of it, by the high offence it would give to the great body of the Scotch peerage, in thus excluding them and their posterity from all future possibility of taking their seats as British Peers."

* This act originated in an appeal to the House of Peers in England, by Maurice Annesley, against a decree of the House of Peers in Ireland, which was reversed by the English Peers, and Annesley ordered to be put in possession of the estate of which he had been deprived. Agreeably to this order, the barons of the exchequer in Ireland issued an injunction to the sheriff of the county of Kildare to put the sentence in execution, and set a severe fine upon him for his pertinacious non-compliance. The Irish House of Peers discharged the fine, and passed a resolve that Lord Chief Baron Gilbert, and the other Barons of the Exchequer, had acted in manifest derogation to the King's prerogative in his high court of Parliament in Ireland, as also of the rights and privileges of that kingdom, and of the Parliament thereof, and the Barons were committed to the custody of the black rod. A representation also was transmitted to the King, setting forth their right to the final adjudication of causes in that kingdom; on which the house of Peers in England resolved, that the Irish Barons of Exchequer had acted with courage, according to law, in support of his Majesty's prerogative, and with fidelity to the crown of Great Britain; and an address was presented to the King, that he would be pleased to bestow on them some mark of his royal favour. Finally, the declaratory bill was framed, and passed, with the single protest of Duke of Leeds; though in the House of Commons it met with a vigorous opposition.

† By this act, which proposed eventually to reduce all the different public securities into one grand aggregate fund, the South-Sea company was invested with certain commercial privileges, and authorised to take in by purchase or subscription both the redeemable and irredeemable debts of the nation, to the amount of about thirty-three millions, at such rates and prices as should be agreed upon between the Company and the respective proprietors;—a clause proposed in the House of Commons, for ascertaining what share of the capital stock of the Company should be vested in those proprietors of government stock who might voluntarily subscribe, being most unwisely rejected. In return, the Company consented that the interest upon their original capital of nine millions four hundred thousand pounds, as well as the interest upon the public debts, to be redeemed in the mode prescribed by the present act, should, after Midsummer Day, 1727, be reduced to 4 per cent. redeemable by Parliament. Exclusively of this reduction, the Company agreed to pay into the Exchequer four years and a half purchase of all the long and short annuities that should be subscribed, and one year's purchase of such long annuities as should not be subscribed—amounting on the execution of the act to no less than seven millions; for raising which sum they were empowered to open books of subscription, to grant annuities redeemable by the Company, and to convert the money so raised into additional stock. "It is evident, from the wild and extravagant terms of this contract," observes a contemporary writer, "that it was never meant to be seriously fulfilled. In vain did the sagacity of Walpole discern, and his elegance display, the mighty mischiefs contained in this casket of Pandora; in vain did he urge the acceptance of the equitable and rational proposals of the Bank; the House was fascinated by the dazzling and magnificent appearance of the South-Sea project, and the bill passed with general applause, and by a vast majority of votes, fifty-five members only dividing against it."

scriptions filled with amazing rapidity; and the court of directors declaring a dividend of 30 per cent. for Christmas 1720, and 50 per cent for no less than twelve years after, the transfer price of the company's stock advancing in proportion to the public demand, rose, from 130, which was the price it bore while the bill was depending in Parliament, in a very short space of time to 1000; by which means an opportunity was offered to those who were concerned in the project, or rather the plot, to make immense fortunes before the bursting of this mighty bubble. The stock falling with equal or even greater rapidity than that with which it had risen, vast numbers of adventurers—and such was the general infatuation, that, upon this occasion, the whole nation seemed to have become adventurers—awaking from their golden dreams, found themselves reduced to a state of ruin. England had never experienced so total a destruction of credit; never had any country been so convulsed by despondency and terror. The ministry collectively, and with few exceptions individually, implicated in these proceedings, seemed petrified with amazement and consternation; and being wholly uncertain what measures to pursue, dispatched express after express to the King at Hanover, to inform him of the extraordinary situation of public affairs; and his Majesty thereupon hastening his return, arrived in England the beginning of November. The Parliament having met (December 8, 1720.) his Majesty earnestly recommended them to consider of the most effectual and speedy methods to restore the national credit. The House of Commons immediately entered into a severe investigation of this business, which was stiled, in the report of the secret committee, "a train of the deepest villany and fraud hell ever contrived for the ruin of any nation." The result of the enquiry was, that transfers of the company's stock to a very great amount had been made to persons very high in office to facilitate the passing of the bill; and that the scandalous artifices practised by the company, and their shameless abuse of the public confidence, had received not only the connivance, but the encouragement of several, at least, of the ministers. Lord Sunderland and Mr. Aislabie were in consequence compelled to a precipitate and disgraceful resignation of their offices; the latter was also expelled the House of Commons, and committed to the Tower; Mr. Craggs, Secretary of State, was exempted only by the stroke of death from a similar fate; and many other persons of figure and consequence, who were found on inquiry more or less culpable, were, by a very high and unusual exertion of Parliamentary authority, variously punished; though, in the opinion of the exasperated public, not with an adequate degree of severity. The House, however, acted with a spirit and unanimity on this great occasion which reflected on their proceedings the highest honor, sufficiently manifesting the indignation they felt at having been, under specious pretences, made the unintentional instruments of an injury so extensive, and a deception so dreadful.* The difficult business of restoring public credit, and of tranquillising the public mind, was committed chiefly to Mr. Walpole, who performed the task thus imposed upon him to the entire satisfaction of the nation.

The profit of the South-Sea company, in its corporate capacity, on the execution of the project, was found to amount to upwards of thirteen millions; thirty-seven millions eight hundred thousand pounds having been subscribed, and the stock allotted in exchange not exceeding twenty-four millions five hundred thousand pounds. This was now engrafted into different government securities, and the enormous surplus divided amongst the sufferers, in such modes and proportions as were deemed most equitable—retaining two millons only in lieu of the premium due by the original terms of agreement to the public: but this occasioning much murmur and discontent, was, in the sequel, relinquished. Heavy fines also were levied upon the estates of the leading directors, and others principally concerned in this nefarious business, but the subtility of some who were supposed most culpable eluded the severest vigilance of enquiry. Knight, cashier of the company, for the apprehending of whom a royal proclamation had been issued, had escaped at a critical moment to the Continent; carrying with him the famous green book, which was supposed to contain the entire secret of the transaction. Being arrested at Tirlemont, by the vigilance of the English resident at Brussels, application was made to the Marquis du Prie, governor of the Low Countries, to deliver him up to justice; but, answer was unexpectedly made by the imperial court, that this could not be done, consistently with the privileges of the States of Brabant—for, by an article of the Joyeuse Entrée, no person, against whom a criminal accusation is brought, can be removed for trial out of the province. Very pressing instances were made for the surrender of Knight; but, in the interim, he effected a second escape from the citadel of Antwerp, and ultimately received a free pardon. Vehement suspicions therefore arose, that Knight's evidence was too decisive to be produced; and that the late minister had still sufficient influence to screen himself from that punishment which the whole nation believed him to merit, and from which his superior adroitness of management only protected him. No fewer than 172 members of the House of Commons, however, divided against Sunderland, on the criminatory resolution, in opposition to 233, who joined in the vote of acquittal.†

By the death of Lord Stanhope, and the disgrace of the Earl of Sunderland, all political competition was at an end, and Townshend and Walpole were re-invested with the full powers of government. The former resumed his office of Secretary of State, and the latter was placed at the head of the Treasury. The ascendency of Lord Sunderland over the King remained, however, undiminished: by his influence, Lord Carleton, formerly Mr. Boyle, succeeded Lord Townshend as President of the Council, Lord Cadogan was placed at the head of the army, and Lord Carteret was advanced

* Mr. Waller, son-in-law to Aislabie, to whom South-Sea stock to an immense amount had been transferred, had preserved no minutes of his transactions; and pretended, on his examination, that he could not recollect for what persons or purposes he had accepted it. Sir John Blount, considered as the original projector, and one of the most guilty agents in this business, refused to answer certain interrogatories put to him in the House of Lords by the Duke of Wharton, and being supported somewhat too peremptorily in his refusal by Lord Stanhope, the Duke observed, "that the goverment of the best Princes was sometimes rendered intolerable to their subjects by bad ministers; thus Sejanus had made the reign of Tiberius, a prince originally of the greatest hopes, hateful to the Romans. That wicked minister first began by weaning the affections of the Emperor from his son, and next from his people, and so Rome was ruined." Conscious of the unsullied rectitude of his conduct, Lord Stanhope, in a transport of rage, rose to speak in his own vindication. He acknowledged "that the Roman history afforded striking examples. In return for that which had just been mentioned of a bad minister, he must remind the House of an instance of a great man and illustrious patriot, the elder Brutus, who had a son so profligate, that, to gratify his vices and passions, he hesitated not to sacrifice the liberties of his country." From the vehemence of his exertions, the Earl was seized, while in the act of speaking, with a sudden illness, which obliged him to retire; and, after a short interval of languishment and insensibility, he expired in the evening of the next day (February 5,) deeply regretted by his sovereign, and possessing the general esteem and regard of the nation.

† On the examination of Knight at the bar of the Lords, it was suggested to Lord Sunderland that it would be proper to move for his immediate commitment; but, availing himself of the authority of Lord Cowper, the minister professed, with much show of candour, his doubts as to the legality of this measure. Very slender credit, however, was allowed him for the purity of his motives, when it appeared, from the report of the secret committee, that fifty thousand pounds South Sea Stock had been accepted by Knight for the Earl of Sunderland, without any consideration paid or security given for the same. Knight left behind him a letter addressed to the South Sea Directors, in which he says, "that, although conscious of his own innocence, he had withdrawn himself to avoid the weight of an inquiry which he found too heavy for him." He acknowledges many indiscretions, and professes himself sensible, "that it would have been impossible for him to have avoided the appearance of prevarication and perjury, from the nature and largeness of the transactions." The most astonishing circumstance in this prodigious and complicated scene of knavery and credulity is, that at the moment in which the national delirium was at the height, France had scarcely recovered from the effect of a similar delusion, in the establishment and consequent failure of the Mississippi Company, projected by the famous Law.

to the office of Joint Secretary with Lord Townshend.*

The pernicious tendency of the continental connections of England had been the constant theme of Mr. Walpole's eloquence while in opposition to the court, yet one of the first measures of his administration was to move for a subsidy to Sweden, with whom an alliance offensive and defensive had been just concluded—a British squadron being also at this very time cruising in the Baltic for the protection of that kingdom against the designs of Russia. The vote of supply at length passed, not without much angry objection and difficulty—the voices on the division being 197 to 136. During the present session, application was also made to Parliament for the liquidation of a debt of 650,000*l.* on the civil list, incurred by the profusion of Sunderland; but in the royal message delivered upon this occasion by Mr. Methuen, the King declared his resolution:

Ist. To cause a retrenchment of his expences.

IIdly. He informed the House of Commons that he had ordered the accounts to be submitted to their inspection.

IIIdly. He proposed that the sum wanting should be raised by a deduction from the salaries and wages of all offices, pensions, and other payments from the crown.

A bill imposing a duty of sixpence in the pound for this purpose accordingly passed both Houses, and received the royal assent. Owing to the pressure of public business, the Parliament was not prorogued till the 10th of August (1721,) when the King gave his assent to the important bill for restoring public credit.

Early in the present year, M. Bestuchef, the Russian ambassador, in consequence of some offensive expressions, in a memorial presented by him at the court of London, was ordered to depart the kingdom in fourteen days. This affront was revenged by the czar in a manner worthy of a great monarch. In a declaration published at St. Petersburgh, he says, "It is notorious in what an unjust and injurious manner our resident was sent away from the court of England, which, having done us a great and sensible wrong, ought naturally to have engaged us to make reprisals according to what is practised every where else. But as we perceive that all this is done without any regard to the interest of England, and only in favour of the Hanoverian interest—for which the ministers of Great Britain not only neglect the friendship of foreign powers, but do not even spare their own country, which more nearly and more sensibly concerns them—we were unwilling that the English nation, which had no share in that piece of injustice, should suffer for it; and therefore we grant to them all manner of security, and free liberty to trade in all our dominions."

Although the czar had disdainfully refused the mediation of the King of England, he possessed too much sagacity not to perceive the impolicy of continuing the war against Sweden, now at peace with all other nations, and relying on the powerful protection of Great Britain. He therefore listened to overtures of reconciliation; and a definitive treaty was concluded between the two crowns, under the mediation of France, at Nystadt, August 1721, conformably to which the fertile and extensive provinces of Livonia, Ingria, Esthonia, and Carelia, were confirmed to Russia, and the barren deserts of Finland only, with the exception of Wyburg and its district, restored to Sweden. From this period, Sweden sunk into its original state of political insignificance.

On the 13th of June, (1721) a treaty of peace was signed at Madrid between Great Britain and Spain; by which restitution was to be made of all the effects taken on both sides; and, on the same day, another treaty of defensive alliance was, to the surprise of Europe, signed between Great Britain, France, and Spain. By a secret article of the first treaty Great Britain engaged not to oppose the views of Spain in Italy; and by a secret article of the second, France and Spain guaranteed the possession of Bremen and Verden to Hanover. All remaining differences between the courts of Vienna and Madrid were referred to the congress agreed to be held at Cambray.† Amongst the numerous treaties of alliance concluded in this reign must not be omitted the treaty signed about this period with the Emperor of Morocco, which indeed merits to be classed with the most rational and useful of them; the British commerce being secured by this treaty from the depredations of the barbarians, and a considerable number of British subjects also rescued by it from a state of slavery.‡

The Parliament met on the 19th of October. The King in his speech boasted of his success in restoring the tranquillity of Europe; but the immense amount of the navy debt, now estimated at 1,700,000*l.* being stated to the House of Commons, in order that a Parliamentary provision should be made for its discharge, a violent debate arose. It was urged by the members in opposition, that this enormous debt had accumulated by employing more seamen than were provided for by Parliament, particularly by sending large fleets to the Baltic and Mediterranean, and keeping the sailors in pay during the winter; that these extraordinary expences were not necessary for the service of Great Britain; and therefore it was proper to have all the papers relating to the northern transactions, and particularly Lord Carteret's private instructions, laid before the House, in order to have full satisfaction concerning the grounds of these expeditions. The motion brought forward to this effect was, however, overruled by a great majority; the court set all opposi-

* A vehement controversy having recently arisen on the subject of the Trinity, chiefly in consequence of the learned tracts published in opposition to the established doctrine, by the famous professor Whiston, the university of Oxford, in full convocation, resolved that the solemn thanks of that body should be returned to the Earl of Nottingham for his most noble defence of the Catholic Faith, contained in his answer to Mr. Whiston's letter, concerning the eternity of the Son of God, and on the Holy Ghost. On his Lordship's suggestion, a bill was afterwards introduced into the House of Peers for the suppression of blasphemy and profaneness; which enacted, that if any one spoke or wrote against the being of a God, the divinity of Jesus Christ or the Holy Ghost, the doctrine of the Trinity, the truth of the Christian religion, or the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, he should suffer imprisonment for an indefinite term, unless, in a certain form prescribed, he should publicly renounce and abjure his errors; and by a clause in this bill, the archbishops and bishops within their respective jurisdictions, and the justices of peace in their several counties at their quarter-sessions, were authorised to summon any dissenting teacher, and to require his subscription to a declaration of faith containing the articles above enumerated; and upon his refusal, it was enacted, that he should be ipso facto deprived of the benefit of the act of toleration. The lords being summoned on the second reading of this bill (May 1721), Dr. Wake, Archbishop of Canterbury, moved to have it committed; upon which Lord Onslow rose, and declared, "that though he was himself zealously attached to the doctrines of the church of England, he would never consent to support even the truth itself by persecution; and he moved that the bill might be thrown out." He was seconded by the Duke of Wharton, who said, that, having been himself frequently accused of impiety and irreligion, he conceived that he could not more effectually vindicate his character from these imputations, than by opposing to the utmost a measure so repugnant to the spirit of Christianity. The Earl of Peterborough declared, that though he was for a Parliamentary King, he was not for a Parliamentary God or a Parliamentary Religion; and that if this bill were to pass, he should be ambitious of a seat in the conclave of cardinals, as more honourable than that which he occupied in the British House of Peers. Dr. Kennet, Bishop of Peterborough, protested that he never would be concerned in the execution of such a law—and he earnestly hoped that his brethren on the bench would not concur in the establishment of a Protestant inquisition. The Lords Cowper and Townshend also spoke with much ability against this bill; which was on the other hand supported by the Earl of Nottingham, the Lords Bathurst and Trevor, the Bishops of London, Winchester, Litchfield, and Coventry, and various others; but, on a division, it was rejected by sixty voices against thirty-one.

† Previously to the war of Sicily, the King of England, to induce the King of Spain to desist from his hostile projects, had flattered him with the idea of the restitution of Gibraltar. The offer was evidently made merely to amuse; and a sort of national indignation being excited, when this secret proposal of the court was subsequently made public, the design was ultimately laid aside as wholly impracticable; not however without leaving an apparent stain, or at least casting a certain shade upon the honour of the British sovereign.

‡ About this time died Pope Clement XI. who had sat in the papal chair twenty-one years; a man haughty, but respectable for his talents; inflexible in the maintenance of the papal prerogative, and zealously devoted to the interests of the house of Stuart. He was succeeded by Innocent XIII. of the Italian family of Conti, who, after a short and tranquil reign of only three years, gave place to Benedict XIII. of the ancient and illustrious house of Orsini.

tion at defiance; and the new minister soon proved himself superior to all his predecessors in the art of adroit and dextrous Parliamentary management.*

The introduction of what might well be regarded as a new commercial code, by the abrogation of a vast multiplicity of duties, payable on the importation of raw materials, and on the exportation of wrought goods, took place during the present session. On the 7th of March (1722,) the Parliament was prorogued, and on the 10th dissolved by proclamation.†

The King, in his concluding speech to the late Parliament, had given plain intimations that dangerous designs against his person were then in agitation; but he professed to entertain "so just a confidence in the affection of his subjects, and in their regard for their own welfare, that he was persuaded they would not suffer themselves to be imposed upon, and betrayed into their own destruction; and he declared the expectations of those to be very ill grounded who hoped to prevail with a Protestant free people to give up their religion and liberties into the hands of such as are enemies unto both." The fact was, in consequence of the discontents and clamours excited by the failure of the south sea project, the partisans of the Pretender had been encouraged to fabricate a plot against the government; of which the King, early in the present year, had received advice from the Regent Duke of Orleans; and about the month of May he obtained full information of the persons and designs of the conspirators. Orders were immediately given for an encampment near the metropolis, and Mr. Horace Walpole was sent to Holland to demand the troops which the States had stipulated to furnish by the barrier treaty. Alarming apprehensions prevailing of the magnitude of the public danger, the funds sunk prodigiously in value, and there followed a great run upon the Bank; but Lord Townshend having signified in a letter to the Lord Mayor, "that his Majesty was firmly assured the authors of the present wicked conspiracy neither would be supported nor even countenanced by any foreign power," the alarm in a considerable degree subsided. Loyal addresses were presented from the city of London and many other places; and the King, instead of repairing, as was his intention, to the continent, thought it expedient to make a tour through various parts of the kingdom; reviewed a large body of forces encamped near Salisbury, visited Portsmouth, and was every where received with great demonstrations of joy. About this time several persons were apprehended on a charge of high treason; amongst others, Kelly, and Carte, nonjuring clergymen; one Plucket, an officer of invalids at Plymouth; and some persons of more elevated rank.

Early in October, (1722,) the King opened the new Parliament with a speech from the throne, in which he expressed his concern in being obliged to inform them that a dangerous conspiracy had been for some time past formed, and was still carrying on, against his person and government, in favour of the Pretender. His Majesty declared that the discoveries made at home, the information obtained from his ministers abroad, and the intelligence received from the various powers in alliance with him in different parts of Europe, had afforded him ample and concurrent proofs of this wicked design. Some of the conspirators were already, he added, secured, and endeavours used for apprehending others; and he referred to the wisdom of Parliament the measures necessary to be taken for the safety of the kingdom: expressing at the same time his firm belief that the hopes and expectations of their common enemies were very ill founded, in supposing that the discontents occasioned by the losses and misfortunes of individuals, however industriously fomented, were turned into disaffection and a spirit of rebellion.‡

On the communication of this intelligence, a great and general alarm was excited in the nation; a considerable augmentation of the forces was immediately voted; and the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended, contrary to all precedent, for twelve months. On the requisition of the King, a body of troops was held by the States General in readiness to embark from Holland, and six regiments were also ordered from Ireland; and both Houses joined in expressing the strongest detestation and abhorrence of this "traitorous and unnatural conspiracy."

The plot seems to have been discovered while in embryo; and it is probable that no regular project of invasion or insurrection had been digested or matured; nor have the circumstances explanatory either of its nature or extent ever been clearly developed. Various persons, however, of high distinction, amongst whom were the Duke of Norfolk and the Lords Orrery, North, and Grey, were apprehended on strong presumption of their concurrence in this conspiracy. Pains and penalties were inflicted by act of Parliament on several of the conspirators;§ but only one suffered capital punishment—Christopher Layer, a barrister of the Temple, convicted of high treason in enlisting men for the service of the Pretender. He was repeatedly reprieved, and much endeavour was used to procure from him a full confession; but he persisted in a resolute refusal. The trial, however, which attracted most of the public attention, was that of the celebrated Atterbury Bishop, of Rochester, who was found to be a party in this conspiracy, or at least confidentially privy to it: and he was, by a bill which passed both Houses by great majorities, deprived of his episcopal dignity, and sentenced to perpetual banishment.

The declaration of the Pretender, dated from Lucca, was by both Houses voted to be a false, insolent, and traitorous libel, and ordered to be burnt at the Royal Exchange.‖

* In the course of this session a singular petition was presented to Parliament from the Quakers. It is a well known tenet of this sect, that oaths even judicially administered are in their own nature unlawful; and the legislature had long since passed an act to render their solemn affirmation, in all matters of civil concern, equivalent to an oath. The object of the present application was the omission of the words, "in the presence of Almighty God," in the legal form of that affirmation; it being alledged, that, while those words remained, the essence of an oath was preserved. To the penalties of perjury, should this affirmation be in any instance violated, they professed their willing and cheerful submission. The court countenanced and supported this application, and a bill for this purpose passed the House of Commons without difficulty; but in its passage through the Lords, Dr. Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester, observed, that he knew not why such a distinguishing mark of indulgence should be allowed to a set a people who were hardly Christians; and a petition was presented by the Archbishop of York to the House, from the London clergy, expressing "a serious concern lest the minds of good men should be grieved and wounded, and the enemies of Christianity triumph, when they should see such condescension made by a Christian legislature to a set of men who renounce the divine institutions of Christianity, particularly that by which the faithful are initiated into this religion, and denominated Christians." This petition was rejected by the House; and the bill finally passed, though accompanied with a protest signed by several Lords.

† The Earl of Sunderland did not long survive his dismission from his high office, but died (April 1722;) and, nearly at the same time (June 16th) expired the celebrated John, Duke of Marlborough, to whom Sunderland was closely allied by marriage with his eldest daughter.

‡ "Had I," said his Majesty, "since my accession to the throne, ever attempted any innovation in our established religion, had I in any one instance invaded the liberty or property of my subjects, I should less wonder at any endeavour to alienate the affections of my people, and draw them into measures that can end in nothing but their own destruction. But to hope to persuade a free people, in full enjoyment of all that is dear and valuable to them, to exchange freedom for slavery, the Protestant religion for Popery, and to sacrifice at once the price of so much blood and treasure as have been spent in defence of our present establishment, seems an infatuation not to be accounted for. Your own interest and welfare call upon you to defend yourselves. I rely upon the Divine protection, the support of my Parliament, and the affection of my people, which I shall endeavour to preserve by continuing to make the laws of the realm the rule and measure of all my actions."

§ Kelly was committed close prisoner to the Tower, under this act, on the 28th of October, 1722;—whence he made his escape, after a confinement of fourteen years, on the same day of the month, A. D. 1736; as it was supposed by the connivance of government.

‖ In this declaration, the Pretender, with singular modesty and all the appearance of gravity, proposed, that if King George would relinquish to him the throne of Great Britain, he would in return consent to his retaining the title of King in his native dominions, and would invite all other states to confirm it: and he likewise most graciously engaged to leave to King George his succession to the British dominions secure, whenever, in due course, his natural right should

At this juncture the Regent of France offered twenty battalions of veteran troops to the King of Great Britain, in order to defend his person and government against the attempts of that family which Louis XIV. had employed the whole force of his kingdom to protect and restore. This offer, however, was declined.

The reversal at this period of the act of attainder passed against Lord Bolingbroke excited much attention. The Bishop of Rochester, on his arrival at Calais, hearing that Lord Bolingbroke was waiting there for a passage, exclaimed, with an emotion from which much was inferred, "Then we are exchanged!" This nobleman, however, though restored to his honours and paternal estate, was still excluded from a seat in the House of Peers, through the inflexible opposition of the minister, who dreaded the consequences which might result from his eloquence and talents, when exerted in their proper sphere. Fired with ambition to resume his former station in public life, he cherished a fixed and mortal resentment against Sir Robert Walpole; and, regardless of his recent obligations, in a short time joined with eagerness in opposition to his administration.

In the early part of the present session, a bill which occupied much of the attention of Parliament, and was kept long depending in the House, was introduced and supported by the minister, for levying the sum of one hundred thousand pounds on the estates of all Roman Catholics, upon pretext of "the constant endeavours of the Papists to subvert the present happy establishment."

The bill, however, finally passed by a majority of 217 against 168 voices, and received the royal assent.*

On the 27th of May (1723) the Parliamentary session was closed by a speech from the throne; in which his Majesty intimated that some "extraordinary affairs" demanded his attention abroad. Previously to his departure, he admitted to bail the principal conspirators still under confinement in the Tower.

On his Majesty's reaching Hanover, in the month of June, that city became the seat of European negotiation. Twelve foreign ministers, delegated from the different powers of the continent, waited his arrival; and the King of Prussia and his Queen, only daughter of the King of England, repairing to Herenhausen, added to the festivity and splendour of the court. His Britannic Majesty soon afterwards returned their visit, and was entertained at Berlin with unexampled magnificence.

The peace which had been concluded between Sweden and Russia, in 1721, was soon matured into an union of counsels and designs, which occasioned great uneasiness to the King of England, who, having ground to believe the immediate object of this coalition to be the restoration of the duchy of Sleswic to the Duke of Holstein, trembled for the safety of his favorite and contiguous acquisitions of Bremen and Verden; the security of which rested—until the guarantee of Great Britain was obtained—only on the tottering basis of the defensive alliance of Denmark and Hanover. The rising views of the house of Lunenburg had ever been displeasing to the court of Vienna; and there was little reason to hope that the Emperor would oppose, if he did not countenance this design; as, since the treaty of Madrid, he had considered himself as abandoned by the King of England, to whose solicitations he still refused the investitures of Bremen and Verden; without the payment of an enormous sum; and whose conduct in with-holding the accounts of the revenues of Mecklenburg, after repeated orders had been issued for their production, his imperial Majesty complained of as highly contumacious. An imperial East India company had also been recently established at Ostend; which was viewed both by England and Holland with great commercial jealousy. A vote, and ultimately an act, passed in the British Parliament, declaring it to be a high crime and misdemeanor for any subject of Great Britain in any manner to engage in or countenance this undertaking; and repeated remonstrances were made by the English ministry to induce the Emperor to abandon this scheme. The grand object of the Regent of France had, for some time, been to effect a cordial and permanent union with his Catholic Majesty who deeply resented the artifice practised upon him by the King of England relative to Gibraltar, and who had little reason to be grateful for the support he had of late received from that monarch during the long and tedious discussions at Cambray. The Duke of Orleans, too, had projected a marriage between the King of France and the infanta of Spain, then three years of age, and had actually contracted his two daughters to the Prince of Asturias, and Don Carlos, eldest son of Philip V. by his present Queen. At this period, however, the Regent of France died, unexpectedly, and in the meridian of his age.† The King of England, alarmed at the probable consequences of the death of the Regent, hastened his return to London; but, while detained by contrary winds in Holland, he received advice that the Duke of Bourbon, under the title of Prime Minister, had succeed to the office of Regent; and the most satisfactory assurances were given on the part of France of the good disposition which subsisted to cultivate and even improve the union so long established between the two states. The King arrived in London the 19th of December, (1723,) much chagrined at the ill success of his negotiation, and the precarious tenure by which he still held Bremen and Verden.

Parliament met on the 7th of January, 1724; and the speech delivered by the sovereign on the occasion was in all respects worthy of a British monarch addressing a great, a free, and a loyal people. Conformably to the King's recommendation, provision was made for the liquidation of a part of the national debt by means of the large and increasing surplus now arising from the sinking fund. Protections from foreign ministers, peers, and members of Parliament, having long been the subject of complaint, the names of the persons so protected were laid before the two Houses, and it was resolved, that all protections and written certificates be declared void in law. A meritorious attempt was made, during this session, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to introduce a grand reform into the collection of the revenue, by a partial conversion of the Custom-house duties, payable on tea, coffee, and chocolate, imported into inland duties of excise; should take place. An address was presented to the throne by the two Houses, expressing their "astonishment at the extravagant presumption of this declaration, and repeating their assurances to support his Majesty against the impotent efforts of an attainted fugitive bred up in the maxims of tyranny and superstition."

* "People in general were so terrified with the apprehensions of not only forfeiting their estates in possession, if they did not take the oaths (i. e. the oaths required to be taken to ensure an exemption from the penalties of this bill,) but also what they had in reversion, limitations ever so remote, or the least relation to or expectation of any—nay, with regard to their money or effects of any sort—that the whole nation, almost men, women, and children, capable of taking an oath, flocked to the places where the quarter sessions were holden, that they might, by swearing to the government, free themselves and their families from the danger, as they thought, of losing their fortunes to it. I saw a great deal of it; and it was a strange as well as ridiculous sight to see people crowding to give a testimony of their allegiance to a government, and cursing it at the same time for giving them the trouble of so doing, and for the fright they were put into by it; and I am satisfied more real disaffection to the King and his family arose from it than from any thing which happened in that time. It made the government to appear tyrannical and suspicious, than which nothing can be more hurtful to a Prince, or lessen his safety."—Coxe's papers, Vol. II. p. 555.

† This Prince was possessed of shining talents, which were however greatly clouded and obscured by an extravagant propensity to pleasure, which he indulged without reserve or decorum. From the love of fame, he was anxious that his conduct should appear in a favourable light to posterity, and he had formed a serious resolution of convoking the estates-general of the kingdom, for the purpose of effecting a grand reformation in the state, from which he was with difficulty diverted by his confidential minister and favourite, the Cardinal Dubois. The Regent frequently expressed his indignation at the wretched state of political degradation to which France was reduced, declaring, that had he been born a commoner, he would have defended the cause of liberty against the oppression of the government; and the first act of his administration was, to restore to the Parliament of Paris the right of judicial remonstrance, of which that assembly had been arbitrarily divested by the late King. His voluptuous life, however, and the profligacy of his morals, were totally incompatible with the predominance of public virtue or public spirit in his counsels.

an alteration by which the interests of the public and the fair trader were equally promoted.

An addition to the army of 4000 men having been voted last year on account of the conspiracy, this addition the Commons thought it expedient to continue for the present year; but in the House of Peers it met with great opposition. The motion of disbandment, however, was rejected with the contempt it deserved; and the Parliament was prorogued on the 24th of April.

The Duke of Bolton had been succeeded in the vice-royalty of Ireland, A. D. 1720, by the Duke of Grafton, a nobleman possessing many of those accomplishments which fitted him to shine in courts. Returning, to his government, after a long absence, in the summer of 1723, he found the nation in a great ferment, in consequence of a patent granted by the King, previously to the resignation of Sunderland, to William Wood, a great proprietor and renter of iron and copper works in England, for coining farthings and half-pence for the kingdom of Ireland to the amount of 100,000*l.* sterling, in order to supply the acknowledged deficiency of copper coin for the purposes of commercial intercourse in that country. An extraordinary clamour was raised against the execution of this plan, chiefly through the factious artifices and machinations of the famous Dean Swift, who published a series of letters or tracts replete with sarcastic wit, affirming the coin to be of a base and inferior quality; that it was a scheme for impoverishing the nation in order to enrich a few rapacious and profligate individuals; the profits of the patent being in fact assigned to persons and purposes not the most honourable; and alarming the whole kingdom with confident predictions of the mischief which must ensue from the enormity of the abuse.* The two houses of Parliament, inflamed with the national enthusiasm, transmitted addresses to the King, accusing the patentee of "fraud and deceit; asserting the terms of the patent to be violated both in respect to the quantity and quality of the coin; that the circulation of it would be highly prejudicial to the revenue, destructive to the commerce, and of the most dangerous consequence to the rights and properties of the subject." To these addresses the King returned mild and conciliatory answers; and the investigation of this affair being referred to the Lords of the council, an assay was ordered to be made of the fineness, value, and weight, of Wood's coinage; and a satisfactory report was subsequently framed by Sir Isaac Newton, then master of the mint, assisted by Mr. Southwell and Mr. Scroope, certifying that the copper was equal to that used in the English coinage, and far superior to the copper money coined for Ireland in the reigns of Charles II. James II. and William. The popular rage continued, however, to increase: and many persons of great respectability were drawn into the vortex of opposition. The conduct of the Lord Lieutenant, in this critical situation, was not thought to display any striking manifestations of the wisdom and discretion of an experienced statesman. He was superseded in the spring of 1724 by Lord Carteret, who, with ability and address, failing equally in his attempts to introduce this obnoxious coinage, a resolution was adopted in the succeeding year, voluntarily to announce, from the throne, the total surrender of the patent; Mr. Walpole declaring himself adverse to the policy of urging any measure, however innocent or even laudable, contrary to the general sense of a whole nation.

By the promotion of Lord Carteret to the government of Ireland, (an honour forced upon his acceptance, and considered by him as a fall from power,) Townshend and Walpole were relieved from the competition of a man, whose personal interest with the King was very great, whose rivalship was open and avowed, and whom they regarded in the light of a determined and dangerous enemy. The seals of Secretary were delivered to the Duke of Newcastle, who was content to act in entire subserviency to those who had been instrumental to his promotion; and the Duke of Grafton was appointed to the office of Lord Chamberlain of the household of which he retained possession, many years.

Early in the year (1724,) Philip V. King of Spain, yielding himself up without reserve to vain and superstitious fervors of devotion, retired to the monastery of St. Ildefonso, whence he made a solemn renunciation of the crowns of Castile and Arragon in favour of his eldest son, Don Lewis, Prince of Asturias; so that he might be able—to use his own words—"disengaged from all other cares, to meditate on death, and to seek out his salvation—committing his successor and his people to the powerful protection of the holy virgin," under whose auspices the young Prince ventured to assume the reins of government, without the usual formality of assembling the Cortes. Lewis dying soon after his elevation to the throne, the abdicated monarch was reluctantly prevailed upon again to encounter the cares and burdens of royalty. Devoting himself, however, to monkish exercises, the task of government devolved upon the Queen, whose influence in the Spanish councils had been some years remarkable.

The alarm of the King of England was now at its height, by the certain intelligence that a treaty of alliance had taken place between Russia and Sweden, bearing date at Stockholm February 22, 1724.† The Emperor declined compliance with the solicitations of the contracting powers to accede to this treaty in form, the congress of Cambray not being yet dissolved; but the King of England well knew how strongly he was disposed to assist in accomplishing its object. At the same time the czar sent an ambassador to Copenhagen, formally to demand from his Danish Majesty the restitution of Sleswic. Sweden had not ceded, and indeed could not pretend any right to cede, this duchy to Denmark; but, in the treaty of Fredericstadt, concluded between these two powers, A. D. 1720, his Swedish Majesty had engaged not to oppose whatever stipulations had been made by the mediating powers (England and France) in favour of Denmark respecting Sleswic, and to give no assistance to the Duke of Holstein contrary to such stipulations;—so that the secret article of the treaty of Stockholm was a palpable violation of public faith; such as their Britannic and Danish Majesties were by no means prepared to expect; and were ill able at the present moment, either to counteract, or repel.

Parliament assembled on the 12th of November; but not the slightest intimation was given by the King in his opening speech of the critical state of his foreign and electoral concerns. On the contrary, he professed to feel "the highest satisfaction at the prosperous situation of affairs: peace with all powers abroad—at home perfect tranquillity." Notwithstanding this boasted tranquillity, the 4000 additional troops were, though not without some opposition, continued for another year.

During this session, the Earl of Macclesfield, Lord High Chancellor of England, was impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, on the ground of his having made unusual and exorbitant profits from the sale of places; and also from the abuse of his trust as general guardian of the persons and estates of orphans and lunatics. After a trial of twenty days, he was convicted by the Peers, and sentenced to pay a fine of 30,000*l.* and to imprisonment in the Tower till the fine was paid. The Earl was succeeded in the Chancellor-

* It appears that Sunderland had given the disposal of this patent to the Duchess of Kendal, the favourite mistress of the King, who sold it to Wood. This secret Lord Carteret disclosed to Alan Broderick, son of the Lord Chancellor Middleton, with a view to embarrass the measures of the new ministers, Townshend and Walpole, and to fix an odium upon their administration.

† By a separate article of this treaty, the high contracting parties obliged themselves, "in the most effectual manner, to use their good offices for the restoring the Duke of Holstein to the duchy of Sleswic; and, if these proved ineffectual, other methods should be thought of. In particular, application should be made to the powers who stood engaged with them to guarantee the said duchy to the said Duke—of whom England, by the treaty of Travendahl, was one; leaving it more immediately to his imperial Majesty to concert such measures as might, with the greatest security, for ever cut off this source of such infinite troubles to the North."

ship by Sir Peter King (created Baron King of Ockham in Surry,) who had acquired great and deserved reputation in his former station of Lord Chief Justice of England.

Early in the new year (1725) an extraordinary and unexpected application was made on the part of the crown, by a message delivered by Mr. Walpole, for the sum of 500,000*l.* to discharge the debts of the civil list, which had been incurred to that amount in the short space of three years, since they were before liquidated by Parliament.*

Mr. Pulteney, now cofferer of the household, on the usual motion for going into a committee of the whole House to consider of his Majesty's message, took occasion to observe, "that he wondered how so great a debt could be contracted in three year's time; but was not surprised some persons were so eager to have the deficiencies of the civil list made good, since they and their friends had so great a share in it; and desired to know whether this was all that was due, or whether they were to expect another reckoning." This speech had no other effect than to occasion the dismission of Mr. Pulteney, who from this time became the leader and oracle of the opposition. The money required was voted by a majority of 239 against 119 voices; being raised as before on the credit of a general tax or deduction of sixpence in the pound upon the civil-list revenues. The session ended on the 31st of May; his Majesty declaring, "that their time had been so well employed for the service and interest of the public, that he assured himself it would be to the general satisfaction of the nation,"†

Having settled his affairs in England, and appointed a council of Regency, his Majesty set out, accompanied by Lord Townshend, for Hanover, on the 3d of June, and arrived at Herenhausen on the 14th.

The King of France had, in February, been seized with a dangerous fever; and on his recovery, the nation, apprehensive of the consequences of a disputed succession, expressed the most eager impatience for the marriage of the King. It was therefore suddenly resolved in council to send back the infanta of Spain, affianced to his most Christian Majesty, and actually resident in Paris, a child of five years of age; to whose person, moreover, the young monarch had conceived a dislike approaching to aversion. On the notification of this resolution at the court of Madrid, the King and Queen of Spain manifested the most extravagant marks of resentment; and ordered the ambassador to quit the capital in nine-and-twenty hours. A determination was also taken to send back Mademoiselle de Beaujolois, daughter of the late Regent, and betrothed to Don Carlos, second son of his Catholic Majesty; and the King of Spain publicly and passionately protested, that Spain could never shed blood enough to avenge so gross an insult. In an audience which he gave to the British ambassador, Colonel Stanhope, he avowed his determination of separating himself from France for ever; declaring also, that he should order his plenipotentiaries at Cambray to reject the mediation of France, and to submit the final settlement of the points in dispute between him and the Emperor to the sole mediation of England. This following proposition the King of England was ultimately compelled to decline—conscious that its acceptance could be regarded in no other light by France than as an abandonment of her alliance and friendship. So apprehensive, notwithstanding was France of a change in the politics of the English court, that she not only expressed her readiness to enter into fresh engagements with England, but a flattering demand was made of one of the English Princesses, grand-daughter to the King of England, as a consort to the young monarch of France. To this proposition King George listened with a delighted ear; and though, by the united advice of his ministers, he was compelled reluctantly to decline this offer, it sensibly contributed to confirm his prepossessions in favour of France. His most Christian Majesty was soon after married, July 1725, to the Princess Maria, daughter of Stanislaus, titular King of Poland. Previously to this event, the Duke of Bourbon had been unexpectedly removed from the helm of government; and the Bishop of Frejus, preceptor to the King, and now invested with the purple, under the title of Cardinal Fleury, appointed prime minister at the age of seventy years. He discovered, however, at this advanced period of life, no decay of powers corporeal or mental. Though of unbounded ambition, his temper was naturally mild and benignant. His views were pacific, and he aimed to maintain the ascendency of France, and to humble the pride of the house of Austria,—rather by political address and refinement, than by a declared and open enmity. He adopted the sentiments of his predecessors, the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, relative to England, with which kingdom he ardently wished to maintain perpetual harmony.‡ The foreign policy of France sustained, therefore, no alteration in consequence of this revolution in the court.§

The King of England having refused to accept the sole

1st. "That his Majesty had found it impracticable to make any considerable retrenchments.

IIdly. That the necessities of his government had engaged him in some extraordinary expences, which he was pursuaded his loyal commons would believe had been employed not only for the honour and dignity of the crown, but for the interest and prosperity of his people."

† It was about this period that the King revived the ancient order of Knights of the Bath. Mr. Walpole was decorated with the red ribband of the order; and, soon after, was made a Knight of the Garter—an honour to which no commoner had from time immemorial been admitted. His eldest son also was created a Peer by the title of Lord Walpole.

‡ By the influence of this ecclesiastical statesman, a barbarous edict had been recently promulgated respecting the Huguenots, against which the court of London remonstrated in vain. No other answer could be obtained, than that this was a matter which pertained to the internal government of the kingdom, and the King's edicts must be obeyed. The Protestants of Alsatia alone, whose religious privileges were founded on the basis of the treaty of Westphalia, and whose political defection was probably the subject of apprehension, were exempted from their operation.

§ Early in the present year (January 28,) died suddenly, in the 53d year of his age, Peter the Great, czar of Muscovy. Previously to his accession to the throne, Russia was scarcely known as a European power, except by her occasional wars with Poland, and by the commercial intercourse which she maintained with England, through the medium of the remote port of Archangel, situated at the extremity of the Frozen Ocean. Peter, who by a rare conjunction of qualities joined a most daring and ardent spirit of enterprise to a clear and solid judgment, early entertained the vast design of civilising his immense dominions; and after surmounting, by the incessant labour of thirty years, difficulties insuperable to any other man, he lived to see himself in possession of all which had engaged his wishes and his hopes. By his conquests he had subjected various rich and populous provinces to his dominion: and in the midst of them he had built a magnificent city, bearing the name of its founder. He introduced discipline into his armies; he created a powerful navy; and, in the room of Asiatic ignorance, prejudice, and barbarism, he substituted the arts, the learning, the customs, and manners of Europe. His system of improvement and aggrandisement has been eagerly and invariably pursued by his successors in the empire; especially by Catherine II. and by the present Emperor Alexander. He was succeeded by his consort the Empress Catherine, who from a low and nameless origin had reached the highest point of human elevation. She was endowed with extraordinary talents, and seconded all the projects of aggrandisement formed by the czar, her husband, with a kindred and congenial spirit. This high-minded Princess soon manifested her determination to maintain inviolate all the articles of the treaty of Stockholm. She demanded anew of the King of Denmark the restitution of the Duchy of Sleswic, or an equivalent for the same; plainly alluding to the contiguous provinces of Bremen and Verden. When exhorted by the senate to suspend the great naval and military equipments then preparing, and previously to try the mode of negotiation with Denmark, this imperial heroine with indignant warmth replied: "Let not any one of you that would be reckoned an honest subject, or hope to enjoy the least share of my favour, dare to offer me such mean-spirited advice. The Duke of Holstein, stripped unjustly of his hereditary dominions, took sanctuary in our country, and threw himself into the arms of my deceased Lord for protection; he is since contracted to my daughter, and is himself as dear to me as my own child. I am bound by all the rules of honour, as well as the ties of blood, to see justice done to that unfortunate Prince, in whose cause I would not scruple to forego the weakness of my sex, and even to draw a sword or to put myself at the head of an army. It is for my interest and glory, as well as yours, to convince the world that I have power to see justice done to my family, and that I am resolved to make use of it." At the conclusion of these words, she gave orders in their presence to Prince sole mediation at Cambray, the resentment of the King of Spain was excited against him to an extraordinary degree: orders were immediately sent from Madrid to break up the congress; and full powers were granted to conclude an accommodation with the Emperor at Vienna. Such was the ardour of the two courts to terminate their long and deeply rooted animosity, that in a few weeks the celebrated treaty, known by the name of the treaty of Vienna, was framed, perfected, and signed April 30, 1725. It consisted of three parts or distinct instruments. By the first of these the two sovereigns confirmed all the articles of the quadruple alliance, one of which guarantied the rich successions of Parma, Placentia, and Tuscany, to the infant Don Carlos. Charles VI. renounced his pretensions to the crown of Spain; Philip acknowledged the Emperor's right to Naples and Sicily, the Milanese, and the Netherlands, and became guarantee of the Austrian succession according to the pragmatic sanction*—the appellation given to the imperial edict, confirmed and ratified by the diet of the empire, by which the vast dominions of that house were declared to be a perpetual and indivisible feoffment, limited to the heirs general of the present Emperor. The second was a regulation of commerce, conferring great mutual privileges, and recognising the validity of the charter of the Ostend company; and the third was an engagement of mutual defence. These stipulations were in themselves sufficiently obnoxious: and, considering the actual disposition of Russia, there could be little doubt of her eventual accession to the treaty. The rumours, however, propagated concerning the separate and secret articles of the treaty of Vienna were far more alarming than the known tenor of the public articles. It was confidently reported that the Emperor had engaged:

1st. To give in marriage his daughters the two Archduchesses to the infanta Don Carlos and Don Philip.

IIdly. To concur in employing force for the restoring Gibraltar to Spain, in case it could not be amicably effected.

IIIdly. To concert measures with his Catholic Majesty for placing the Pretender on the throne of Great Britain.

Of the reality of these secret articles, and particularly the last of them, though time has fully demonstrated the futility and falsehood of the opinion, the court of London entertained a most serious belief; and measures were immediately taken by the King of England to ward off the invisible impending blow. Such was the activity inspired by the magnitude of the supposed danger, that on 3d of September, 1725, a treaty of defensive alliance and mutual guarantee, as respecting the rights both of dominion and commerce, in opposition to the treaty of Vienna, was signed at Hanover by the ministers of Great Britain, France, and Prussia, to which Denmark and Holland soon after acceded, to continue in force for the term of fifteen years. In proportion as alarm was excited by the treaty of Vienna, did it seem, by a sort of political re-action, to be communicated to the original contracting parties. Great sums of money were remitted from the King of Spain to the Emperor, and great military preparations were made on both sides. The original object of the imperial and Spanish courts extended however, in all probability, no farther than to obtain, by the most effectual means in their power short of actual violence, the restitution of Gibraltar, and the guarantee of England to the pragmatic sanction, the firm establishment of which the Emperor had greatly at heart. For this purpose they scrupled not to use high and haughty language. The Austrian minister publicly boasted that the Emperor would now give laws to Europe; and at Madrid open encouragement was afforded to the partisans of the Pretender. The British ambassador was treated with studied indignity; a plan of invasion was delivered in by the Dukes of Ormond and Liria, who were frequently in conference with the Imperial, Russian, and Spanish ministers; and by way of insult was at this time publicly played at court the famous Jacobite air, "The King shall enjoy his own again."

On New-year's day, (1726) King George embarked at Helvoet-Sluys for Harwich; but, a violent storm arising, the Carolina yacht, with his Majesty on board, parted from her convoy, who after being tempest-tost for two days, with great difficult landed at Rye on the coast of Sussex; and the ground being covered with snow to a great depth, he did not arrive at St. James's till the 9th of January. On the 20th, the Parliament was opened by a speech in which he declared "that the distressed condition of some of our Protestant brethren abroad, and the negotiations and engagements entered into by some foreign powers, which seemed to have laid the foundation of new troubles and disturbances in Europe, and to threaten the loss of several of the most advantageous branches of our trade, had obliged him to concert with other powers such measures as might give a check to those ambitious views." The treaty of Hanover was soon afterwards presented to the House of Commons by Sir R. Walpole; Mr. Horace Walpole, brother to the minister, undertaking in an elaborate speech to obviate all the objections to which it seemed liable.† The leaders of the opposition, however, Mr. Pulteney, Mr. Shippen, &c. strongly urged, Prince Menzikoff and Admiral Apraxin, to have the fleet and troops in readiness by the middle of May at their peril. Hostilities were, notwithstanding this warlike declaration, suspended, and negotiations set on foot between the courts of London, Copenhagen, and Petersburg, which continued during the whole of the summer of 1725, but without effect—the czarina professing herself willing to concede in all other points, but still insisting upon the unconditional restitution of Sleswic, or the substitution of a real and solid equivalent.

---

* This is a term of the civil law, meaning a public and weighty sanction.

† He assured the House, "that the constant care and endeavour of his Majesty, since his happy accession to the throne, had been to secure the tranquillity of Christendom, to promote the honour and interest of his kingdoms, and settle the balance of power in Europe on a solid foundation. With these great and laudable views (he said) his Majesty had assumed the character both of mediator and guarantee of the barrier treaty concluded in 1715, and of the convention by which it was subsequently confirmed between the Emperor and the states. Actuated by the same motives, he had in 1716 signed a defensive alliance with the Emperor, and in 1717 another with the most Christian King and the States General. In order to fortify these treaties, and more effectually to secure the repose of Europe, the King had in 1718 made a convention with his most Christian Majesty for proposing ultimate conditions of peace between the Emperor and Spain, and also between his imperial Majesty and the then King of Sicily. That this treaty was followed, after a very short interval, by a treaty of alliance between the Emperor, the King of Great Britain, his most Christian Majesty, and the republic of Holland; whence this treaty derived its popular appellation of The Quadruple Alliance. That within a few months the King of Sicily was admitted as a party to this treaty; and at length the King of Spain himself was compelled to accede to the terms of it; which was mainly owing to the generous assistance his Britannic Majesty gave to the Emperor in the Mediterranean. That the remaining points in dispute between their Imperial and Catholic Majesties were referred to the decision of a congress opened at Cambray. After an unsuccessful negotiation of three years, the congress was suddenly dissolved, upon advice that the Emperor and King of Spain had adjusted their differences by a separate treaty concluded at Vienna. That this unexpected event had occasioned no little surmise and alarm; and had raised jealousies which a more perfect knowledge of this transaction had fully justified. That this treaty of peace was followed by a treaty of commerce, the principal object of which was the establishment of an India company at Ostend, in violation of our rights, and to the ruin of our trade. That the remonstrances made by his Majesty's ministers at the courts of Vienna and Madrid had been received by the ministers of his Catholic Majesty with coldness, and by those of his Imperial Majesty with the utmost haughtiness; insomuch that they scrupled not to insinuate, that if his Britannic Majesty persisted in adopting resolutions hostile to the treaty of Vienna, his Imperial Majesty would think himself disengaged from the guarantee of the Protestant succession to the crown of Great Britain. And they had even gone so far as to affirm, that such members might be attended with disagreeable consequences in relation to his Majesty's dominions in Germany. Such however was the firmness of his Majesty, that no impression could be made on him by these menaces; nor was he by any suggestions to be deterred from concerting with other powers the means of counteracting the ambitious views of this formidable alliance. And this was the more necessary, because there were just grounds to believe that this extraordinary and unexpected reconciliation was owing to the fixed and favourite purpose of the house of Austria, of rendering the imperial dignity hereditary in their family. In order to that, it might be supposed that the treaty of Vienna was to be cemented by a marriage between the Emperor's eldest daughter and the infant Don Carlos. Who did not foresee the fatal consequences of this conjunction?

urged, "that in consequence of this treaty, represented as so wise, so just, and good, the British nation would be eventually engaged in a war for the defence of the King's German dominions, contrary to an express provision made in the act of settlement, which, as the basis the present family rested their title to the crown upon, ought to be held sacred and inviolable." These considerations appeared to have no weight with those to whom they were addressed; and the House of Commons voted by a majority of 285 against 107, an address to the King, declaratory of the highest approbation of the treaty of Hanover, &c. The Parliament after granting large and liberal supplies, was prorogued on the 24th of May.

Early in the spring, Sir Charles Wager had sailed with a powerful fleet to the Baltic. During the whole of the preceding year, intrigues had been carried on in Sweden by the English cabinet, with a view to detach that kingdom from the Russian alliance, but the opposite interest continued to predominate, and in the month of April in the present year the Emperor acceded in form to the treaty of Stockholm. Sir Charles Wager having been joined by a Danish squadron, the united fleet proceeded to the gulf of Finland, and on the 29th of May cast anchor before the port of Revel. The English Admiral had positive instructions not to suffer the Russian fleets to leave their harbours, till the Empress had obviated all ground of suspicion by an explicit declaration of her pacific intentions: for which purpose he deputed an officer to Cronslot with a letter to the Czarina, written with his Britannic Majesty's own hand, in which he observed, "that as her imperial Majesty's great preparations, both by sea and land, could not fail of giving him, as well as his allies in those parts, great and just cause to be alarmed, she would not be surprised that he had sent a strong squadron into the Baltic to obviate any danger that might ensue; and he professed his astonishment, that while he was carrying on amicable negotiations, and had not given the least provocation on his part, measures were taken at her court in favour of the Pretender; and concluding with an exhortation, that rather than plunge Russia into a war, and the whole north into confusion, her Majesty would please to give her people and all mankind convincing proofs of her inclination for peace, and of her good disposition to live in quiet with her neighbours."

The Empress, notwithstanding her high and undaunted spirit, seeing her ports blockaded by a superior force, and even her maritime towns in danger of attack, was compelled to temporise. She, therefore, in guarded terms, expressed her surprise "at not receiving the King's letters till the very instant his fleet appeared on her coasts, and had actually cast anchor before Revel: since it had been more agreeable to the custom established among Sovereigns, and more consistent with the amity subsisting between the two countries, had his Majesty thought fit to expostulate with her concerning any umbrage he might have conceived, and to expect her answer thereupon before he had taken so offensive a step;—that then his Majesty might have been assured by her, that it was so far from her thoughts to disturb the repose in the north, that, on the contrary, all her cares and attention were wholly bent on the security and preservation of it;—that the charge brought against her in relation to the Pretender was a frivolous accusation, serving merely as a pretence for the unkind steps taken against her." This formal disavowal by the Empress of any hostile designs, did not prevent Sir Charles Wager from remaining in his station near Revel till October, when the season was too far advanced to admit of any farther naval operations. The Czarina, took her revenge, by acceding in form (August 1726,) to the treaty of Vienna.

Mr. Poyntz, Ambassador at the court of Stockholm, had presented (in June) a memorial to that court, declaring "that his Britannic Majesty, always attentive to the peace of the north, had no sooner concluded the treaty of Hanover, but he had communicated it to Sweden, and desired its accession thereto; that it was with great concern he saw this negotiation lengthened out to above six months, and that in the mean time Sweden had entered into engagements with other powers; notwithstanding which, his Majesty, fearing these delays should endanger Sweden, to shew his exactness in fulfilling his engagements, and his attention to the succour of Sweden, was willing to put that crown in possession of the good fruits of its accession, even before it had acceded, by sending a powerful squadron into the Baltic without any requisition thereof;—that the British Admiral had been presented to his Swedish Majesty, to assure him, that if he thought himself in any immediate danger from the armament of his neighbours, he was in that case to concert measures with his Majesty for the defence of Sweden; but that while the said Admiral continued at Stockholm, his Swedish Majesty had graciously answered in writing, 'that having a defensive alliance with Russia, he thought himself in no danger from thence.' If after the departure of the English fleet any misfortune should happen to Sweden for want of timely precautions, it is hoped such misfortune will not be imputed to his Britannic Majesty. And the Ambassador concludes with saying, that his Majesty cannot imagine that the fear of danger ought not to be a sufficient inducement to guard against those dangers; nor that the loose and uncertain hopes of future advantages from Russia can afford a reasonable motive to reject the friendship of those powers which have ever been the support of Sweden—nor that those imaginary and insidious promises can be balanced against a clear and net subsidy of 100,000 ducats per month, to commence from your Majesty's accession to the treaty of Hanover, and with a prospect of more considerable assistance in case of need." —The English interest gradually gained ground; and the government of Sweden perceiving Russia unable to cope with the naval power of Great Britain, and feeling sensibly the operative influence of those golden flowers which now diffused themselves in rich profusion over that barren land, acceded (March 1727) to the treaty of Hanover. Prussia, on the other hand, notwithstanding the near affinity of its sovereign to the King of England, about the same time withdrew from this alliance, and acceded to the treaty of Vienna.*

junction? The issue of such a marriage might in time inherit not only the vast hereditary dominions of the Austrian family, but the entire monarchy of Spain with its appendages; which would entirely overthrow the balance of power, and render the liberties of Europe wholly precarious. If this were not within the contemplation of those two monarchs, how would any one undertake to account for the extensive privileges bestowed by the King of Spain, in contravention of his most solemn treaties with Great Britain, upon the Emperor's subjects in the Netherlands; or for the Emperor's so far forgetting his obligations to England and Holland, as to persist in supporting the Ostend Company, established with no other view than to distress the maritime powers; or for his engaging to assist the King of Spain in the recovery of Minorca and Gibraltar? In order to put a timely stop to the progress of such alarming and dangerous designs, his Majesty had, in his great wisdom, entered into a defensive alliance with his Most Christian Majesty and the King of Prussia, to which several other powers, and particularly the States General, were invited to accede. That the grand design of this alliance was to maintain the tranquillity of Christendom and the balance of power, and the respective rights and immunities of all nations, particularly those relating to Commerce: and that his Majesty, ever attentive to the support and protection of the Protestant interest, had engaged, by a separate article of this treaty, the Most Christian King and the King of Prussia, who, together with his Majesty, were guarantees of the treaty of Oliva, concluded between the crowns of Poland and Sweden, A. D. 1660, to interpose in behalf of our distressed Protestant brethren in Poland; and to cause reparation to be made for what may have been done at Thorne, contrary to the stipulations of that treaty. And he concluded with passing very lavish encomiums on the wisdom, vigilance, steadiness, and resolution of his Majesty, in the conduct of all these weighty and important affairs."

* For many years past a strict amity had subsisted between the two Houses of Hanover and Brandenburg, wholly founded indeed, upon motives of interest. They were embarked in the same cause, as members of the grand confederacy against Sweden, and were alike jealous of the designs of the Czar, who had sent a large body of troops into Germany under pretence of assisting at the siege of Wismar; after the reduction of which place they remained as auxiliaries to the Duke of Mecklenburg, over whose territories the Czar, eager to gain a permanent footing in Germany, flattered himself that

When Sir Charles Wager sailed for the Baltic, two other powerful squadrons were also fitted out at an immense expense. One of them, under the command of Sir John Jennings, with a body of land forces on board, cruised for a considerable time off the coasts of Spain, to the great consternation of the inhabitants, but attempted no act of hostility. Another fleet under Rear-Admiral Hosier sailed for the West Indies, with orders to block up the galleons in the Spanish harbours; or to capture them, in case they should presume to venture out. His instructions, however, authorizing no farther or more direct act of hostility, and the Spaniards having reconveyed, on the first intelligence of this armament, their treasures from Porto Bello to Panama, this officer was compelled to remain inactive on his station till the greater part of his men, and at length the Admiral himself, perished deplorably by the diseases of that destructive climate. This fleet, which had at first excited universal terror, continued in those seas till it became the jest and sport of the Spaniards, who, perceiving the restrictions they laboured under, ventured, in open defiance of the English, to seize on the effects of the South-Sea Company at La Vera Cruz; and the Commander is indeed said to have fallen a sacrifice, less to epidemical sickness than to chagrin and disappointment. The ships also were said to be ruined by the worms; and loud and general complaints were made in England of the improvident and wanton waste of lives and money in this disastrous expedition.

Parliament having assembled in the month of January, 1727, the King informed the two Houses, "that the alliance, offensive and defensive, concluded between Spain and the Emperor, had laid the foundation of a most exorbitant and formidable power—a power levelled against the dearest interests and privileges of the English nation, which must either surrender Gibraltar to Spain, and acquiesce in the Emperor's usurped exercise of commerce, or resolve vigorously to defend their undoubted rights. He assured them that it was a secret article of this alliance to place the Pretender upon the throne of Great Britain; and that Russia was actuated by the same views, which she had however been prevented from taking any steps to accomplish by the recent operations of the British fleet in the Baltic. Two other squadrons (he said) had been also equipped, the advantage and glory accruing to the nation from which sufficiently spoke their praise. And he concluded with informing them, that the King of Spain had actually ordered his Ambassador to quit the kingdom, leaving a memorial containing a formal demand for the restitution of Gibraltar." The Commons in reply, voted a loyal and zealous address, expressing "their determination to stand by and support his Majesty with their lives and fortunes against all his enemies." In the House of Peers the opposition of Lord Bathurst was peculiarly eloquent and spirited;* and seventeen Peers entered their protest against the resolution of the majority, that the measures his Majesty had thought fit to take were honourable, just, and necessary.

So serious was the umbrage given by the King's speech to the court of Vienna, that M. de Palm, the imperial resident at London, was ordered by the Emperor to present a remonstrance to the British court, charging the King with "calumnious misrepresentations, and with hazarding assertions void of all foundation. He declared that there was no offensive alliance subsisting between the Imperial and Spanish crowns; that the article relating to the Pretender was an absolute nullity; and that the restitution of Gibraltar, however just the claim of the King of Spain, was foreign to the purpose of the treaty." Both Houses expressed, in formal addresses to the throne, their indignation at the insolence of this memorial, which they stiled an extravagant insult upon his Majesty, and a presumptuous and vain attempt to instil into the minds of his faithful subjects a distrust of his royal word.†

With the memorial was transmitted from Vienna a letter the Duke would at length be induced to assign to him his rights of sovereignty. But when this project was, by a firm resistance, rendered abortive, and peace concluded between Prussia and Sweden, the jealousy of the Prussian monarch was transferred from the Czar to the King of England, who had obtained a protectorial commission from the Emperor, vesting in him the administration of Mecklenburg, and who evidently entertained still farther views of ambition on that inviting contiguous duchy. By a pactum long established between the houses of Mecklenburg and Brandenburg, the reversion of this inheritance, in failure of male heirs, was settled upon the King of Prussia; and though the Prussian monarch could not venture to break with England till an eclaircissement had taken place with the Emperor, no sooner was the renewal of the ancient compact proposed under the guarantee of his imperial Majesty, than Prussia entered without hesitation into all the engagements required of him by the court of Vienna.

* His Lordship asserted "the probability, notwithstanding the alliances recently formed, that England would eventually have a war to support against two of the greatest potentates of Europe; that the indiscreet or violent expressions of the duc de Ripperda were surely no just ground of war, when they had been solemnly disavowed by his Catholic Majesty; that the nation was loaded with a debt of fifty millions, and that a war must soon inevitably exhaust its remaining resources. He said that he was neither in the French, nor Spanish, nor German interests—but a true Englishman; and so long as he had the honour to sit in that House, he would speak and act for the good of his country. What (said he) my Lords, can we get by a war if it be a successful one? I will say it in one word: nothing. What can we lose if it be unprosperous? I will say it in one word, in a syllable: All."

† The following is the above-mentioned memorial of Count Palm to the King of Great Britain, which, at the time, excited so much attention:—

"MOST SERENE AND POTENT KING,

"As soon as the speech made by your Majesty to the Parliament of Great Britain, now assembled, came to the knowledge of his imperial and Catholic Majesty, my most gracious master, he was struck with the utmost astonishment, that your Majesty could suffer yourself to be prevailed upon to declare, from the royal throne, to that most renowned nation, in a manner hitherto unheard of, as undoubted facts, several things, some of which are strained in that speech to a wrong sense, some are entirely distant from the intentions of his imperial and Catholic Majesty; and, lastly, which affect much more sensibly than all the rest, some absolutely void of all foundation.

"For as to what regards the peace concluded at Vienna with the most serene King of Spain, who can forbear being astonished that this very peace, which is built on the quadruple alliance signed at London, and other treaties contracted with your Majesty, as its solid and sole foundation. And for the obtaining of which peace your Majesty, together with your allies, waged so bloody, so long, and so glorious a war, and took yourself so much pains to procure, should now be alledged by your Majesty as a just ground of complaint, and should be made use of as a pretence for these things which hitherto your ministers have been doing in all parts, to the great detriment of the Emperor and the empire and the public tranquillity, and should be represented by your Majesty to the British nation, with so much animosity against the Emperor and the King of Spain, as a violation of treaties.

"After complaining of the peace made at Vienna, complaint is likewise made of the treaty of commerce entered into with Spain, which is calculated to promote the mutual and lawful advantages of the subjects of both parties, which is agreeable to the law of nations, and to the customs of all people in amity with each other: which can in no respect be of any prejudice to the British nation, whether we regard the situation of the countries, or the particular nature of the trade, and which is not in the least repugnant to the treaties made with Great Britain. So that if this treaty be considered with a mind free from prejudice, and from all design of inflaming the nation, there will remain no pretence to say that this treaty can be grievous or hurtful to a nation for which his imperial Majesty has the greatest affection and esteem, and whose glorious exploits, and important succours, no time will efface out of his memory.

"The other head of complaint, which contains such things as are void of all foundation, relates principally to that imaginary alliance, which in the speech is called offensive, and is there supposed to have been made against your Majesty between the Emperor and King of Spain. But it will not only appear how groundless and frivolous this supposition is, from the offer lately made by his imperial and Catholic Majesty, of entering into a convention de se mutuo non offendendo, but will be entirely refuted by the consideration of the tenor of the treaty of alliance and friendship itself, made with the crown of Spain, and communicated in its whole extent to your Majesty when it is proper: from the words of which, whether the least shadow or appearance of an offensive alliance can be drawn, is submitted to the judgment of the whole world.

"Another part of the complaint relates to the secret articles made in favour of the Pretender, whereof your Majesty asserts that you have certain and undoubted informations, by which articles it should have been agreed to set the Pretender on the throne of Great Britain. With what view, on what motive, and to what purpose, these informations, founded on the falsest reports, were represented to the people of Great Britain, is not only easy to be understood by his imperial and Catholic Majesty, but is obvious to the meanest capacity. But since the inviolable dignity and honour of such great Princes cannot suffer that assertions of this nature, entirely unsupported by truth, should be advanced from the royal throne to the whole nation, and to all mankind, his sacred imperial and Catholic Majesty has expressly commanded me, that I should declare to your Majesty, and letter from the Chancellor Count Zinzendorf to Count Palm, expressly commanding him, in the name of his imperial Majesty, after presenting the memorial to the King of Great Britain, to publish it, together with the letter annexed, for the information of the British nation. The Chancellor Zinzendorf affirms in this letter, "That it is easy to see that the speech was made for no other purpose but to excite the nation to a rupture and open war with the Emperor and Spain, and to make the Parliament approve the precipitate and burdensome measure 'which the government has taken for private ends too well known.' That on the first report of these false suppositions, the Emperor and the King of Spain, in order to silence them, proposed a formal act de non offendendo, into which all the contracting parties of the treaties of Vienna and Hanover might enter, till such time as a definitive agreement might have taken place; but that this proposition was rejected." He observes, "that the articles of the quadruple alliance are expressly and publicly laid down as the unalterable basis of the treaty of Vienna; and to affirm that, by a secret pact concluded at the same time, engagements have been entered into by their Imperial and Catholic Majesties repugnant to the same, is an outrageous insult to the Majesty of the two contracting powers, who have a right to demand a reparation proportioned to the enormity of the affront; and that the high contracting parties had no other view than that of making peace between themselves, without injuring any one else." The intemperate language of these papers gave high and just offence: and all the leaders of opposition warmly concurred in the address to the throne on this occasion, which passed the House without a dissentient vote. An order was sent to M. de Palm, signifying "that the said Palm having delivered into the hands of his Majesty, at his late audience, a memorial highly injurious to the honour and dignity of his crown, and having also publicly dispersed the same with a letter from the Count de Zinzendorf to him the said Palm, still more insolent than the memorial, his Majesty looked upon him no longer as a public minister, and required him forthwith to depart out of this kingdom."

Serious preparations were now made on both sides for war; before the end of the session the King informed the Parliament that the fortress of Gibraltar was actually besieged; the forces of Great Britain were augmented by sea and land; thirty thousand Swedes, Danes, and Hessians, were taken into British pay; and so seriously did France at this period enter into the views of England, or rather Hanover, for the abasement of the house of Austria, that, exclusively of her stipulated quota of troops, she had actually engaged for the payment of an annual subsidy to Denmark of 350,000 rix-dollars for four years, and of 50,000 ducats monthly to Sweden, to commence from the period of her accession to the treaty of Hanover.

Amongst other more usual ways and means of providing the supplies on this occasion, the King was empowered, by a clause of appropriation in one of the revenue bills of the year, "to apply such sums as should be necessary for making good the expences and engagements which had been or should be made before the 25th of September next, for the purposes of establishing the security of commerce, and restoring the tranquillity of Europe."

The sum of 370,000*l.* issued in Exchequer bills, was also charged on the surplus produce of certain duties appertaining to the sinking fund, towards the expences of the war.* The sum of 125,000*l.* being charged in general terms, as issued for engagements and expences above and beyond such as were specified, the House addressed the King for a particular account of the disposition of that money; but they received for answer, that the money was disbursed for services requiring the greatest secrecy. A motion by Lord Morpeth, for copies of all such memorials or representations to his Majesty from the crowns of Sweden and Denmark as did induce him to send the squadron of the last year into the Baltic, was opposed with great strength; and Mr. Horace Walpole in a long speech justified all the steps taken since his Majesty's accession to preserve the balance of power, the peace of Europe, and the tranquillity of the north.—The Parliament was at length prorogued on the 15th of May. The love of peace," said his Majesty, "has hitherto prevailed upon me, even under this high provocation (alluding to the actual siege of Gibraltar†) to suspend in some measure my resentments; and instead of having immediate recourse to arms, and demanding of my allies that assistance which they are engaged and ready to give me, I have concurred with the most Christian King and the States General in making such overtures of accommodation as must convince all the world of the uprightness of our intentions and of our sincere disposition to peace, and demonstrate to whose ambition and thirst of power the calamities of a war are to be imputed, if these just and reasonable propositions are rejected."

In the early part of the spring, a great fleet was sent to the Baltic under Sir John Norris. Great Britain being now in alliance with the Scandinavian crowns, Russia was reduced to a state of total inaction, and not a ship of war ventured from the ports of Cronstadt or Revel. Still the determined enmity of so formidable a power was the subject of just uneasiness, leagued as she now was with the courts of Vienna and Madrid; each of these three combined potentates having peculiar and distinct causes of resentment and provocation, and all of them founded upon incontestible grounds of reason and justice. The sudden death of the Czarina, however, at this critical juncture, entirely changed the face of affairs in the north, and the politics of the court of St. Petersburgh sustained another revolution, extremely favourable to the restoration of the general tranquillity. The throne of the czars was now filled to the whole kingdom of Great Britain, how highly he thinks himself affronted thereby, solemnly affirming upon his imperial word, that there exists no secret article, nor convention whatsoever, which contains, or can tend to prove, the least tittle of what has been alledged. But that the secret designs, which lie concealed under a conduct till this time unheard of, may more manifestly appear, it must be observed, that the time is purposely taken for doing this, when a negotiation is on foot at Paris for composing the differences which have arisen, without any fault of his imperial and Catholic Majesty; which negotiation sufficiently shews how much his imperial and Catholic Majesty is at all times inclined to peace, and to the religious observation of his treaties.

"As to what is said of Gibraltar, and concerning the siege thereof, under which, in the speech, it is insinuated as if some other design was concealed, the hostilities notoriously committed in the Indies and elsewhere against the King of Spain, in violation of treaties, seem to have given a very just occasion to the King of Spain for attempting that siege. But as to the intentions and engagements of the Emperor upon that article, it is easy to see what they are by the treaty above-mentioned, which has been communicated.

"As to what is said in the last place, concerning the Ostend trade, which the goodness of the Catholic King induced him to favour, being bound by no treaty, after he had been apprized of the just reasons for the establishment of it, various expedients for a composition have been proposed, not only at the Hague, but even lately at Paris, lest this harmless method of providing for the security of the barrier, should prove an obstacle to the common friendship of the neighbouring powers.

"Which things being thus the injury offered to truth, the honour and dignity of his sacred imperial and Catholic Majesty require that they should be exposed to your Majesty, to the kingdom of Great Britain, and to the whole world. And his sacred imperial Majesty demands that reparation which is due to him by all manner of right, for the great injuries which have been done him by these many imputations."

* This alienation of a fund hitherto regarded as sacred was the more remarkable, as the House of Commons, in reply to the speech from the throne, expressly recommending to their attention the state of the sinking fund, had said—"And that all who wish well to the peace and quiet of your Majesty's government may have the satisfaction to see that our present necessities shall make no interruption in the progress of that desirable work of gradually reducing the national debt, we will consider of the most proper method for immediately applying the produce of the sinking fund to the uses for which it was so wisely contrived, and to which it stands now appropriated."

† The Conde de las Torres, General of the Spanish army, had opened the trenches before Gibraltar, February 11, 1727; but the garrison, consisting of six thousand men, under the command of a gallant veteran, Lord Portmore, being well supplied with provisions and stores, no perceptible progress was made in the space of four months, during which the siege was pertinaciously prolonged; while the loss sustained by the besiegers was immense.

by Peter II. a youth only fifteen years of age, son of the unfortunate Alexiowitz, who ended his days by a most tragical catastrophe during the life-time of his father Peter the Great.

Through the intervention of the court of Versailles, now acting under the auspices of the mild and equitable Fleury, preliminary articles of accommodation were signed at Paris, May the 20th, (1727,) by the ministers of the different belligerent powers; who, though much exasperated against each other, were actuated by no motives of sufficient weight to induce them to involve anew all Europe in the horrors of a general war.*

His Majesty, the King of England, seemed at length to have surmounted all his political difficulties; and he eagerly embraced this favourable opportunity of revisiting his electoral dominions. Embarking at Greenwich on the 3d of June, he landed in Holland on the 7th, and immediately set out on his journey to Hanover. On the road between Delden and Osnaburg he was seized with a kind of lethargic paralysis; and feeling himself attacked by the stroke of death, he said to the nobleman who accompanied him in the carriage, "C'est fait de moi"—"Tis over with me! He appeared, however, extremely anxious to reach the capital of his dominions; but on his arrival at the palace of his brother, the Bishop of Osnaburg, the King being now wholly devoid of sense and motion, it was found impossible to proceed; and on Sunday the 11th of June, 1727, he expired, in the 68th year of his age, and 13th of his reign†—leaving issue by his consort Sophia Dorothea, heiress of ‡ the house of Zell, George, successor to the crown, and a daughter, who had been married, previously to the accession of the Brunswick family to the royal dignity, to Frederic William, King of Prussia.§

* These articles imported that hostilities should immediately cease; that the charter of the Ostend company should be suspended for seven years; and that a congress should be opened in four months at Aix-la-Chapelle (afterwards transferred to Soissons) to settle the terms of a final pacification.

† It has been remarked, that if this Prince was not distinguished for shining talents or heroic virtues, much less did he evince remarkable deficiency of understanding or propensity to vice. Acceding to the crown, when far advanced in life, he seemed ever to consider himself rather as elector than as King; and the influence and power of Britain were of little estimation in his eyes, when directed to any other end than the aggrandisement of his native country. As far as concerned the internal government of his kingdoms, the rectitude and benevolence of his intentions were always apparent; but, from the nature of his situation, he was compelled to throw himself into the hands of a party; and from the easiness of his disposition he was too often persuaded to acquiesce in measures which a more perfect acquaintance with the real state of facts and opinions would have shown to be as contrary to his interests as there is reason to believe they frequently were to his inclination. In the view of Europe at large, he sustained the character of a prudent, able, and fortunate Prince; and if, in contemplating the history of his reign, we have cause to lament the weakness and defects of the external system of policy by which its counsels were influenced, we have reason, on the other hand, to express our wishes that the noble speculative principles of government, and of liberty, civil and religious, which this monarch was not only ready but anxious on all occasions to avow, and by which the general tenor of his conduct was regulated, may never cease to be the distinguishing and favourite characteristics of the royal house now seated on the throne.

The following passage, from a letter of Count Broglio to the King of France, written in July, 1724, appears to throw additional light upon the character of George I.

"The King has no predilection for the English nation, and never receives in private any English of either sex. None even of his principal officers are admitted to his chamber in a morning to dress him, nor in the evening to undress him. These offices are performed by the Turks who are his valets-de-chambre, and who give him every thing he wants in private. He rather considers England as a temporary possession, to be made the most of while it lasts, than as a perpetual inheritance to himself and family. He will have no disputes with the Parliament, but commits the entire transaction of that business to Walpole; chusing rather that the responsibility should fall on the minister's head than his own, and being well apprized that a King of Great Britain is obliged, when the Parliament requires it, to give an account of his conduct, as well with respect to the liberty of the subject as to the execution and formation of laws. I have even been assured that the King has expressed himself to this effect."

The Turks above alluded to, and known by the names of Mustapha and Mahomet, had been many years before captured, during the wars of Hungary, in which the King, then electoral Prince of Hanover, served under the imperial banners. As they discovered an extreme attachment to the Prince, he took them into his service, and distinguished them by many marks of his favour. Their portraits are on the great stair-case in Kensington palace. Pope has mentioned one of these Turks in terms of approbation in his Moral Essays.

> "From Peer or Bishop 'tis no easy thing,
> To draw the man who loves his God or King.
> Alas! I copy, or my draught would fail,
> From honest Mah'met, or plain parson Hale."

‡ Sophia Dorothea, consort of George I. died November 2, 1726. She was married to him when he was hereditary Prince of Hanover. A. D. 1682, at the age of sixteen. This match proved very unhappy. The heart of the Princess was said to be already engaged, and the affection of the Prince was soon alienated from her. Count Koningsmark, the favoured lover, arriving at the court of Hanover several years afterwards (the Prince being then with the imperial army in Hungary) the mutual passion of the unfortunate pair revived; and as it was discovered that the Count had been admitted secretly to the apartments of the Princess, he was assassinated by order of the reigning elector. The Princess was at the same time put under arrest, and confined in the castle of Alden, upon the banks of the river Aller, where she remained a close prisoner forty years. The process, in consequence of which a sentence of separation, not of divorce, was pronounced, after an interval of eight years, by the ecclesiastical consistory, December 28, 1694, has never been made public. Both King George II. and Queen Caroline are said to have believed her entirely free from crime. On the very morning after the intelligence arrived of the death of King George I. the picture of a lady in royal robes was seen for the first time in the new King's bed-chamber. This was the portrait of his mother, whom he purposed to acknowledge as Queen Dowager had she outlived the late monarch. This picture came afterwards into possession of the Princess Amelia, (sister to his Majesty George III.) who bequeathed it with her other immense property, to the Landgrave of Hesse. It has been asserted, that the Prince twice made proposals of reconciliation:—

1st. On the death of his father the Elector Ernest Augustus.

IIdly. On his accession to the throne of England; and that on both occasions she refused the offers made to her with the highest indignation.

"If I am guilty," said she, "I am not worthy of the Prince: if I am innocent, he is not worthy of me."—Vide Coxe's memoirs of Walpole, Vol. I. Lord Orford's Works, Vol. IV. and Wraxall's Memoirs of the court of Berlin, Vol. I.

§ Notwithstanding the total neglect of the court, and the violence of party rage, descriptive of this as well as of the former reign, literature and the arts continued to flourish in a high degree; and we view with surprise, amidst scenes of contention and turbulence, a constellation of geniuses shedding a peculiar lustre over this period of English history. Scarcely had Locke, Temple, and Dryden, the luminaries of the former age, disappeared, when Addison, Swift, Pope, Shaftesbury, Bolingbroke, &c. arose. The writings of Addison merit distinguished and honourable mention, as exhibiting an almost cloudless picture of urbanity, candour, good sense, and beneficence. The advantage which the community has reaped from the wide and almost boundless diffusion of them no power of calculation can ascertain; and, exclusively of their moral merit, his delineations of life and manners will charm as long as our nation and language exist. In poetry, Pope rose far superior to all his contemporaries; and if inferior to any in that mode of versification which he chose to adopt, he is inferior to Dryden alone. In wit, in harmony, and propriety, and (considering the Rape of the Lock) in imagination and fancy, his merit is of the highest class: in the epistle of Eloise to Abelard only, perhaps, has he spoken the genuine language of passion, or penetrated the inmost recesses of the heart. In architecture, Gibbs and Kent, with unequal steps, and at immeasurable distance, followed the celebrated Sir Christopher Wren; of whom the magnificent plan for rebuilding the city of London in 1666—an effort of genius which can never be contemplated without admiration and indignant regret—would have alone sufficed to perpetuate the memory. At this period the English school of painting could produce (a Thornhill excepted) no greater artist than Jervas, whose name is indeed immortalized—not by the "warmth divine" of his own performances, but of "the verse eternal which embalms the dead." During the course of this reign, Sir Isaac Newton terminated his long career of life; but that of his fame and glory will be coeval only with the world itself.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

GEORGE THE SECOND.

BORN 1683.—DIED 1760

BOOK XXVIII.

THE REIGN OF GEORGE II. COMPRISING A PERIOD OF THIRTY-THREE YEARS, FOUR MONTHS, AND FOURTEEN DAYS.

31. GEORGE II.

A. D. 1727.] NO sooner had the news of the King's death reached his successor, than the privy council was assembled, and sworn anew; his Majesty, George II. declaring to them his firm purpose to preserve inviolate the constitution in church and state; and to cultivate those alliances which his father had made with foreign Princes. The great officers of state were continued in their places; and it was evident that the political system was not about to suffer any radical change.* Sir Robert Walpole, upon whom the weight of business chiefly rested, seemed even to possess a higher and more exclusive share of confidence than ever; and Lord Townshend, Secretary of State for foreign affairs, was alone able to preserve some share of independent political consequence.† It was regarded as uncertain, by the public, whether the chief administration would remain with Walpole and Townshend. During their secession in the late reign, they had paid assiduous court, and been well received at Leicester house; and Walpole had been principally instrumental in effecting the external reconciliation which had taken place between the Prince of Wales and the King. After their re-admission to power, a civil intercourse was still kept up with the Prince: but his confidence was placed elsewhere; and amongst those whom he distinguished with marks of his favour, Sir Spencer Compton held the highest place. Walpole, however, had diligently cultivated the friendship of the Princess of Wales, a woman endowed with an excellent and well cultivated understanding. She saw the great superiority of Sir Robert Walpole, as a statesman, over all his rivals and contemporaries; and she gave him, to the latest period of her life, the fullest and firmest support. Sir Spencer Compton, on the suggestion of the King's gracious intentions in his favour, hesitated at the idea of assuming the lead in a new administration; and, either from timidity or generosity, acknowledged Walpole to be far more competent. Thus, all competition being at an end, the existing administration was continued; and Sir Spencer Compton was created a Peer, under the title of Earl of Wilmington;—being also, after no very long interval, appointed Lord Privy Seal, and then President of the council.

On the meeting of Parliament, the entire produce of the civil list revenues, estimated at 800,000*l.* was, on the motion of Sir Robert Walpole, settled on the King for life, instead of the clear annual revenue of 700,000*l.* granted to the late monarch—not however without some debate and opposition. A resolution, for settling the sum of 100,000*l.* per annum, as a jointure upon the Queen, passed without difficulty.

Parliament was dissolved in August, and a new one was convened in January 1728, of which Arthur Onslow, Esq. was chosen speaker; and which seemed to vie in all expressions of duty and loyalty with the most loyal of its predecessors. The King assured them, in his speech from the throne, of "the absolute necessity of continuing those preparations which had hitherto secured the nation; the execution of the preliminaries recently signed having been retarded by unexpected difficulties, raised chiefly by the obstinate opposition of Spain, although the ratifications had been actually exchanged with the Emperor." The court of Madrid had indeed so far acceded to the articles of pacification as to agree to suspend all further attacks upon Gibraltar; but this was more a measure of compulsion than of choice. The signing of the preliminaries having been delayed, under the idea that the court of Vienna might be induced to adopt more vigorous resolutions, Sir Charles Wager, with the British fleet, continued to cruise on the coasts of Spain till the final disappointment of these hopes incited her to ratify the preliminaries in form at Madrid, February 24, 1728 (O. S.) leaving the accommodation of the remaining difficulties to the future congress. As this was an event by no means previously certain, the Parliament voted the sum of 280,000*l.* for the maintenance of the Hessian and Swedish auxiliaries, and a subsidy of 100,000*l.* payable in four years to the Duke of Wolfenbuttle; who in return took upon him to guarantee by a formal treaty to his Britannic Majesty the possession of his three kingdoms, and to keep in readiness for his service a corps of 5000 men during the same term. This notable alliance occasioned however some severe animadversions; and the House was even prevailed upon, to address the King for a particular, and distinct account of the sum of 250,000*l.* charged in the general statement of national expenditure to have been issued "for preserving and restoring the peace of Europe." His Majesty declined to comply with their request; but informed them, in general terms, that part of the money had been disbursed by his late Majesty, conformably to the powers vested in him by Parliament, and the remainder by himself, for carrying on necessary and important services which required the greatest secresy. This answer the House, upon consideration, thought fit to approve—Sir Robert Walpole affirming it "to be impossible that public services

* A belief was prevalent amongst the courtiers, that had the late King lived to return from Hanover, Lord Bolingbroke would have been declared minister. This nobleman had been admitted to a private audience of the monarch previously to his departure, in which he delivered to him a memorial respecting the state of affairs, from which he had conceived the highest hopes, which were suddenly and totally frustrated by the death of his Majesty.

† The Duke of Newcastle, his colleague, was a man illustrious by his birth, affable and popular in his address, liberal in his sentiments, and magnificent in his expences; but his capacity was very inadequate to his elevated station. Mr. Pelham, secretary at war, and brother to the Duke, was esteemed for his probity, respected for his talents, and beloved for his candour. The Earl of Chesterfield, ambassador at the Hague, and soon afterwards appointed Lord Steward, was at once a man of wit, of pleasure, and of business. John, Duke of Argyle was distinguished beyond all his contemporaries by an uncommon union of civil and military talents. Lord Carteret was, however, the only man connected with this administration of whose abilities or designs the premier could entertain any reasonable jealousy or apprehension. Dignified, and even stately in his deportment, the habitual superiority which he appeared to assume was sustained by an extraordinary energy of genius and extent of knowledge.

should be carried on, considering the great complication of interests on the continent, if every shilling that was expended for the advancement of the common cause, and for maintaining the balance of Europe, was made known to the whole world."

A loan having been negotiated by the board of Treasury with the Bank of England for the sum of 1,700,000*l.* for which certain duties, by right appertaining to the sinking fund, were proposed to be mortgaged, a violent debate arose; and Mr. Pulteney declared, "That by charging new loans upon old and appropriated surpluses the public were grossly deceived; that by these expedients to put off the evil day, taxes would be perpetuated; and that, notwithstanding the great merit assumed by the inventors of this boasted scheme of redemption, the national debt had really increased since the setting up of that pompous project." This peremptory accusation gave rise to the appointment of a select committee; by whose report, it appeared that the sum of 6,480,000*l.* had been issued from Christmas 1716 to Lady-day 1728, towards the discharge of the national debt; and that the new debt contracted during the same interval amounted only to 3,927,000*l.* The surplus of the sinking fund had now increased by the diminution of interest, and the enlargement of commerce, to the sum of 1,200,000*l.* and the King declared his extreme satisfaction in the prospect of seeing the old debts discharged, without any necessity of incurring new ones. On the 28th of May, (1728) the session closed.*

On the 19th of June, the congress was opened at Soissons; where the ministers of the Emperor, France, Spain, Great Britain, Holland, and the northern courts, had assembled. The arts of Cardinal Fleury had by this time effected a reconciliation of the courts of Versailles and Madrid; the jealousy and resentment of the King and Queen of Spain were excited by the ambiguous conduct of the Emperor; and a categorical answer was demanded from his imperial Majesty on the subject of the marriages between Don Carlos and Don Philip with the Archduchesses. Illusory professions only being returned, Spain began in earnest to desire a renewal of her former connections with Great Britain. The differences between the Emperor and the King of England were far from being accommodated. The court of Vienna still espoused the interests of the ducal houses of Holstein and Mecklenburg; and the court of London, in revenge, refused to listen to any proposition of guarantee respecting the pragmatic sanction.†

The Parliament met, January 21, 1729; and the King, in his speech to the two Houses, acknowledged that the present prevailing uncertainty gave him great concern, but expressed his unwillingness precipitately to kindle a new war in Europe. Numerous petitions were presented to Parliament from the great mercantile towns, complaining of the losses and obstructions they had sustained in their trade, through the depredations of the Spaniards in the West Indies; and the House of Commons, in a grand committee, after an investigation of the subject, passed a resolution justificatory of the instructions given to Admiral Hosier to seize the flota and galleons; and another declaring that the Spaniards had violated the treaties subsisting between the two crowns. An address was consequently presented to the King, desiring "That his Majesty would be graciously pleased to use his utmost endeavours to procure just and reasonable satisfaction for these injuries, and for securing to his Majesty's subjects the free exercise of commerce and navigation to and from the British colonies in America;" to which his Majesty expressed his assent. The House of Peers also resolving itself into a committee on the state of the nation, and the letter of the late King to the King of Spain, touching the restitution of Gibraltar, among other state papers being laid before them, a resolution was moved, "that for the honour of his Majesty, and the preservation and security of the trade and commerce of the kingdom, effectual care should be taken in the present treaty that the King of Spain should renounce, in explicit terms, all claim and pretension to Minorca and Gibraltar." After a violent debate, the motion was negatived, but not without a strong protest; and a second motion, "That the House did entirely rely upon his Majesty, that he would, for maintaining the honour and securing the trade of this kingdom, take effectual care in the present treaty to preserve his undoubted right to Gibraltar and Minorca," passed in the affirmative. The Lower House concurring in this motion, a joint address was presented to the throne conformably to its purport.

In the course of the session the sum of 115,000*l.* was voted to the crown, under pretence of arrears due to the civil list; though not without great opposition—no deficiency in the produce of the civil list revenues being proved, or even unequivocally alledged; and a futile provision was made for the repayment of the money at the decease of the sovereign.‡ On the 14th of May, the King terminated the session; after which, he visited his German dominions, leaving the Queen sole Regent; and, during her mild and equitable, though firm and vigilant, administration no cause of discontent or disaffection arose.

At the accession of the present sovereign Lord Carteret had been confirmed in his vice-royalty of Ireland; and, under the administration of this nobleman, peace and order were restored and established; various excellent laws were enacted for the encouragement of manufactures, commerce, and agriculture; and many salutary regulations adopted in the civil departments of government.§

The congress of Soissons continued its sittings. The breach

* In the course of the year arrived in England Frederic Prince of Wales, who, though now in his 22d year, had hitherto resided at Hanover. About the same time died Ernest Augustus, Bishop of Osnaburg, only brother of the late King, and created by him Duke of York; but never resident in England.

† In the month of September, the King of England expresses, in his private correspondence with Lord Townshend, his anxiety "To obtain such a declaration as shall entirely secure the possession of Bremen, and free him from the obligation of an equivalent." In November he writes, "that as there is no likelihood of an accommodation with the Emperor, he thinks it right to be in as great a friendship and intimacy with France as possible."

‡ It is remarkable, that another address being presented to the King by the Commons, desiring to be informed in what manner a large sum, stated to have been expended for restoring the peace of Europe, was disposed of, an answer exactly similar to that returned to the address of the last year on the subject was again hazarded, in which the House had again the complaisance to acquiesce.

§ The following events occurred in the course of this year: Victor Amadeus, King of Sardinia, resigned his crown, after a reign of fifty years, to his son, Charles Emmanuel; and, retiring to the castle of Chamberri, espoused, at the advanced age of sixty-four, the Countess of St. Sebastian; who refused with disdain the title, as she could not participate in the power, of royalty.

In the month of October, died Peter II. czar of Muscovy, after a short reign of two years. He was succeeded by the Princess Anne Iwanowna, Duchess of Courland, second daughter to the czar Iwan, elder brother to Peter the Great. The nobility of the metropolis assembling, previously to her being proclaimed Empress, drew up an instrument of government which greatly limited the imperial power. This the Princess was compelled to sign: but no sooner was she firmly established on the throne than she commanded the paper she had subscribed to be torn in pieces, sending into banishment those who had been most active in promoting the design, and henceforth exercising over the boundless extent of that immense empire the same despotic authority under which Russia had for ages been condemned to suffer.

Early in the following year (1730) died Pope Benedict XIII. and was succeeded by Cardinal Corsini, already near fourscore years of age, who notwithstanding filled the papal chair ten years under the name of Clement XII.

About this time also, a sudden and surprising revolution took place at Constantinople, by the deposition of the grand seignior Achmet III. and the elevation of his nephew, Mahomet V. From the æra of the memorable victory obtained by the illustrious Sobieski under the walls of Vienna, the Ottoman power had suffered a great and rapid decline; and Mahomet IV. who had succeeded when an infant to the throne, on the deposition of his father the Sultan Ibrahim, A. D. 1648, was himself, in consequence of the general rage excited by the misfortunes of that disastrous war, compelled to submit to the same fate. During the short and feeble reigns of his brothers, Soliman II. and Achmet II. the triumphs of the imperialists continued. The reign of the succeeding Emperor, Mustapha II. son of Mahomet IV. was distinguished by the famous battle of Zenta, won by Prince Eugene, and the consequent treaty of Carlowitz. After a reign of seven years, the Sultan Mustapha was, by another revolution, hurled from breach between the courts of London and Vienna seemed rather to increase than diminish. By the sole authority of his imperial Majesty, and the aulic council, the Duke of Mecklenburg had been suspended from the exercise of his government, and the administration of the country assigned to a Prince of the same family; but the King of England, into whose hands the revenues of the duchy had been sequestrated, refused to relinquish his commissorial power; and an imperial rescript was published, peremptorily requiring him to render up his accounts, and to desist from his claims. In June, Lord Townshend, and Count Kinski, the imperial ambassador, held a conference at Hanover, from which they separated with mutual dissatisfaction; and in October following Lord Townshend boasted to the King, "that his measures were so arranged as to facilitate any views his Majesty might have upon any part of the country of Mecklenburg." The courts of London and Madrid being now equally alienated from that of Vienna, it was found by no means a matter of insuperable difficulty for France, to effect an accommodation of differences between them. Colonel Stanhope who had retired from his embassy in Spain, returned thither at the latter end of the summer in order to negotiate this business; and on the 9th of November, a definitive treaty or convention was signed at Seville, consisting of fourteen articles, agreeably to the tenor of which peace and friendship were at length restored to the contending countries.*

This convention, was considered by the Emperor as a flagrant violation of justice; and he filled all Europe —Germany in particular, the diet being then sitting at Ratisbon—with rescripts and remonstrances against the indignity thereby offered to the imperial court and the Germanic body, by the forcible introduction of foreign troops into Italy.

Parliament assembling in January, 1730, the King, in his speech from the throne, declared the peace of Europe to be firmly established by the treaty of Seville, which was built, as he asserted, on the foundation of the quadruple alliance. He affirmed, that Spain had agreed to an ample restitution and reparation for all unlawful seizures and depredations; that the free and uninterrupted exercise of British commerce was fully secured; and that all rights, privileges, and possessions, belonging to him and his allies, were confirmed and solemnly guaranteed. Violent opposition was made to the terms of this treaty when submitted to the investigation of Parliament. Amongst other points, it was affirmed, that the article by which the British merchants were required to make proof of their losses at the court of Madrid was injurious to them, and dishonourable to the nation; and that there was little probability of obtaining that redress, by means of commissaries, which was refused to plenipotentiaries. The opponents complained, that the right of Britain to Gibraltar and Minorca was not formally and explicitly acknowledged; and they disliked the guarantee of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, to Don Carlos and his successors, as a concession which might involve Britain in future quarrels about a country with which we had no concern. By far the most serious objection, however, and that which constituted the chief ground of the high offence taken by the Emperor, was founded upon that article of the treaty by which England not only guaranteed the succession of these duchies to the infant, but engaged to convey a body of Spanish troops to Italy, in order to secure those possessions without waiting for the imperial investiture; which was not only an open and flagrant affront offered to the imperial dignity, but a palpable deviation from the letter of the quadruple alliance, by which neutral troops only were to be admitted till the investitures were granted. So much incensed was the court of Vienna at the insult, more perhaps than the injury, offered in the treaty of Seville, that his imperial Majesty issued an edict, prohibiting the subjects of Great Britain from trading in his dominion; and made great preparations of a warlike nature.

In the course of the session, a warm debate arose in consequence of a bill introduced by the minister to prevent any subjects of Great Britain from advancing money by way of loan to foreign Princes or states, without license first obtained from his Majesty under his privy seal. This bill was ably opposed by Sir John Bernard, one of the representatives of the city of London, as "a measure which would render Holland the mart of money to the nations of the continent. He said that by this general prohibition the English were disabled from assisting their best allies; that the King of Portugal frequently borrowed money of the English merchants residing within his dominions; that the licensing power was liable to dangerous abuse; and that the clause which empowered the Attorney General to compel the discovery on oath of such loans would convert the court of Exchequer into a court of inquisition." In consequence of these arguments the bill was so modified, as to render it much less exceptionable; and it was declared, "that the object of it was merely to prevent the subjects of the state from assisting the enemies of the state. It was well known that at this very time the Emperor was negotiating a loan in the metropolis, and it was manifestly impolitic and absurd to permit individuals to enrich themselves by any mode of traffic detrimental to the general interests of the kingdom."

The annual motion for continuing the Hessian and Wolfenbuttle subsidies, was strongly opposed; but it from his throne, and his brother Achmet III. raised to the same high and dangerous pre-eminence. Involved in a war with the Emperor Charles VI. his armies were repeatedly defeated by Prince Eugene, and the war was terminated, greatly to the disadvantage of the Turks, by a treaty concluded under the mediation of Great Britain at Passarowitz, A. D. 1718. The avarice and oppression of his subsequent government, together with the war carried on negligently and unsuccessfully against the Persians, made the reign of Achmet odious to the people. Recourse being had to a very unusual and dangerous expedient in Turkey, the imposition of a new tax called the bedead, a species of excise very arbitrary in the collection, in order to defray the expence of this war, three janisaries, named Calil, Muslu, and Ali, very obscure men, feeling or fancying themselves particularly aggrieved by it, assembled, in the absence of the grand seignior and grand vizier, then at Scutari, a considerable number of their comrades, in the Atmeidan, where they presented to them a naked sword on which they had themselves sworn, and required of all who engaged with them to swear the death of the grand vizier, the caimacan, and the reis effendi. The aga of the janisaries repairing in haste to the Atmeidan, Calil demanded if he were come to join the brave Mussulmans who were resolved on a reformation in the state, and the punishment of the tyrants? The aga, destitute of force to suppress the revolters, retired in silence; and the sultan, attended by the vizier, returned with precipitation on the first intelligence of this insurrection to Constantinople, where they arrived at midnight. On the following morning, by order of the Emperor, the standard of Mahomet was displayed, but without effect; and the number of revolters continually increasing, the seraglio was on the next day formally invested. Measures being now in preparation to force the gates of the palace, their astonishment was great to see the dead bodies of the proscribed ministers brought out on litters, preceded by an officer of the bostangis, who announced the condescension of the Emperor, and commanded them in his name to separate. The three leaders of the revolt, aware of the danger of their situation, expressed their dissatisfaction at this concession, and, declaring the sultan Achmet unworthy of the throne, boldly exclaimed, that they would have sultan Mahmoud for their sovereign. The name of Mahmoud was repeated with loud acclamations, resounding even to the inmost recesses of the seraglio. Achmet hastily assembling a divan, asked, with a faltering voice, what the rebels had yet to desire; on which an iman replied, "My Lord, thy reign is at an end—thy revolted subjects will no longer have thee for a master—they demand with shouts thy nephew Mahmoud—it is in vain for thee to flatter thyself that they will return to their allegiance." At these words the sultan turned pale, but, soon recovering himself, said, "Why was I not informed of this sooner? Follow me." Immediately he went to the prison of Mahmoud, attended by all the members of the divan; and, having taken that Prince by the hand, "The wheel has turned for you as for me," said he to him, conducting him to the divan chamber: "I resign to you the throne which Mustapha my brother resigned to me:"—after which he returned to the apartment whence he had taken Mahmoud, there to end his life. Thus, in about eighty years four Emperors had been successively dethroned at Constantinople by lawless and popular violence.

* By this treaty, which imported the renewal of all former treaties, Spain virtually and silently relinquished her claim to Gibraltar; and, in return, Great Britain agreed that 6000 of his Catholic Majesty's troops should be immediately introduced into Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, in order to ensure the succession of those duchies to the infant Don Carlos. By the 6th article, commissaries were to be appointed in four months for the final adjustment of all commercial disputes.

was carried by a majority of seventy-one voices. A bill passed by the Commons in the course of this session "for making more effectual the laws in being for disabling persons from being chosen members of Parliament who enjoyed any pension during pleasure, or for any number of years, or any office holden in trust for them," was rejected on the second reading by the Lords.

The East India Company's charter being on the point of expiring, a petition was presented by a number of persons of high mercantile consideration against the renewal of the monopoly. The petitioners offered to redeem the fund or capital stock of the present company, amounting to 3,200,000*l.* in two years, at five different payments; and they proposed not to trade with a joint stock, or in a corporate capacity, but to keep the trade open to all the subjects of Great Britain, upon licence from such proposed new company, upon certain terms and conditions. This important petition was supported by Sir James Bernard and other distinguished commercial characters in the House; notwithstanding which, the charter of the existing company was renewed, and prolonged to the year 1766, on condition of their paying into the Exchequer, by way of fine, the sum of 200,000*l.* and reducing the interest of the money advanced to the public from five to four per cent. which made an annual saving of 32,000*l.* On the 15th of May, the King closed the session with a speech in which very angry mention was made "of those incendiaries, who, by scandalous libels, laboured to alienate the affections of his people, to fill their minds with groundless jealousies and unjust complaints, in dishonour of him and his government, and in defiance of the sense of both Houses of Parliament."*

As soon as the Parliament had risen, Lord Townshend resigned the seals of Secretary of State, which were immediately given to Colonel Stanhope, late ambassador at Madrid, now created Earl of Harrington.

Although the Emperor had the general guarantee of his succession much at heart, he would not say that he would agree to the execution of the treaty of Seville for the sake of that guarantee. On the contrary, rather elated by the inactivity of the allies than depressed by the consideration of their superior power, he had caused a large body of troops to enter the Italian duchies, in order to resist by force the introduction of Spanish garrisons; and a formidable army was stationed on the frontier of the Sardinian territory, with a view to prevent the accession of Savoy to the Bourbon confederacy. Notwithstanding therefore the desire of the Walpoles to effect an accommodation with the Emperor, the conduct of the imperial court made any separate negotiation on the part of the maritime powers extremely hazardous, as they might thereby lose the friendship of France, and even of Spain, without being by any means certain of obtaining that of the Emperor, or of ultimately securing the points in contest. In this situation the court of London, which secretly deprecated the depression of the Austrian power, indicated, and really felt, a disposition to adopt measures of vigorous hostility, in order to put an end to the contest, and force the Emperor into submission; while France, which aimed at the eventual subversion of the Austrian greatness, was slow and reluctant to enter into a war which, it was foreseen, must throw the Emperor into the arms of the maritime powers, who wished for nothing more ardently than a reconciliation with the court of Vienna upon their own terms. From this dilemma Sir Robert Walpole (contrary to the opinion of his brother, Mr. Walpole) determined to relieve himself by a direct and explicit application to the court of Vienna. A secret and important dispatch was sent from Lord Harrington to Mr. Robinson, resident at the imperial court, dated September 25, 1730; a plan or draft of a treaty between the King of Great Britain and the Emperor was in a short time transmitted to Mr. Robinson, conformably to the purport of Lord Harrington's letter; and, after considerable discussion, a treaty was signed, on the 16th of March, 1731. As the Emperor would not condescend to become a party in the convention of Seville, the article of the present treaty—commonly stiled the second treaty of Vienna, though in great measure copied from it—were declared to be merely an extension of the quadruple alliance; and the feudality of Tuscany, Parma, and Placentia, to the empire, was distinctly specified as the only just foundation of the claim of Don Carlos to those duchies. The faith and honour of Great Britain were indeed maintained, by avoiding to insert any condition into this treaty inconsistent with the engagements entered into at Seville; and especially by obtaining the consent of the Emperor to the introduction of the Spanish troops into Italy; but, at the same time, the King of England gave mortal offence to France by assenting to the guarantee of the Austrian succession; and to Spain, by exacting, as an article of the treaty, that no marriages should take place between the Archduchesses Maria Teresa and Marianne, daughters of the Emperor, and the infants Don Carlos and Don Philip, younger sons of his Catholic Majesty.

On the 21st of January, 1731, the Parliament was again convened; and (the new treaty with the court of Vienna not having then been signed) the session was opened by a remarkable speech from the throne, indicating a very extraordinary and alarming situation of affairs. Strong debates ensued; and an amendment to the address was offered, "That his Majesty should be desired not to concur in a war against the Emperor, either in Flanders or upon the Rhine." Another amendment was afterwards proposed, "That the House would support his Majesty's engagements so far as they related to the interest of Great Britain;" and it was urged by the mover of it, "that the act of settlement, by virtue of which his Majesty held the crown of these realms, expressly provided that this nation shall not be obliged to enter into a war for the defence of any dominions not belonging to the crown of Great Britain; and that the House could not therefore, agreeably to this act, go further than the amendment imported." Some explanations, however, being offered, the original address was ultimately carried, without a division.

Complaints were at this time renewed, from all parts, of the depredations and cruelties committed by the Spaniards in the West Indies: and the House of Commons, satisfied of their truth, presented an address to the King, desiring "That his Majesty would be graciously pleased to continue his endeavour to prevent such depredations for the future; to procure full satisfaction for the damages already sustained; and to secure to the British subjects the full and uninterrupted exercise of their trade and navigation to and from the British colonies in America."

At this period, also, a judicious bill was introduced into Parliament, and passed into a law, for preventing delays of justice occasioned by the use of the Latin tongue in proceedings at law, and enacting that all those processes and pleadings should be entered in the English language.†

On the 7th of May, 1731, the session was terminated by a speech, in which his Majesty announced the signature of the treaty with the Emperor. By this treaty

* The allusion was supposed to be chiefly levelled at the periodical papers intituled "The Craftsman," supported by Lord Bolingbroke, Mr. Pulteney, &c. in which the measures of the administration were severely attacked.

† In the debate on the pension bill, now for the second time passed by the Commons and rejected by the Lords, Dr. Sherlock, Bishop of Bangor, gave high offence, by declaring "that an independent House of Commons, or an independent House of Lords, is as inconsistent with our constitution as an independent, that is absolute King; and that a lover of his country will no more desire to see the one than the other." Lord Carteret, who had recently relinquished his government of Ireland to the Duke of Dorset, now openly joining the opposition, defended the principle, and practical operation of this bill, with great eloquence and energy. In consequence of the Bishop of Bangor's invidious opposition of it, a motion was made for leave to bring a bill into the House of Commons, to prevent the translation of Bishops; which—the utmost influence of the court being exerted against it—was negatived.

his imperial Majesty agreed that Spain should take possession of the duchies of Parma and Placentia for the infant Don Carlos, in the mode prescribed by the treaty of Seville; and that the Ostend company, which had given such umbrage to the maritime powers, should be totally dissolved, on condition that England and Holland should become guarantees of the Pragmatic Sanction. The Duke of Parma dying at this juncture, an English fleet under Sir Charles Wager was fitted out, which, having joined the Spanish fleet at Barcelona, convoyed the Spanish troops destined for Italy to Leghorn, Don Carlos himself taking the route of France; when, the imperial forces which had marched into Parma being withdrawn, the infant took peaceable possession of his new territories. Thus was terminated the violent and acrimonious contest, which for the space of ten years had divided the house of Austria from Great Britain, its ancient and faithful ally; and nothing can be more evident, than that the quarrel originated solely in the connection formed by this nation, with the electorate of Hanover, whose interests stood almost constantly and diametrically opposed to those of England.

The treaty of Vienna being concluded without the participation of France, and wholly incompatible with the general tenor of her views, all real amity between the two courts of London and Versailles was now at an end; and a cold exterior civility succeeded to that confidence which had subsisted without interruption for the space of fifteen years. The treaty of Hanover was considered on both sides as virtually renounced by the late treaty of Vienna, to which the States General soon acceded, and which seemed to establish, by the guarantee of the maritime powers, the Pragmatic Sanction, so much the object of French jealousy and aversion, on a firm and solid basis.* The happy effects of the treaty of Vienna were every day more apparent. Cardinal Fleury was of a temper much too pacific to resent seriously the indignity offered to the Gallic nation. Spain was the power which, notwithstanding the accomplishment of her views respecting the Italian duchies, appeared most discontented. Reluctant, to a degree almost of infatuation, to relinquish the hope so long cherished of the advancement of Don Carlos to the eventual possession of the imperial throne, by marriage with the Archduchess Maria Theresa, their Catholic Majesties, previously to the late treaty of Vienna, had sent the Duke of Liria to that court with a view to renew, upon any terms, their former connection with the Emperor.

Sir Robert Walpole seems now to have attained the zenith of his influence, and reputation. The restoration of the ancient connection with the house of Austria was highly pleasing to the English nation; Britain was now on terms of professed and apparent amity with all the great European powers; the navigation and commerce of the kingdom were in a state of rapid and progressive increase; the public finances exhibited evident symptoms of returning vigour; and public credit was fully and firmly established. Under these auspicious circumstances the Parliament was convened (January 13, 1732,) when the King expressed himself in warm terms on the successful measures of his government, and the consequent prosperity of the country. However, when an address was moved by Lord Hervey, in the usual stile of adulation, the indignation of the patriots seemed uncommonly excited; and the whole political system of the court was ably and vigorously attacked. Mr. Shippen moved to leave out the complimentary paragraphs, "and to restrain the address to a general expression of thanks to his Majesty, and of the satisfaction at the establishment of general tranquillity." The most interesting and eloquent speech however, on this occasion, was made by Mr. Pulteney, who declared, "that if we were now right, he was certain that the time had long ago elapsed when we might have been as right with infinitely less expence and trouble." In reply to Mr. Pulteney, Mr. Horace Walpole undertook to demonstrate "the wisdom and rectitude of those measures of administration, so contemptuously derided, and so injuriously arraigned." His speech was no less favourably received by the majority of the House than the harangue formerly made by this minister in vindication of the treaty of Hanover; and the address, as originally moved, was presented to his Majesty, who declared in reply, "that he had no doubt of the continuance of the affection and confidence of the House, and that they should ever find his views tending to the honour, interest, and security, of his crown and people."

A grand effort was now thought adviseable by the opposition, or the country party, as they were generally stiled, to effect a reduction of the standing army. It was argued, "that a standing military force in time of peace had, previously to the æra of the revolution, always been accounted not only superfluous, but unconstitutional and dangerous; that the internal tranquillity of the country might be secured, as heretofore it had been, by the civil power aided by the militia, which, under proper regulation, was as capable of discipline, and as active in exertion, as a standing army; that the number of mal-contents was altogether contemptible; but that the most effectual means of increasing it, was the obstinate perseverance in measures odious and arbitrary; that, though they had all imaginable confidence in his Majesty's regard for the liberty of his subjects, should a standing army be ingrafted into the constitution, another Prince might arise of more dangerous talents and of deeper designs, and employ it for the worst purposes of ambition: that other nations had been enslaved by standing armies; and though the officers were at present men of honour and probity, these might be easily discarded, and the army new-modelled, in order to effect the subversion of the constitution. The expence of this great military force was also insisted upon as extremely burdensome and oppressive to the nation; and it was asserted, that the money raised for the subsistence of 18 or 20,000 men in England would maintain 60,000 French or Germans. Previously to the revolution, it was well known that the people of England did not raise above two millions for the whole of the public charge; but now the current expence far exceeded that sum, and the civil list, the interest due to the public creditors, and the sinking fund, added together, composed a burden of six millions yearly; and though at so recent a period as the accession of the late King the army did not exceed 6000 men, it was augmented, on various pretences to more than three times that number; and further pretences would never be wanting, were Parliament willing to listen to them, for further augmentation." These arguments, however, proved wholly fruitless and unavailing; and, such was the offence given by Mr. Pulteney, by the zealous part he took in this and other political questions at this period, that the King, calling for the council book, with his own hand struck out his name from the list of privy councillors.

At this period Sir Robert Walpole had formed a project, for effecting a radical alteration in the national system of taxation. The principal branches of the revenue might at this time be divided into port-duties or customs—duties of excise—and taxes levied on immoveable property, such as the duties on land, houses, hearths and windows. The latter description of duties the minister considered as of a nature highly oppressive, partial, and inequitable; the various taxes on consumable commodities, to which every citizen contributes in an exact proportion to his consumption; and which, being included in the price of the commodity, are easily and insensibly paid; constituting, in his opinion, the most eligible mode of raising the supplies necessary for the public service. He was also aware of the gross frauds daily practised in the collection of the customs; which, from their very nature, and the extreme facility of committing them, he had no hope to remedy. He thought, therefore, that to convert the greater part of the customs into duties of excise would be equally advantageous to the government and to the fair trader; and that the laws of excise might be so meliorated, that, notwithstanding the odium generally attached to them, no just ground of complaint should remain. With a view, therefore, to an essential change in the first species of taxation, and to the eventual annihilation of the last, he brought into the House, in the month of February, 1732, a bill for the revival of the salt-duties, which had been repealed some years back, as a substitute for one shilling in the pound of the land tax; and if this proposal met the approbation of the House, he signified his intention—the land tax being at this time two shillings only in the pound—altogether to abolish that tax in the course of the ensuing session; in which he declared he should rejoice, as the annihilation of a most grievous and intolerable burden. "The duty on salt," he said, "affected, it was true, all classes of citizens, the poor as well as the rich; but the burden of this tax being so equally and generally diffused, the sum contributed by the lower classes of the people would be found, on computation, so trifling, as scarcely to deserve the mention. This tax, while it existed, was never the subject of complaint; and, when it was repealed, no one seemed to think himself benefitted. He knew," he said, "the reproaches he had to expect on this occasion; but he had been long accustomed to be affronted and insulted, both within the walls of that place and without: and while he knew his intentions to be upright, and his only aim to serve his country to the best of his knowledge and the utmost of his power, he should continue to disregard those reflections which he was conscious he did not deserve." After very obstinate debates, the bill passed by 207 voices against 135. During the present session, the pension bill was a third time passed by the Commons, and rejected by the Lords.

* During the autumn, England was visited by the Duke of Lorraine, a young Prince of great merit and accomplishments, whom his imperial Majesty had secretly fixed upon as the future consort of the eldest Archduchess Maria Theresa, the sole heiress of his vast dominions. After being entertained with all possible demonstrations of regard, he returned to the continent in December.

On the 1st of June, the King terminated the session, informing the Parliament of the formal accession of the States General to the treaty of Vienna; and declaring his intention of visiting his electoral dominions; and of leaving the Queen, as before, sole Regent during his absence. On his arrival in Germany, he had the satisfaction to receive the investitures of the duchies of Bremen and Verden, so long solicited, and so long delayed.*

A royal charter was at this time granted for the settlement of a new colony to the southward of the Carolinas, to which the name of Georgia was given; and General Oglethorpe, a man distinguished for the activity and ardour of his benevolence, was appointed governor. He embarked at Greenwich, with a number of families, who founded a town called Savannah, on the river of that name. This enterprise excited the jealousy and apprehension of the Spaniards; and as it was difficult, or rather impossible, to ascertain the precise limits of the English colony of Georgia and the Spanish settlement of Florida, a foundation of future dispute and contention between the two nations was unavoidably laid. Previously to the final decision of government respecting this measure, seven chiefs of the Cherokee and other southern Indian tribes were conveyed to England; and being introduced to the King, surrendered, by a formal deed, in the name of their countrymen, all right of property and dominion in the lands now about to be occupied by the new colonists; and in amazement at the riches and magnificence of the British court, they are said to have laid their crowns and ensigns of dignity at the King's feet, requesting to be received in the number of his subjects.

Whilst the King remained at Hanover, the decree of the Pragmatic Sanction was, chiefly through his influence, ratified and confirmed by the diet of the empire, assembled at Ratisbon, notwithstanding the opposition of the Electors of Saxony, Bavaria, and the Palatinate. His imperial Majesty, on the other hand, demonstrated his regard for the King of England by interposing, at his request, in behalf of the Protestant inhabitants of the Archbishopric of Saltzburg, where religious persecution raged in all its fury, and in direct contravention of the treaty of Westphalia. A great number of these wretched victims, abandoning their native homes, took refuge in England; and a Parliamentary provision being made for their subsistence, the greater part of them crossed the Atlantic Ocean, and joined the new settlers in Georgia.†

Parliament was convened at the commencement of the year 1733, when a motion was framed and approved for an address to the King, to know what satisfaction had been made by Spain for the depredations committed on the British merchants: to which the King replied, "that the meetings of the commissaries of the two crowns had been delayed by unforeseen accidents, and that a perfect account of their proceedings could not as yet be laid before the House of Commons."‡ No real progress, however, had been made towards the settlement of these disputes.§

Much attention was at this period excited by the revival of an important commercial bill, which had been introduced the preceding session, and passed by the House of Commons, though lost in its progress through that of the Lords. It was intituled "A bill for the better securing and encouraging the trade of his Majesty's sugar colonies in America." The object of this bill was to annihilate the commercial intercourse which, since the treaty of Utrecht, had been carried on with great advantage between the northern colonies of America and the French West India islands: which, in return for the corn, timber, and cattle of New England, made large returns of their rums, sugars, and molasses, to the prejudice of the British islands. By

* During this summer Victor Amadeus, the abdicated monarch of Sardinia, was discovered to be deeply engaged, at the instigation of his wife the Marchioness of St. Sebastian, in intrigues for the resumption of the crown—upon which his person was seized, by order of his son the reigning King, and conveyed to Rivoli; and the Marchioness was committed close prisoner to the castle of Seva.

† At this time, Spain, having a considerable naval and military force ready for action, which had been originally raised in expectation of a war with the Emperor, conceived it to be a favourable opportunity to attempt the recovery of the city of Oran on the coast of Barbary; which, after having been possessed by that nation for 200 years, had been captured by the Moors during the war of the succession. They accordingly landed 25,000 men, under the command of the Count de Montemar, near the place, and both the city of Oran and the strong castle of Mazalquiver, in its vicinity, were, in consternation, evacuated by the infidels. Collecting in great force, however, they attacked the Spaniards in their turn with the utmost fury; but were finally repulsed with much slaughter. The Spanish General, after putting garrisons into the conquered fortresses, returned in triumph to Spain.

‡ Early in this year, died the celebrated Viscount Torrington, immortalised by his victory over the Spanish fleet off Messina. He had been for several years at the head of the Admiralty department, and was now succeeded by Sir Charles Wager, an officer of long experience and great professional ability.

§ On the 18th of January, 1732, a cedula was signed by the King of Spain at Seville, directed to the governors of the Spanish ports in the West Indies, in general and evasive terms "prohibiting all unjust seizures of English merchant ships navigating the American seas—so long as they keep in their proper distances, and are not concerned in any illicit trade; and commanding restitution to be made of vessels and cargoes unlawfully confiscated." Mr. Keene, on the 8th of February following, signed a declaration in the name of the King of Great Britain, engaging "that his Britannic Majesty's ships of war shall on no pretext whatever convoy or protect ships carrying on an unlawful trade with the states belonging to his Catholic Majesty." The general effect of these reciprocal declarations was to constitute Spain sole judge of the doubtful and difficult questions in dispute, through the medium of the decisions pronounced in her courts of Admiralty, to restrain and enervate the exertions of the British naval commanders in the West Indies, and to encourage the Spaniards in the continued practice of their bold and insolent depredations. A particular instance was produced by Mr. Pulteney, in the course of the debate which arose on the motion now made, in which a Spanish ship was seized by a Captain of a British man of war in the West Indies, in requital of an unjust seizure of a British trading vessel. Orders for reciprocal restitution being subsequently issued by the two courts, the Spanish ship was accordingly delivered up; but, notwithstanding the peremptory orders of the court of Madrid, the Spanish governor, on various futile pretences, as the minister himself acknowledged, refused compliance. From the general tenor and spirit of the negotiation, the court of Spain could not fail to perceive how little the court and ministry of Great Britain were in earnest in this business.

the proposed bill, which at length passed into an act, heavy duties were imposed on all foreign rums, sugars, and molasses, imported into the American colonies. This act was remarkable, as the first instance in which an actual and express taxation of America was attempted by the British Parliament.

On the motion relative to the army estimates, in the committee of supply, which differed not materially from those of the last year, a violent debate arose; and the arguments formerly urged were again repeated and anew enforced. Mr. Horace Walpole, in reply, hesitated not to assert, "That the number of troops then proposed was absolutely necessary to support his Majesty's government, and would be necessary so long as the nation enjoyed the happiness of having the present illustrious family on the throne."* On a division, the motion was carried by 239 votes against 171. In deliberating upon the supplies to be granted for the ensuing year, Sir Robert Walpole moved that the sum of 500,000*l.* should be issued out of the sinking fund for current services. Between the years 1727 and 1732, various new loans had been made, the interests of which were charged upon different surplusses originally appertaining to the sinking fund, the operations of which were in consequence proportionably weakened; but this being the first open and direct attack upon it, produced a very animated and indignant remonstrance from the patriotic party. Sir William Wyndham acknowledged, "that he had never been without apprehension that violence might be offered to this fund by an enterprising minister, in case of exigency, and in a time of war; but to see attempts made upon it in a season of perfect tranquillity was what he never expected." No impression, however, could be made upon the purpose of the minister; the measure received without difficulty the sanction of the House of Commons; and though, in the Lords, it was again attacked, it finally received the royal assent.†

In pursuance of his grand plan of revenue reform before mentioned, the minister now brought forward his famous bill for subjecting the duties on wine and tobacco to the laws of excise; but, on moving his primary resolution, "that the duties on tobacco do from the 24th of January 1733, cease and determine," 205 members divided against it—the majority, in a house of 471 members, being only 61. A prodigious clamour, instigated in a great degree by those persons whose fraudulent practices this plan was intended to counteract, was artfully and industriously raised against the bill; and Sir Robert Walpole persisting to urge this favourite project with unusual heat and passion—applying the contumelious expression of "sturdy beggars" to the merchants who attended in the lobby of the House of Commons with petitions against the bill—the public discontent was heightened into rage. The avenues to Westminster-hall were occupied by immense crowds of people; and the persons of those members who voted in favour of the bill were grossly insulted, and even their lives endangered. At length Sir Robert Walpole thought proper to move that the second reading of the bill might be postponed to a distant day. The defeat of the scheme was celebrated with general rejoicings; and the minister was burned in effigy and loaded with execrations.

The pension bill, passed for the fourth time, in four successive years, by the House of Commons, was for the fourth time thrown out by the House of Peers. On the 11th of June, the King closed the session with a speech, in which severe notice was taken of "the wicked endeavours that had been lately used to inflame the minds of the people, by the most unjust representations."‡

* Mr. Shippen remarked upon this assertion, "That the question seemed at length to have taken a new turn; for, in former debates, the continuance of the army for one year only had been contended for; but now the mask was thrown off, and the House was given to understand that it was intended to be perpetual. This he would not believe could come from his Majesty. His Majesty knew how much the nation was loaded with debts and taxes, and how 'inconsistent it was with our constitution to keep up a standing army in time of peace.'" Mr. Shippen, being called vehemently to order for these last words, declared himself "peculiarly unfortunate; for that, in a former Parliament, he had incurred the severe displeasure and censure of that House, for asserting that the late monarch was unacquainted with the constitution; and he now gave high offence, by declaring that his present Majesty was not unacquainted with the constitution."

† The practice of alienating the sinking fund having once been assented to by Parliament, was continued without intermission: in the succeeding year, 1,200,000*l.* or the whole produce of the fund for the year, was taken from it; and in 1735 and 1736 it was anticipated and mortgaged.

‡ Augustus, King of Poland and Elector of Saxony, died in the month of January, this year. The candidates for the vacant crown were, Augustus son to the late King, and Stanislaus, whom Charles XII. had elevated to the throne, which, on the decline of that monarch's fortune, he had been compelled to relinquish. Louis XV. King of France, having married the daughter of Stanislaus, supported the pretensions of this Prince with all his power; and the Polish primate, and a majority of the diet, having been gained over by the intrigues of the French ambassador, proceeded to the election, and Stanislaus was unanimously chosen King at Warsaw, September, 1733, and proclaimed with loud acclamations. The imperial courts of Vienna and St. Petersburgh, however, espoused with warmth the interests of the house of Saxony; and protesting by their respective ministers against the election of Stanislaus as null and void, an army of Austrians was assembled on the frontier of Silesia; and 50,000 Russians under General Lasci actually entered Poland, on the side of Lithuania. Being quickly joined by a body of Saxons and Poles of the electoral party, the Elector of Saxony was proclaimed King of Poland by the Bishop of Cracow, and crowned on the 17th of January, 1734. Stanislaus, finding himself wholly unable to resist so great a force, abandoned Warsaw, to his rival, and retired to Dantzic, where he was pursued and closely besieged by the Russians and Saxons. This Prince, however, found means to escape, previously to the surrender of the city, which was followed by a general submission to the authority of Augustus, and a general amnesty was in return granted to the partisans of Stanislaus. Though the court of Versailles failed in their grand object in Poland—in order to be fully avenged upon the Emperor, who had been the principal obstacle to its accomplishment, and whose dominions lay much more open to attack than Russia—the Duke of Berwick received orders to pass the Rhine at the head of a numerous army in October, and Fort Kehl was in a short time compelled to capitulate. The winter months having passed over, he renewed his operations with great vigour. After the reduction of Traerbach, the Duke invested the important town of Philipsburg, and, visiting the trenches, was killed on the 12th of June, 1734, by a cannon ball, leaving behind him a high reputation for valour and military skill. The French General had been opposed, during the whole of this campaign, by the celebrated Prince Eugene, now far advanced in years, in a state of languishment and infirmity, and retaining little resemblance of the hero of Blenheim and Belgrade. Notwithstanding the loss sustained by the French in the death of their commander, Philipsburg was obliged, after a brave defence, to surrender, though upon the most honourable terms. During these transactions the French King had concluded a treaty with Spain and Sardinia, in conformity to which those powers declared war against the Emperor; and the Marechal duc de Villars, the ancient rival of Marlborough and Eugene, was prevailed upon to take the command of the French army in Italy; which, being joined by the forces of Savoy, expelled the imperialists from the Milanese. He survived, however, but a short time the fatigues of the campaign, in which he fully sustained the glory of his name and nation, dying at Turin early in the ensuing spring, at the age of eighty. After the death of this great man, the command devolved upon the Marechal de Coigne; between whom and the imperial generals, the Count de Merci and Marechal Koningseg, various fierce and bloody but indecisive encounters took place. Whilst the Austrians were thus driven from the Milanese, and with difficulty maintained their ground in the Mantuan, the Neapolitan nobility, irritated and oppressed under the government of the Count de Visconti, the imperial viceroy, joined in an invitation to Don Carlos, the infant Duke of Parma, to attempt an invasion of that kingdom. He accordingly entered the Neapolitan territories at the head of a considerable army, and was received in the metropolis with loud acclamations, as the national deliverer. The Count de Visconti, having retreated into Apulia, was followed thither by the Spanish General, the Count de Montemar; who, attacking the Austrians at Bitonto, May 25, 1734, gained a most complete victory. Don Carlos, being now proclaimed and acknowledged King of Naples, immediately determined upon the reduction of Sicily; and the Count de Montemar, landing in that island in the month of August, proceeded with great rapidity in his conquests, the natives displaying every where a disposition rather to assist than to oppose the progress of his arms; and on the arrival of Don Carlos in person, the imperialists were compelled finally to evacuate the island. The Emperor, finding himself unable to cope with his adversaries, applied for succour to his powerful ally, the Czarina, who immediately ordered a body of thirty thousand men to march to his assistance. Before they could arrive at the scene of action, however, a general armistice, both in Italy and upon the Rhine, took place, which was soon followed by a defensive treaty of peace, concluded early in the year 1736, on the terms proposed by the maritime powers; agreeably to which, Naples and Sicily were yielded to the infant Don Carlos; and Parma and Placentia, the patrimonial possessions of the infant, were ceded to the house of Austria, to whom also the other conquests of the allies in Italy and Germany were restored, and France acceded to the guarantee of the Pragmatic Sanction. The reversion of the grand duchy

The session of 1734 was distinguished by a vigorous effort to repeal the act for septennial Parliaments—as a flagrant encroachment upon the rights of the people—as having a dangerous tendency to increase the influence of the crown—and as being actually productive of very pernicious effects.* The motion, however, was negatived on a division, by 247 against 184.

About this time, the Duke of Bolton and Lord Cobham having been arbitrarily divested of their military commissions, on account of their Parliamentary opposition to the measures of the court, a very dangerous motion was made by Lord Morpeth, eldest son of the Earl of Carlisle, for leave to bring in a bill for securing the constitution, by preventing the removal of officers not above the rank of Colonel, otherwise than by judgment of a court-martial, or by an address of either House of Parliament. The court, alarmed in the highest degree by this motion, exerted the whole force of ministerial ability and eloquence in the House of Commons, in order to defeat it;† and, the question, being put, it was negatived, without a division.—A more moderate motion was then made by Mr. Sandys, "for presenting an humble address to his Majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to inform the House by whose advice it was that his Majesty was pleased to discharge his Grace Charles Duke of Bolton and the Right Honourable Lord Viscount Cobham from the regiments lately under their command, and what offences were alledged against them as the occasion of their dismission." On this occasion, the minister contented himself with calling for the question; and on a division the motion was negatived by 252 against 193.‡

A very important bill, which had several times been proposed and rejected, was now revived by Mr. Sandys, intituled, "A Bill for securing the freedom of Parliament, by limiting the number of officers, civil and military, in the House of Commons." The motion, however plausible, was negatived by 257 against 169.§

A large addition to the naval force of the nation had, in the early part of the session, been unanimously voted; yet, on the 28th of March, a prorogation being almost daily expected, a message was delivered by Sir Robert Walpole from the crown, acknowledging "the zeal and affection shown by the Parliament, and desiring that his Majesty might be enabled, during the recess or interval of Parliaments, to make good such engagements with foreign powers as honour, justice, and prudence, may call upon him to fulfil or contract, and such augmentation of his forces by sea and land as might be necessary for the honour and defence of his kingdoms, and as the exigency of affairs may require, the war on the continent still unhappily continuing." On this occasion, strong opposition was again evinced; and the debate was unusually prolonged by a succession of very able speeches; but the motion for the address was ultimately carried by 248 voices against 147. —On the 16th of April the King put an end to the session by a speech, in which he declared, that "he should think himself inexcusable if he parted with this Parliament without doing them the justice to acknowledge the many signal proofs they had given, through the duchy of Tuscany, now formally relinquished by Spain, was conferred as a fief of the empire, at the demise of the grand Duke, last of the illustrious house of Medicis, upon the Duke of Lorraine, who was destined for the future husband of the eldest Archduchess Maria Theresa, a Princess distinguished for her personal and mental accomplishments, and sole heiress, under the Pragmatic Sanction, of the vast dominions of the house of Austria. The Elector of Saxony was acknowledged as King of Poland, and the duchy of Lorraine was ceded to Stanislaus—who was permitted to retain the title of King,—and, after the death of the titular monarch, to be for ever united to the crown of France, which thus made, under the unambitious and pacific administration of Cardinal Fleury, an acquisition of superior importance and value than any which had resulted from the most splendid successes of Richelieu, Mazarine, or Louvois. The King of Sardinia was gratified by the cession of some small districts of the Milanese; which is said to have been compared, by one of the ancestors of this monarch, to an artichoke, which, from its magnitude not being digestible at once, must be devoured leaf by leaf.

* The opposition being challenged to adduce a single instance in which the interests of the nation had been injured by the operation of this bill, or by any undue exercise of the royal prerogative as connected with it, Sir William Wyndham observed, "that it was reasonable and just to argue against the continuance of a bill of this nature, not merely from what had happened, but from what might happen. Let us suppose then (said he) a man of mean fortune and obscure origin, abandoned to all notions of virtue and honour, and pursuing no object but his own aggrandisement, raised by the caprice of fortune to the station of first minister: let us suppose him palpably deficient in the knowledge of the interest of his country; and employing, in all transactions with foreign powers, men still more ignorant than himself: let us suppose the honour of the nation tarnished, her political consequence lost, her commerce insulted, her merchants plundered, her seamen perishing in the depths of dungeons—and all these circumstances palliated or overlooked, lest his administration should be endangered: suppose him possessed of immense wealth, the spoils of an impoverished nation; and suppose this wealth employed to purchase seats in the national senate for his confidential friends and favourites:—In such a Parliament, suppose all attempts to inquire into his conduct constantly over-ruled by a corrupt majority, who are rewarded for their treachery to the public by a profuse distribution of pensions, posts, and places under the minister: let us suppose this minister insolently domineering over all men of sense, figure, and fortune, in the nation; and, having no virtuous principle of his own, ridiculing it in others, and endeavouring to destroy or contaminate it in all:—With such a minister, and such a Parliament, let us suppose a Prince upon the throne—uninformed, and unacquainted either with the interests or inclinations of his people—weak, capricious, and actuated at once by the passions of ambition and avarice:—should such a case ever occur, could any greater curse happen to a nation, than such a Prince, advised by such a minister, and that minister supported by such a Parliament? The existence of such a Prince, and such a minister, no human laws may indeed be adequate to prevent; but the existence of such a Parliament may and ought to be prevented; and the repeal of the law in question I conceive to be a most obvious, necessary, and indispensable means for the accomplishment of that purpose."

† It was urged, "That the great danger to be guarded against in all armies is the raising them to a state of independency. The most important of all restraints on the military in this country is the prerogative vested in the crown, of displacing officers on suspicion, or even at pleasure: but should this power once be transferred to the army, a time may come, nor may the period be far distant, when the whole of our constitution shall be at its mercy. At present, the army itself depends upon the King and Parliament for its very duration and existence. But, give the officers a permanent interest in their commissions, by the adoption of a measure which would convert them as it were into freeholds, and the King and Parliament would soon find themselves dependent upon the army. By this bill a door would be opened for the uncontrolled and uncontrollable commission of every species of military licence and oppression. And should a reduction of the army at any future period be determined upon, is it to be imagined that these military chieftains, with swords in their hands, would contentedly lay them down, and retire to their respective homes, at the requisition of the civil power? No: they would exclaim, where are our accusers? We are by law amenable to our own courts martial only, and to them alone we will submit." The minister remarked, "that the two noblemen lately removed were succeeded by others—the Duke of Argyle and Lord Pembroke—in no respect inferior. And should the motion pass into a law, the government of England would have an irresistible tendency to a stratocracy, or a military constitution. Supposing," said he, "the charges so often urged by the zealous partisans of this motion against a late celebrated general to be well founded—that he cherished views of ambition, contrary to the spirit of the constitution—that he aspired to perpetuate his authority, and to rise above all controuling, by obtaining a commission constituting him general for life—how would the existence of a law such as is now recommended have facilitated the success of those daring projects! And how would such a motion have been received by the gentlemen who now urge it as equitable and wise, had it been brought forward under the auspices of the Duke of Marlborough? And what should induce us to believe that measure to be now beneficial which would then have been universally reprobated as pernicious and unconstitutional?"

‡ The same day on which Lord Morpeth made his motion, in the House of Commons, the Duke of Marlborough presented a bill of similar import to the House of Lords. The debate which ensued was rendered memorable by the eloquent speeches of the Lords Chesterfield and Scarborough, the former—who had recently resigned his post of Lord Steward—in support of, the latter in opposition to the bill. These two noblemen, who ranked amongst the most distinguished ornaments of the English court, had long maintained a mutual and inviolable friendship. Lord Scarborough, thinking it necessary to take a decided part in opposition to the bill, previously resigned his place of Master of the Horse, lest, by an injurious imputation, he should be supposed actuated by any interested motive. Not satisfied with the negative put upon the motion for the second reading of the bill, he urged the rejection of it by the House, which was agreed to without a division.

§ The minister contended, "That the constitution was already sufficiently secured, by the provision which orders a re-election when a member accepts of a place; that to disable any gentleman or citizen from sitting in Parliament merely because he has the honour to serve the crown, was really taking from the people their inherent right of choosing such representatives as they deemed best qualified to exercise the functions of their delegation; and that the state would be divided by it into factions, those acting under the executive power not coalescing with, but constituting a formidable phalanx against, those who composed the legislative; and that it argued an hostile distrust of the crown not compatible with the genius of the constitution."

course of seven years, of their duty, fidelity, and attachment to his person and government, and their constant regard to the true interest of their country." The Parliament, having now sat nearly the full term prescribed by the septennial act, was dissolved on April 18, 1734.*

The new Parliament, which assembled in January, 1735, soon discovered a disposition to support the measures of the administration. The King, in his speech, expressed "his concern at the present commotions on the Continent; and though he had hitherto resisted the pressing solicitations of the court of Vienna for aid in this war, he hoped that his good subjects would not repine at the necessary means of placing him in a situation to act that part which might eventually be incumbent upon him." The House, in a grand committee of supply, voted, in consequence of this suggestion, near 60,000 men for the sea and land-service of the year; though not without vehement opposition. A clause being inserted in the address, assuring his Majesty "that this House will cheerfully and effectually raise such supplies as shall be necessary for the honor and security of his Majesty and these kingdoms"—it was moved that the following words be added, "so soon as the proper information of the state of public affairs should be communicated to this House, and in proportion to such efforts as shall be made by such of the allies who are under the same engagements as this nation, and who are not involved in the war." On the division the amendment was rejected, by 265 votes against 185. Mr. Horace Walpole, however, was not discouraged, from almost immediately moving for a subsidy to Denmark, pursuant to a treaty entered into by his Majesty, with the King of Denmark for that purpose; and which originated, according to the allegations of the mover, in a just and proper regard to the preservation of the balance of power in Europe,† an expression so incessantly in the mouth of this minister, that he was commonly known under the ludicrous appellation of Balance-master. The leaders of opposition treated the motion with indignant contempt; and, though it was carried, 178 members gave their voices against it. The session closing in May, the King thanked his faithful Commons for the supplies they had granted with such cheerfulness and dispatch; and immediately after the prorogation he embarked for the Continent, leaving the Queen sole Regent.‡

The Parliament again met, January 15, 1736. The King mentioned the unhappy turn which the affairs of Europe had taken, observing that a plan of pacification had been proposed by England in conjunction with the States-General, and that the Emperor and France had separately concerted the preliminaries for obtaining that end. On this occasion the addresses in both Houses were carried without a division; the wisdom of the measures adopted by the ministry, and the beneficial result of them, being such as to silence all opposition.§

This session was distinguished chiefly by a motion made in the House of Commons, (March) for the repeal of those clauses in the test act which barred or obstructed the admission of the Protestant Dissenters to civil employments. This motion, though ably supported, seems to have been somewhat unadvised and unseasonable—as being brought forward not merely without the concurrence, but contrary to the inclination of the court, and at a juncture in no respect favourable to its success. It was, consequently, rejected by a great majority. The motion was, by injudicious perseverance, revived in a subsequent session of the Parliament, when it was again negatived. It is remarkable, however, that no considerable or lasting resentment appears to have been excited in the breasts of the dissenters‖ in consequence of this disappointment, so well was it understood

* In the spring of this year the marriage of the Princess Royal with the Prince of Orange was celebrated with great magnificence and public rejoicings; and the Parliament, as a testimony of their entire approbation of this alliance, voted the sum of 80,000l. as a portion to the Princess, and an annuity for life of 5000l. payable out of the civil list. His serene highness the Prince is thus described, in a letter to Lord Townshend, Secretary of State, from the Earl of Chesterfield, ambassador at the Hague.—"The Prince of Orange has extreme good parts; is perfectly well-bred; with an ease and freedom that is seldom acquired but by a long knowledge of the world. The acclamations of the people are loud and universal. He assumes not the least dignity, but has all the affability and insinuation that is necessary for a person who would raise himself in a popular government."

† By this treaty, eighty crowns were allowed for each horseman, and thirty for every foot soldier; and one half to be paid immediately on signing the treaty, and the remainder when the troops shall be delivered. Besides this, his Majesty the King of Great Britain engages to pay to his Majesty the King of Denmark the annual sum of 250,000 crowns banco, till such time as the said troops shall be taken into full pay, and the sum of 150,000 crowns yearly afterwards.

‡ A strict amity had some time subsisted between the two courts of Madrid and Lisbon, which was, in the year 1728, cemented by a double marriage of the royal families—the Prince of Asturias espousing the eldest Princess of Portugal, and the Prince of Brazil the Infanta of Spain, formerly affianced to Lewis XV. King of France. In the course of this year, however, the good understanding between them was interrupted by a frivolous dispute, originating in a real or pretended violation of the privileges of the ambassador of Portugal resident at Madrid. The quarrel ran so high, that the ministers of the two crowns were recalled, and warlike preparations made on each side. The King of Portugal, conscious of his inability to encounter the power of Spain, nominated an ambassador extraordinary to the court of London, to solicit the aid and protection of his ally the King of England. By the efficacious assistance of England, the independency of Portugal and the rights of the ducal and royal house of Braganza had been ultimately established, after a contest of twenty-eight years; and as a just compensation for this great service, very important commercial privileges were conceded to the English nation by the crown of Portugal. Thus the interests of that kingdom became inseparably connected with those of Great Britain. Don Pedro, who succeeded to the throne on the deposition of his brother Alphonso, died A. D. 1706, after a reign of thirty years. His son, Don Juan, faithfully adhered to the political engagements entered into by his father as a party in the grand alliance against the House of Bourbon: but after the conclusion of the treaty of Utrecht, the court of Lisbon had cautiously avoided involving herself in the various contentions of the European powers. Upon the present occasion, the court of London adopted, without hesitation, measures the most vigorous and decisive. A powerful fleet, under the command of Sir John Norris, sailed for the Tagus (June 1735,) in order to protect the coasts and the commerce of Portugal; and particularly to convoy the Brazil fleet, then shortly expected richly laden, in safety to Lisbon. The British envoy at Madrid, was expressly commanded to communicate to his Catholic Majesty the resolution of the King of England to grant effectual succours to his ally. Notwithstanding some angry complaints on the part of Spain, this interposition completely answered the purpose intended by it; and an accommodation took place between the courts of Spain and Portugal before the conclusion of the year.

§ In August 1735, the English ambassador at Paris, Lord Waldegrave, held a secret and confidential conference with Cardinal Fleury on the subject of peace; and Tuscany being mentioned, the Cardinal declared, peremptorily, that the Emperor could not have it. Lord Waldegrave then proposed the ultimatum of the maritime powers; viz. the exchange of that duchy for Lorraine. His eminence immediately owned it was the only thing that could satisfy the French nation. A good understanding being thus established between the courts of London and Versailles, and the court of Vienna having now had time to cool, Mr. Robinson was ordered to propose to the imperial ministers the alternative of this plan, or that of the marriage of Don Carlos with an archduchess. To the latter they manifested a fixed and insuperable aversion; but to the former they hastened with secret complacency. The Emperor condescended to intimate to Mr. Robinson the possibility of his acceding to this proposition; but, still irritated at the failure of his lofty expectations, he determined that England should not have the honour of mediating the peace. A direct negotiation was therefore set on foot with the court of Versailles; and in November Mr. Robinson received from Prince Eugene a project of articles, as agreed upon by the two courts, to which the assent of the maritime powers was requested. The court of London, little solicitous as to the mode of reconciliation, signifying her concurrence in the plan, preliminaries of peace were signed by all the belligerent powers early in the following year, 1736—not however without extreme reluctance and chagrin on the part of Spain. His Sardinian Majesty conformably to the policy of the house of Savoy, although his forces were acting in concert with those of France and Spain hesitated not in a letter to the King of England, to avow his purpose of joining the maritime powers in any measures of hostility necessary to prevent the Spanish branch of the house of Bourbon from effecting the expulsion of the Emperor from Lombardy; knowing, as he said, that he himself should be the next sacrifice.

‖ About this time a new sect of religionists arose, distinguished by the appellation of Methodists, who soon appeared to be divided into two distinct classes under their respective leaders, Whitfield and Wesley—priests of the English church, regularly educated and ordained—the first of them adopting the Calvinistic, the latter the Arminian dogmas in theology; corresponding in this respect to the sects of Jansenists and Molinists in the Gallican church. Professing still to adhere to the communion of the church of England, of which they boasted themselves to be the only true and genuine members, they preached in the fields to vast multitudes—suffered with patience every insult and outrage—and persisted at the extreme peril of their lives, in derstood that the King was himself strongly disposed to favour the repeal, and that the minister was actuated by motives, not of animosity, but of an urgent and over-ruling political necessity.

In this session, the Parliament repealed the ancient statutes against conjuration and witchcraft, thereby relieving the English judicial code from a portion of that absurdity, and oppression, by which, in the darkness of past ages, it had been so dreadfully disgraced.

Whilst the King was in Germany, the quiet and tranquillity which prevailed throughout the kingdom was unhappily interrupted by a tumult of a singular nature, which took place in the city of Edinburgh. It happened that at the execution of a man, convicted, under circumstances of peculiar hardship, as a smuggler, the military guard which attended were grossly insulted by the populace; in revenge of which, captain Porteous, the commandant, ordered the soldiers to fire upon the people, without the previous sanction of the magistrate. In consequence of this rash and precipitate order, several innocent persons suffering the loss of their lives, Porteous was tried for murder, convicted, and received sentence of death; but the Queen, as Regent, was prevailed on to grant him a reprieve. The populace of Edinburgh, however, exasperated in the highest degree at the conduct of this officer, who, is said to have been a man of abandoned morals, determined that he should not escape punishment; and on the evening of the day on which, according to his sentence, he was destined to suffer, the prison of the Tolbooth was forced with such order and deliberate resolution, as afforded a strong presumption that it was the result of a plot formed by persons far above the rank of those usually concerned in similar outrages. Leaving the delinquent suspended by the neck from a dyer's pole, they quickly and quietly dispersed; nor, though a high reward was offered, was it ever discovered who were the perpetrators of this daring act of violence.

During the session, (which commenced Feb. 1, 1737) the government, inflamed with resentment at this atrocious violation of the laws, instituted a Parliamentary inquiry into the circumstances of this affair; in the course of which three Scottish Judges in their robes were examined as witnesses at the bar of the House of Lords. And though it did not appear that the magistrates had been anywise deficient in their duty upon this occasion, a bill was brought in for disabling Alexander Wilson, Lord Provost of Edinburgh, from holding any office of magistracy in Great Britain—for imprisoning the said Alexander Wilson—for abolishing the guard of that city, and for taking away the gates of the Netherbow-port, which during this transaction had been shut in order to prevent the troops quartered in the suburbs from entering the city. This bill was opposed by almost all the Scotch representatives, and many other respectable members of both Houses, and the Duke of Argyle, in particular, said, "that he could not think of a measure more harsh or unprecedented than the present bill; and he believed there was no instance of the whole weight of Parliamentary indignation falling upon any individual, and far less upon any community, for crimes that were within the reach of the inferior courts of justice: that should the present bill pass into a law, the Lord Provost and citizens of Edinburgh would suffer by a cruel, unjust, and fantastical proceeding—a proceeding of which the worst use might be made if ever the nation should have the misfortune to fall under a vindictive, arbitrary, and tyrannical administration." The opposition in the Commons was still more vehement than in that of the Lords; and when the bill came to be committed, the commitment of it was carried by a majority of no more than six votes—124 against 118. The most obnoxious clauses were at length rejected, and the whole reduced to an act, disabling the Provost from holding any office under government, and imposing a fine of two thousand pounds upon the corporation of Edinburgh for the benefit of the widow of Porteous. The bill in its altered state was returned to the Lords, who agreed to the amendments. A second bill, containing extraordinary provisions for the more effectual bringing to justice the murderers of captain Porteous, was passed, and ordered to be read for a stated time by the Scotch clergy from their pulpits. Both bills were received with inexpressible indignation by the whole of the Scotch nation.

In the spring of the preceding year (April 1736,) the marriage of the Prince of Wales, now considered as the head of the opposition, having been celebrated with Augusta Princess of Saxe Gotha, in the course of the present session a motion was made by Mr. Pulteney, and seconded by Sir John Barnard, for an address to the King, that he would be pleased to settle 100,000*l.* per annum out of the civil list revenues upon the Prince. This was violently opposed by the courtiers as an encroachment upon the King's prerogative; and it was finally negatived by 234 to 204, though not without producing an entire alienation between the two courts of St. James's and Leicester-House. The Prince of Wales was highly offended, that, out of a civil list of 800,000*l.* per annum, a revenue of 50,000*l.* per annum only should be allotted to him, although his father, when Prince, had 100,000*l.* per annum out of a civil list of 700,000*l.* As this resolution of the Prince to appeal to Parliament embarrassed many who held places under the government, and were at the same time desirous to to keep on fair terms with the successor, he was advised by Mr. Doddington (afterwards Lord Melcombe), whom he admitted into his confidence, to apply for an additional grant of 50,000*l.* per annum; but the Prince replied, "that the nation had done enough for his family already, and that he would rather beg his bread from door to door than be a further charge to them." Many of the Tories, regarded the motion as dangerously democratic, left the House in a body previously to the division, though Sir William Wyndham had taken upon him to answer to the Prince for their assent.

The London theatre having been recently, in various instances, abused to the purposes of personal and political satire, a bill was at this period introduced for the prevention of this great and growing evil: agreeably to the provisions of which, no new dramatic pieces could be exhibited without the express license first obtained of the Lord Chamberlain. This bill passed through both Houses with little opposition, excepting that which it met with from the Earl of Chesterfied, who combated the principle of it with much animation and eloquence.*

The House of Commons having resolved itself into a grand in those spiritual labours to which they conceived themselves called by a supernatural impulse. Many respectable persons were of opinion, that the government ought in some mode to interfere in order to check these novel and dangerous ebullitions of enthusiasm; but not only was the idea of persecution in every form rejected with abhorrence, but the protection of the law was extended to them upon all occasions; and the wisdom of maintaining inviolate the grand principle of toleration has rarely appeared in a more striking point of view.

* His Lordship declared, "that he regarded this measure as of a very extraordinary and dangerous nature; as a restraint not on the licentiousness merely, but on the liberty of the stage; and as tending to a still more dangerous restraint on the liberty of the press, which was intimately and inseparably connected with the general liberty of the subject. He affirmed the laws, as they at present stood, to be sufficient for the purpose of punishing seditious or immoral performances. The best, and indeed the only mode of avoiding public ridicule and censure was, he said, to avoid ridiculous and vicious actions; for the people will neither ridicule those they love and esteem, nor suffer them to be ridiculed. An administration destitute of esteem or respect among the people will be censured and ridiculed, nor will the severest edicts be found of force to prevent it. If we agree to the bill now before us, what shadow of excuse can be suggested for refusing to proceed a step further, and to extend the prohibition to printing and publishing those dramas which are deemed unfit for public exhibition? Still political satires will appear under the title of Novels, Secret History, Dialogues, &c.; but will you allow, my Lords, a libel to be printed and dispersed only because it does not bear the title of a play? Thus, from the precedent before us, we shall be gradually prevailed upon to revive a general Imprimatur, and then adieu to the liberties of Great Britain! I admit, my Lords, that the stage ought not to meddle with politics; but for this very reason, among others, I object to the bill before us! for I fear it will be the occasion of its meddling with nothing else—it will be made subservient to the politics of the court only. This we know was actually the case in King Charles the Second's days; we know that Dryden grand committee to take into consideration the state of the national debt, Sir John Barnard moved for a bill to enable his Majesty to raise money either by the sale of annuities, or by borrowing at an interest not exceeding three per cent, which sum so raised should be applied towards the redemption of the South-Sea annuities, allowing the preference of subscription to the annuitants.* By this motion, the minister seemed much embarrassed; and it was evident that the executive government entertained no real wish or intention that the public debt, which so materially added both to its influence and its security, should ever be liquidated. Mr. Winnington, therefore, a zealous partisan of the minister, moved that all the public creditors, as well as the South-Sea annuitants, should be comprehended. To this Sir John Barnard objected, that it might be easy for the government to borrow money at three per cent. sufficient for the redemption of a certain proportion of the public debt, though it might be extremely difficult, or even impracticable, to borrow money enough at once to liquidate the whole, amounting at this time to almost forty-eight millions." A bill was, however, ordered in upon the basis of Winnington's proposition, which being warmly attacked, and faintly defended, was finally lost on the motion of commitment.†

Hostilities had scarcely ceased on the Continent between the houses of Austria and Bourbon before a new war broke out between the Russian and Ottoman empires, occasioned, as was pretended, by certain incursions of the Tartar chiefs and tribes into the Russian territories, but in reality by the ambitious and eager desire of the court of St. Petersburgh to regain possession of the maritime city of Asoph—one of the earliest acquisitions of Peter the Great, which he was afterwards compelled to sacrifice, to extricate himself from the extremity to which, in his last war with Turkey, he found himself reduced on the banks of the Pruth. Asoph was accordingly besieged and taken; and, when satisfaction and reparation were offered by the Porte for the injuries sustained by Russia, the Czarina declared her resolution not to relinquish her conquest. The Emperor of Germany, strictly connected with Russia, and impatient to obtain an indemnification for his recent losses, became in a short time a principal in the war; but the imperial armies, no longer led by Prince Eugene, were repeatedly defeated: and a peace was at length purchased at the expense of Orsova, Belgrade, and the entire province or kingdom of Servia, which were ceded to the Turks. The Russians, who had, under the conduct of the famous Marechal Munich, made great and rapid progress in the reduction of the provinces north of the Danube, on their part restored Oczakow, Choczim, and Bender, with the surrounding territory; and the possession of Asoph, the key of the Euxine, was confirmed to them by the Porte. In a short time, the mediation of England was solicited, which, had it been offered prematurely, would probably have been refused: and by the treaty of Belgrade the Emperor was once more rescued from ruin.

Some differences arising respecting the eventual succession of the Duchies of Berg and Juliers between the houses of Brandenburg and Sultzbach, the King of England displayed much eagerness to convert this contest to his own advantage, by endeavouring to secure the reversion of East Friesland, to which he had some obscure pretensions, as a consideration of granting his guarantee of Juliers to the King of Prussia. From this project he was with difficulty dissuaded by the arguments of his minister.

The chief uneasiness of the English ministry at this time arose from the state of domestic politics. Several circumstances concurred to impair the credit and weaken the influence of the administration. One of the most obvious was the decided part now taken by the Prince Wales in opposition to the court, by which he had long conceived himself ill-treated. An improper occasion was unexpectedly seized by the Prince to display his indignation and resentment, by suddenly, and without any previous notice, removing the Princess, (July 31,) when actually in labour, from the palace of Hampton-Court, at which the royal family then resided, to St. James's, where she was that night delivered of a Princess.‡ This produced a message from the King, ordering his Royal Highness to leave St. James's, with all his family, when it could be done without prejudice or inconvenience to the Princess. Another cause of the decline of the minister's influence was the succession of political tracts and pamphlets continually issuing against him from the press, and for the most part composed with great art and ability. The depredations of the Spaniards in the West Indies also still continued, and even the friends of the minister were compelled to admit, that the long and unexampled forbearance manifested in this instance approached the limits of tameness and pusillanimity.

By far the greatest and heaviest blow, however, which the interest of ministers at this period received, was the death of the Queen, who expired, after a short illness, November 20, 1737. "This accomplished Princess," observes a contemporary writer, was a model of virtuous and exemplary conduct from her earliest years to the maturity of age. Though the Prince of Wales was not permitted during the closing scene to enter her presence, she sent him her blessing, and a message of forgiveness; and she told Sir Robert Walpole that she would have seen him with pleasure, but prudence forbade the interview. At the approach of death she discovered no symptoms of fear, but maintained to the last moment her accustomed fortitude and serenity of temper. She declared, "that she had Dryden, the poet-laureat of that reign, made his wit and genius thus subservient to the designs of the court. When the second Dutch war was in contemplation, he wrote his 'Amboyna,' in which he represents the people of Holland as avaricious, cruel, and ungrateful. When the exclusion bill was moved for, he wrote his 'Duke of Guise,' in which those who were zealous for preserving and securing the liberties and religion of their country were exposed as a faction, leagued together for the purpose of excluding a virtuous and heroic prince from that throne which was his lawful right, on account of his adopting a faith different from their own. The peculiar province of the stage, my Lords, is, to expose those vices and follies which the laws cannot lay hold of; but, under the restraint of an arbitrary court license, it will be entirely perverted from its proper use. To a man bred in the habits of a court, that may appear to be a libel against the court which is only a just and salutary satire upon its vices and follies. Courtiers, my Lords, are too polite to reprove one another; the only place where they can meet with any just rebuke is a free though not licentious stage. But by this bill, instead of leaving it what it now is, and always ought to be—a scourge for fashionable vices—it will be converted into a channel for propagating them throughout the kingdom. Let us consider, my Lords, that arbitrary power has seldom or never been introduced into any country but by slow degrees, step by step, lest the people should perceive its approach. When the preparatory steps are made, the people may then indeed see slavery and arbitrary power making huge and hideous strides over the land, when it is too late to avert the impending ruin. The bill before us I consider as a step very necessary to this purpose; and should such design ever be formed by any ambitious King, or guilty minister, he would have reason to thank us for having so far facilitated his attempt; though such thanks, I am convinced, every one of your Lordships would blush to receive, and scorn to deserve."

* Sir John Barnard remarked, that even those public securities which bore an interest of three per cent, only were now considerably above par; therefore there could be no room to doubt that the subscription would immediately fill, were it a condition of the contract that the principal should be made irredeemable for the term of fourteen years. When the South-Sea annuities were thus reduced, the same plan might be adopted for redeeming the capital of the other trading companies, and in time of the whole public debt, without any violation of the public faith; that, by this means, the sinking fund would be so much increased, that in a few years the Parliament would be able to annihilate those taxes which lay heaviest upon the labouring and manufacturing poor; and that the remaining part of it, if faithfully applied, would, in a short time, free the nation from all incumbrances."

† In January this year died Dr. William Wake, who had filled the metropolitan see of Canterbury twenty-one years. Previously to his elevation to that high dignity, he had distinguished himself by the liberality of his sentiments, and the vigour of his exertions, both in convocation and in Parliament; particularly in his contest with Atterbury on the nature and extent of ecclesiastical authority; and in a conspicuous manner at the memorable trial of Sacheverel. He was advanced, on the death of Dr. Tennison, A. D. 1716, to the archiepiscopal chair. On his death, he was succeeded by Dr. Potter, translated from the see of Oxford—a man morose in disposition, and in deportment haughty, but of extensive learning and exemplary morals.

made it the business of her life to discharge her religious and social duties. She hoped God would pardon her infirmities, and accept the sincerity of her endeavours to promote the King's honour and the prosperity of the nation. She protested that she was an hearty well-wisher to the liberties of the people; and that, if she had erred in any part of her public conduct, it arose from want of judgment, not from intention." When drawing near her end, she repeated a collect of her own composing, fraught with devout and touching eloquence. Then desiring those around her, to join aloud in prayer, that she might hear: as the Lord's prayer was concluded she waved her hand and silently expired. Words cannot express the sensibility and affection of the King during her illness, and his regret for her loss. When the first passionate burst of grief had subsided, he soothed his emotions by talking of her in terms of endearment, and recounting her virtues. He continued the salaries of all the officers of her household, and commanded a list of her numerous benefactions to be laid before him, saying it was his intention that nobody, as far as possible, should be a sufferer besides himself. On her death-bed the Queen had testified to the King the high opinion she entertained of the capacity and rectitude of the minister Sir Robert Walpole. Turning to him, who was also standing by her bed-side, she said, 'I hope you will never desert the King:' and, after a little pause, 'I recommend his Majesty to you.'

Parliament was opened the 24th of January, 1738, with a short speech, recommending the dispatch of public business with prudence and unanimity. Warm and dutiful addresses of condolence were presented by the two Houses on the death of the Queen; but the spirit of opposition acquired from this event fresh animation and vigour; and, a motion having been made for the continuance of the same number of land forces as had been voted the preceding year, a vehement debate arose. In vindication of the motion the ministry scrupled not to affirm, "that, if the army were disbanded, the Tory interest would quickly predominate: that the kingdom was filled with clamour and discontent, which a standing military force only could effectually repress: that the support of the Whig interest demanded the maintainance of this force; and it was hoped and presumed that the House would vote triple the number, if adjudged necessary for this purpose." The opposition replied, that the vindication contained in it a sentence of self-condemnation; for to what cause could the spirit of clamour and discontent be ascribed but to the misconduct of the ministry? In the Lords the same question was debated, the Lords Carteret and Chesterfield taking the lead in the opposition; but the ministry triumphed, and the same number of forces was continued.

Notwithstanding the treaty of Seville, concluded so long since as the year 1729, the Spaniards had never desisted from the commission of those insults and depredations for the prevention of which it was chiefly and professedly made. They now even disputed the right of the English traders to cut logwood in the bay of Campeachy, and to gather salt in the island of Tortoga, though of ancient and established practice, and never before called in question. On pretence of the illicit commerce carried on by the British West India islands with the Spanish main, armed vessels, known by the name of Guarda-costas, were stationed in the usual track of commercial intercourse; which, on the plea of searching for contraband goods, seized, plundered, and insolently detained a great number of British merchant ships at their discretion; and, without regarding the faith of nations, imprisoning the crews, and confiscating the cargoes. The repeated memorials presented by the British ambassador at the court of Madrid produced no effect. Evasive answers, vague promises of inquiry, and cedulas of instructions sent to the Spanish governors in America, intended merely to amuse, were all the advances which were made towards reparation and redress. The gross and flagrant injustice with which British vessels and their cargoes were seized and condemned by the Spaniards was strongly stated in a memorial presented by Mr. Keene to Don Sebastian de la Quadra, December 7, 1737;* and, in the same dispatch, Mr. Keene urges the absurdity of obliging the English ships, when forced to make the Spanish land, to prove, before a Spanish court of justice, the particular reasons which obliged them to come near the shore.†

Petitions were at length presented to the Parliament, from the mercantile towns and cities, stating the violences to which they had been exposed, and imploring relief and protection. The Commons, in a grand committee, proceeded to hear counsel for the merchants, and to examine evidence; in the course of which it appeared that the most horrid and wanton acts of cruelty had, in various instances, been perpetrated by the Spaniards on the subjects of Great Britain. One Jenkins, who appeared on this occasion at the bar of the House, gave a simple and affecting narrative of the savage treatment he had met with from the captain of a Spanish guarda-costa, who, after exhausting his invention in various modes of torture, tore off one of his ears, and bade him carry it to his King; adding, withal, many contumelious and opprobrious expressions. Despairing to escape alive from the hands of this barbarian, he recommended, he said, his soul to God, and the revenge of his wrongs to his country.‡ The House, scarcely less inflamed than the populace with this recital, voted an unanimous address to the King, "beseeching his Majesty to use his endeavours to obtain effectual relief for his injured subjects; to convince the court of Spain that his Majesty could no longer suffer such constant and repeated insults and injuries to be carried on to the dishonour of his crown, and to the ruin of his subjects—and in case his applications proved fruitless, assuring him, that the House would effectually support his Majesty in taking such measures as honour and justice should make it necessary for him to pursue." To this address the King returned a gracious and favourable answer; and on the 20th of May, the Parliament was prorogued.

Desirous, however, of avoiding the calamities of war, the minister concluded, during the recess, a convention with Spain; by which his Catholic Majesty obliged himself to make reparation to the British subjects for their losses within a certain period; and commissioners were appointed "for regulating all those grievances and abuses which had interrupted the commerce of Great Britain in the American seas; and for settling all other matters in dispute, in such a manner as might for the future prevent and remove all new causes and pretences of complaint." When the terms of the convention were communicated to the Parliament (which met February 1, 1739,) it was treated with the most poignant contempt and ridicule. It was asserted by the opposition, that Spain, so far from giving up her groundless and unjustifiable claim of visiting and searching British ships sailing to and from British

* "I have orders, Sir," says he, "to tell you that the British subjects complain in the strongest manner of the oblique ways and unjust means which the Spanish officers in the West Indies make use of for condemning and confiscating their ships; viz. the master and crew are detained prisoners on board their ships until judgment is given; but, to save appearances, the governor appoints a Spaniard as party, in room of the proprietors of the ship, who, without ever consulting the master or the crew, makes properly a sham defence, on which the vessel is condemned; and after the sentence there lies an appeal to the council of the Indies in Spain; upon which appeal we conceive no defence is admitted, nor any testimony received or read, but what was admitted before the courts of judicature in America. If this be true, no wonder his Majesty's subjects have not obtained any manner of justice, either in the first instance or on the appeal, where the same party is at the same time both plaintiff and defendant."

† "That pretension," said the ambassador, "could not be sustained should we even suppose that the crown of Spain has solely and exclusively the dominion and sovereignty of the American seas; but such a dominion or sovereignty is what the Kings—predecessors of the King my master—never knew, and what his Majesty will never admit."

‡ The veracity of Jenkins—we know not how justly—has frequently been questioned; and it has been said, that, even when he gave his evidence, his ears were both in their proper places!

plantations, openly insisted upon it as a matter of right; for it was merely the differences which had arisen in the exercise of this pretended right, and not the right itself which they had submitted to discussion. It was observed, "that if the ministry had made the resolutions taken by Parliament in the last session the foundation of their demands, a decisive answer must have been obtained; but this convention, styled a treaty, was evidently no more than a preliminary to a treaty; and a most injurious and disgraceful preliminary. It was an expedient illusory and ignominious, insecure though abject:" and an assertion was risqued, which proved indeed strictly true, that the expense of the commission would exceed the sum ultimately granted by Spain as an indemnification to the mercantile sufferers. It was also objected, "that the regulation of the limits of Carolina and Florida was referred to the determination of these plenipotentiaries; so that the territorial right of the infant colony of Georgia, which indubitably belonged to the crown of Great Britain, was left open to dispute, to the great and manifest discouragement of the settlers, who must deem themselves placed in a most precarious and dangerous situation." The minister at length arose, and vindicated his own conduct, and the terms of this convention, by arguments which perhaps merited a much more impartial and dispassionate attention than at this period of national delirium they could hope to obtain. At length, the question for an address of approbation to the King, was carried by 262 against 234. The numbers being declared, Sir William Wyndham remarked, "that the address was intended to convince mankind that the treaty under consideration was a just and honourable treaty—but if the people refused implicity to resign their reason to a vote of that House, and a vote so circumstanced, will not Parliament lose its authority and influence with the public? Will it not be thought that the kingdom is governed by a faction, determined at all events to support the measures of the minister? I shall perhaps, said he, trouble you no more; but my earnest petition to Almighty God is, that he will preserve this people, whom he has so often wonderfully protected, from the impending danger which threatens the nation from without, and likewise from that still greater danger which threatens the constitution from within."* In the House of Lords, the Prince of Wales divided in person against the address, and his example was followed by seventy-three Peers—thirty-nine of whom afterwards signed a protest against it. Towards the conclusion of the session the House of Commons voted the sum of 500,000*l.* for augmenting the forces of Great Britain in case of emergency. A motion being made in the House of Peers, by Lord Bathurst, for an address to know whether Spain had paid the money stipulated by the convention, the time limitted for the payment being now expired; the Duke of Newcastle acquainted the House, that he was commanded by his Majesty to inform them that it was not paid; and that Spain had as yet given no reason for the non-payment—Upon which Lord Carteret moved, that the failure of Spain in this particular was a breach of the convention, a high indignity to his Majesty, and an injustice to the nation. After a vehement debate, the motion was evaded by the previous question.

A violent misunderstanding had arisen during the preceding year between the Regency of Hanover, and the King of Denmark, respecting the petty Lordship of Steinhorst, the revenue of which scarcely exceeded 1000*l.* per annum. The castle of Steinhorst, garrisoned by a slight detachment of Danish dragoons, was carried by assault; and the King of Denmark made great warlike preparations, in order to revenge this affront; which most probably would never have been offered, had not Hanover depended on the protection of England. The King of Denmark, reflecting on his inability to cope with Hanover and her ally, had the address to convert this incident to his own advantage, by concluding a convention with the King of England; agreeably to which he engaged to hold in readiness a body of six thousand men for the service of Great Britain. In return, Denmark, in addition to the stated pay of these troops, was to receive a subsidy of two hundred and fifty thousand crowns per annum, and the Lordship of Steinhorst was ceded to Hanover. When the Duke of Newcastle produced this conventional treaty for Parliamentary ratification, Lord Carteret earnestly requested to be informed what use was intended to be made of the troops; as it was expressly stipulated by the articles of the treaty, that they should neither be employed on board the fleet, nor be transported in whole or in part beyond sea, nor serve against France or Spain, except in Germany or Flanders. The subsidy, however, was granted, without explanation; at the same time, in consequence of a message from the throne stating the exigency of public affairs, a vote of credit, conformable to a similar resolution of the Commons, passed the House; and, on the 14th of June, the session was closed by a speech from the throne, in which the King assured the two Houses, "that he would not be wanting in his endeavours to vindicate and maintain the undoubted rights of the nation, and to answer the just expectations of his people."

Immediately afterwards letters of marque and reprisal were issued against the Spaniards; but the minister, still indulging a hope of averting war, transmitted instructions to Mr. Keene, the British Envoy at Madrid, to declare that the King of Great Britain did not intend to be thereby understood to break the peace, or to deviate from the treaties subsisting between the two crowns; and that he had it expressly in charge to assure the court of Spain, that, as soon as the Catholic King should be disposed to make the just satisfaction demanded of him, reprisals should cease, and give way to an accommodation. The Marquis de Villarias, the Spanish minister, replied, in the name of his Sovereign, "that the King of Spain neither acknowledged the right of the King of England to make reprisals, or to authorise others to make them; that his Catholic Majesty would regard these reprisals as a declaration of war, and that on the first intelligence of such act of hostility Mr. Keene should have notice to leave the kingdom." Lord Waldegrave, the British Ambassador at Paris, having communicated to the court of Versailles the resolution of the King of England, Cardinal Fleury appeared much moved; and, styling it a terrible resolution, told the Ambassador that he sincerely deprecated the consequences which there was too much reason to believe would be found to result from it. The Cardinal, however, offered, through the medium of the French Ambassador in London, the mediation of France; at the same time intimating that his most Christian Majesty, in case of a refusal of his good offices, would be obliged to fulfil his engagements with Spain. The English court replied, that the union subsisting between France and Spain was too strong to permit his most Christian Majesty to act with perfect impartiality in such a mediation, and that this must be considered as a sufficient reason for declining the acceptance of the offer.

England now made the most vigorous preparations; in the month of October, war was formally declared against Spain; and Rear-Admiral Vernon, a rough and resolute seaman, having been previously appointed to the command of the British naval force on the West-India station, universal joy was excited by the important intelligence, which arrived early in the year 1740, that he had taken the city of Portobello, on the isthmus of Darien, with six ships only. The talents of this officer were, in consequence of the glory acquired by

* Sir Robert Walpole upon this occasion, recalled to the recollection of the House, that the gentleman who was now the mouth of his opponents, was twenty-five years before deeply engaged with those traitors who had conspired the destruction of their country: that the only use he had made of the clemency of government then extended to him, was to endeavour its subversion; and he expressed his hope and confidence, that such treachery and ingratitude would produce a union of all true friends to our present happy establishment." Agreeably to the intimation previously given, a great secession of the members in opposition took place during the remainder of this session, and the succeeding year Sir William Windham died, deeply regretted by those who had forgotten his early political attachments, as one of the chief ornaments of the British senate and nation.

this brilliant coup-de-main, thought equal to any undertaking: and one of the most formidable armaments which ever sailed from the harbours of Great Britain, destined for the attack of Carthagena on the Spanish main, was entrusted to his care and conduct.* The command of the land forces, on the death of Lord Cathcart, devolved upon General Wentworth; and it soon appeared that the leaders of this expedition were grossly deficient in the essential requisites of their respective stations. Ignorance, rashness, and dissention characterized all their operations: and after sustaining immense loss, not so much from the ill-concerted attacks made upon the town and its adjoining forts, as from the tropical diseases which raged among the troops, they were finally compelled to a precipitate and disgraceful retreat. After reinforcements had been received from England, and the health of the men restored, nothing was attempted by the Admiral to retrieve his own reputation, or the honour of the British arms; and the nation began to be sensible that they had formed much too high an idea of his character.

This year, a squadron under the command of commodore Anson was detached into the South Seas, to annoy the Spanish settlements in that quarter; but from the injury sustained by storms and tempests, rather than by the opposition of the enemy, the primary design of the expedition proved abortive. The Commodore made however a great number of rich prizes off the coasts of Chili and Peru; and, landing with a detachment of seamen and marines, he took and plundered the town of Paita. The consternation excited by this enterprise extended even to the city of Lima; but his force was too inconsiderable to attempt any permanent conquest. In crossing the Pacific Ocean, he met with and captured a Spanish galleon, bound from Acapulco to the Philippines, of immense value; and returning by the Cape of Good Hope to England, after a complete circumnavigation of the globe, he was received with unbounded joy.†

The session which commenced November 1739, closed April 29, 1740, without producing any remarkable event. The pension bill was, according to almost annual

* Previously to the sailing of the great armament for Carthagena, the court of Versailles again offered its mediation, declaring its willingness for this purpose to act in concert with the courts of Vienna and Lisbon—but this offer was rejected.

† October 20, in this year, died the Emperor Charles VI, the last heir male of the house of Austria Hapsburgh; and, a few days subsequently, expired Anne Iwanowna, Empress of Russia, who bequeathed her crown to Iwan, the infant grandson of her eldest sister the Duchess of Mecklenburgh. This disposition not being agreeable to the Russians, a revolution soon took place in favour of Elizabeth, youngest daughter of Peter the Great by the late Empress Catharine who adopted the same general system of policy with her predecessors, and governed that vast empire with the same uninterrupted success and reputation.—Notwithstanding the famous Pragmatic Sanction, by virtue of which almost all the powers of Europe had guarantied the possessions of the house of Austria to the Archduchess Maria Theresa, now assuming the title of Queen of Hungary, the death of the Emperor seemed as a signal to set the world in arms. Frederic, King of Prussia—who had a few months only before this event succeded to the throne of his father—to the astonishment of the court of Vienna advanced a dormant and antiquated claim to certain districts of the duchy of Silesia; and, to supply all deficiency of argument, he marched a formidable army into that province, and after a rapid succession of conquests made his public entry into Breslau the capital—the Queen of Hungary having rejected with disdain the offer he made to advance a large sum for her immediate accommodation, and assist her with all his forces against whatever enemies might arise, to obtain her consent to the cession of the territory in question. Previously to this period, Prussia had scarcely been numbered among the powers of Europe; and had never been deemed of sufficient consequence to take any other than a subordinate or secondary part in the contentions of the continent. It was not without long and urgent solicitation that the Emperor Leopold had consented to confer the title of King upon the Marquises of Brandenburg; and, as it is said, expressly against the advice and remonstrance of Prince Eugene, who warned the Emperor that he was raising up a rival to himself; and that the acquisition of the royal title would probably incite to future dangerous schemes and projects of aggrandisement. The late King of Prussia was a man capricious, ignorant, and brutal. The relentless despotism which he exercised over his subjects led him to increase the number, and pay the closest attention to the discipline, of his troops; and his insatiable avarice prompted him to the constant accumulation of treasure, gradually arising in a long succession of years to an immense amount, and procured by every species of rapine and extortion. Thus the new monarch now found himself in a condition to undertake the boldest designs which interest or ambition could suggest. The Elector of Bavaria refused to acknowledge the title of the Queen of Hungary, alledging that the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia belonged to him, in virtue of an ancient compact, as the rightful heir of the Emperor Ferdinand I. The King of Poland, as Elector of Saxony, unmindful of his obligations to the late Emperor, claimed the whole Austrian succession in right of his mother, daughter of the Emperor Joseph. France, resolving to embrace the favourable moment to abase the pride and annihilate the power of her ancient rival, entered into engagements with the Elector of Bavaria, with a view to elevate this Prince to the imperial throne, and to enable him, in concert with the houses of Brandenburg and Saxony, to seize and divide the Germanic dominions of the house of Austria; the object of the confederacy being to confine the power of the Queen of Hungary within the narrow limits of that remote kingdom. Spain, also desirous of a share of the spoils, advanced her pretentions to the Italian dominions of Austria: and the Queen of Spain, heiress of the house of Farnese, a woman of daring ambition, who gloried, like Catharine of Medicis, in styling herself the "mother of Kings," entertained the project of erecting these dominions into a monarchy, under the title of the kingdom of Lombardy, in favour of her youngest son the infant Don Philip, brother to Don Carlos King of the Sicilies, who also became a willing party in this formidable confederacy against the imperial house; in the general wreck of which, the Austrian Netherlands were alloted to France. The treaty of Nymphenburg was concluded in the spring of 1741 between France and Bavaria—a powerful army under Mareschal Maillebois marching at the same time into Westphalia, in order to overawe the electorate of Hanover: and the King of England, then at Hanover, thought proper to countermand the march of the Danes and Hessians in the pay of Great Britain, who had received orders to advance to the relief of the Queen of Hungary, and to sign a treaty of neutrality for that electorate, as the purchase of which he engaged to vote for the Elector of Bavaria at the ensuing election of an Emperor; although this great concession, by which the imperial diadem was in appearance and probability for ever transferred from the house of Austria to that of Bavaria, was obviously and utterly irreconcileable with the general policy of England, which had for a long series of years considered the power of the Austrian family as the only effectual counterbalance to that of the house of Bourbon. In July 1741, the Elector of Bavaria, having been joined by the French forces under Mareschal Broglio, entered the Archduchy of Austria at the head of 70,000 men, and captured the important cities of Lintz and Passau; but understanding that Vienna was strongly fortified and garrisoned, he determined to direct his march to Bohemia; and Prague surrendering after a short resistance, the Elector made his public entry into that capital, where he was proclaimed and inaugurated King of Bohemia. The diet of the empire being convened at Francfort on the Main, the Elector was unanimously chosen Emperor of the Romans, Feb. 1742, by the name of Charles VII.; and a subsidy of fifty Roman months granted him to defray the expenses of the war. Reduced to the lowest ebb of misfortune, Maria Theresa retired into the mountainous recesses of Hungary, and, assembling the states of that kingdom at Presburg, made in person an eloquent and affecting speech; in which she declared "that she placed her sole reliance upon their courage, fidelity, and attachment; and, holding up to their view the infant Prince whom she bore in her arms, conjured them to protect and defend the sacred deposit which she entrusted to their care; and to show in this crisis of danger, by the generous ardor of their loyalty, the affection and reverence which they entertained for the blood of their ancient monarchs." Moved by this uncommon spectacle of imperial beauty in distress, and fired by the charms of her person no less than the energy of her supplication, this rude but gallant people, drawing suddenly their sabres, replied with loud acclamations, "Moriamur pro Rege nostro Maria Theresa!"—In consequence of the powerful aid she derived from the zeal of her Hungarian subjects, affairs soon began to wear a more favourable aspect. Early in the spring of 1742, the Austrian General Count Khevenhuller, forcing the passes of Scardingen, marched into the electorate of Bavaria, ravaged the whole country, and made himself master of Munich the capital. Prince Charles of Lorraine, who had married the Archduchess Marianne, sister to the Queen of Hungary, entered Silesia at the head of 50,000 men, in order to oppose the progress of the Prussian arms. After two fierce encounters at Molwitz and Czaslaw, in both of which the Prussians had the advantage, a peace was concluded through the mediation of England at Breslau (June 1742); by which the entire province of Silesia, the most fertile, rich, and populous, in the whole extent of the Austrian Dominions, was ceded to Prussia. Such was the exultation of his Prussian Majesty at the conclusion of this treaty—the advantages of which so far exceeded his most sanguine hopes and utmost demands at the commencement of the war—that he is said to have declared himself willing to sacrifice his right hand, to insure the perpetual and faithful observance of it. In September following an accommodation took place with Saxony, at the expense of some inconsiderable districts ceded to the King of Poland. The Prince of Lorraine, now advancing into Bohemia, found that the French forces, under the Mareschals Broglio and Belleisle, had abandoned their conquests on being themselves abandoned by their allies, and had now retired under the cannon of Prague, which was immediately invested by the Austrians; and the seige being prolonged for many months, the French garrison was reduced to difficulties which the most invincible resolution only could have sustained. The Austrians, supposing that they must finally surrender at discretion, refused to listen to terms of capitulation; but, by an extraordinary effort of military skill and courage, the French General forced a passage through the Austrian army, and in the depth of winter made their retreat good to Alsace; eluding, by the secresy and rapidity of their marches, all attempts to intercept them. The Emperor, reduced in his turn to the extremity annual custom, passed by the Commons and rejected by the Lords; but the place bill, which was again introduced, with many judicious modifications and numerous exceptions, was thrown out in the Commons, by 222 against 206.

The great popularity of the war tended to heighten the unpopularity of the minister. After the capture of Portobello, and the ill-conducted attempt on Carthagena, the spirit of enterprise subsided: the fleets of Spain sailed unmolested from their harbours, though British squadrons were stationed off the Spanish coasts for the professed purpose of intercepting them; commerce was interrupted by the numbers of seamen pressed into the service of government, and still more by the incredible number of prizes taken by the Spanish privateers; and the discontents of the merchants were unnecessarily inflamed by the rash and passionate answer of Sir Charles Wager, who, when a memorial was presented to him, as First Lord of the Admiralty, for protection and redress, replied, "it is your own war, and you must take it for your pains." The harbour and fortifications of Dunkirk were repaired, by order of the French King, in open violation of the treaty of Utrecht; a French fleet had sailed in company with the Spaniards to the West Indies, for the avowed purpose of protecting the Spanish commerce; and serious apprehensions were entertained for the safety of Jamaica.

The Parliament was convened in November, 1740; and the nation, throughout all ranks, exhibited alarming symptoms of discontent. Mr. Sandys, one of the leaders of opposition, soon after the commencement of the session notified to Sir Robert Walpole, in the House of Commons, his intention on the Friday following to bring forward a charge against him. At this unexpected intimation, the Minister seemed at first somewhat disconcerted and surprised; but, recovering himself, after a short pause, he replied, "that as he was conscious of no crime, he had no doubt of being able to make a proper defence." On the day appointed, Mr. Sandys accordingly moved "that an humble address should be presented to the King, beseeching his Majesty that he would be graciously pleased to remove the Right Honourable Sir Robert Walpole, First Commissioner of the Treasury, &c. from his Majesty's presence and councils for ever." The motion was ably sustained by the members in opposition, particularly by Mr. Pulteney, who took a severe retrospective view of the conduct of the Minister, from the commencement of his administration. On this trying occasion, Sir Robert Walpole defended himself with such vigour and ability, that extremity of distress, retired to Francfort, where he chiefly resided during the short and wretched remainder of his life, in a state of exile and indigence. In this destitute and forlorn situation, however, this Prince thought fit to issue a commissorial decree against the Queen of Hungary, which was couched in the most lofty terms. On the side of Italy, the Spaniards, to carry their magnificent projects into effect, had assembled, in conjunction with the Neapolitans, an army of 60,000 men at Rimini, A. D. 1742, under the command of the Duc de Montemar, afterwards succeeded by Count de Gages, who attempted in vain to penetrate into Tuscany. And the King of Sardinia, who dreaded with reason the aggrandisement of the house of Bourbon in Lombardy, having declared in favour of the house of Austria, and joined Count Traun the Austrian General in the Parmesan; another Spanish army, under the infant Don Philip in person, entered Savoy, and took possession of Chamberri; and though his Sardinian Majesty returned to the defence of his own dominions at the first notice of this attack, he could not prevent the Spaniards from taking up their winter quarters in Savoy. In the course of this campaign, the army under Count Gages was extremely weakened by the defection of the Neapolitan troops, who were recalled by a mandate of the King of Naples, issued in consequence of the unexpected and unwelcome appearance of an English squadron in the bay of Naples, detached by Admiral Matthews, the British Commander in the Mediterranean, with the peremptory denunciation of an immediate bombardment of the city of Naples, if his Neapolitan Majesty refused to sign an explicit declaration of neutrality. The ensuing campaign in Italy did not at all advance the progress of the Spaniards. Count Gages having, contrary to his better judgment, attacked the combined army of Austrians and Piedmontese under the command of the brave and experienced Mareschal Traun at Campo-Santo, was obliged to retreat with considerable loss, after an engagement which commenced at sunrise, and continued till seven at night by the light of the moon. The Mareschal, being destined to yet more urgent and important services in Germany, resigned his command in September 1743 to Prince Lobkowitz. In Savoy, the infant Don Philip, reinforced by 20,000 French auxiliaries, attacked the Piedmontese lines at Château Dauphine—but was repulsed in repeated attacks with much damage; upon which the French retired into Dauphine, and the Spaniards took refuge in their winter quarters.

Renouncing his compulsory profession of neutrality, the King of Naples reassembled his army in the summer of 1744, and openly joined Count de Gages. Prince Lobkowitz the Austrian General, marching through the papal territories, advanced to the frontiers of Naples; and published, though with little effect, a manifesto, to exhort the Neapolitans to shake off the Spanish yoke, and return to the dominion of the house of Austria. Count Brown being secretly detached by the Austrian commander to attack the town of Velletri, where the King of Naples had established his quarters in a state of perfect apparent security, so successfully executed his commission, that his Neapolitan Majesty escaped in the darkness of the night, through a postern, with great difficulty. But Count de Gages, repairing to the post in person, with great presence of mind rallied the troops, and at length compelled the Austrian General to sound a retreat. The imperial army having suffered much from the excessive heats of the summer, and the consequent epidemical diseases of an unaccustomed climate, decamped in November, in order to take up their winter quarters in Parma. Scarcely had the Austrian commander passed the Tiber, and lost sight of the walls of Rome, but his antagonist Count de Gages, accompanied by his Neapolitan Majesty, entered that city; but finding the bridges broken down, they desisted from the pursuit, and the holy fathes received both these contending powers with the same external demonstrations of joy and affection. In Savoy the infant don Philip, being joined by his allies the French, attacked the King of Sardinia, though strongly entrenched amidst the mountains of Villa Franca; and after an obstinate engagement, this monarch, being overpowered by numbers, was obliged to abandon his posts, and to embark on board the British squadron, then cruising off the coast, which transported him and his troops to Vado. Don Philip now prepared to penetrate through the territories of Genoa to the Milanese; but the British commander, Admiral Matthews, declared that the King of England would consider the permission of the republic as a violation of their neutrality. The Spaniards therefore defiled towards Piedmont, and forced the strong posts of Château Dauphiné, defended by the King of Sardinia in person, who now retreated to Saluces in order to cover his capital, while the combined army invested the strong and important fortress of Coni. Had this enterprise succeeded, the Sardinian monarch would have been reduced to a very critical situation: but Baron Leutrum the Governor, made so gallant a defence, that the infant and the Prince of Conti, who commanded the French army, were compelled to raise the siege at the approach of winter, and to retire with great precipitation to the frontier of France. The campaign of 1745 proved still more disastrous and alarming; for Count de Gages, at the head of the Spanish and Neopolitan forces, passed the Appennines, and directing his march through the territories of Genoa, which—in consequence of provocations no patience could endure—had now joined the confederacy, accomplished a junction with the army of the infant don Philip; and the Austrians retiring before them, the Milanese, Parma, and Placentia, submitted to the dominion of Spain. All Piedmont on both sides the Po was likewise reduced, and Turin itself menaced with a siege; yet the King of Sardinia adhered with unshaken fidelity to his engagements, and rejected with heroic firmness all proposals of a separate accommodation. In the memorable march of Count Gages, whose passage over the Appennines was compared by the Italians to that of Hannibal over the Alps, nothing, as the historian Buonamical informs us, appeared so surprising as the plenty which the army of that General found, when sinking under the pressure of distress, at their entrance into the territories of the republic of Lucca, though in point of natural fertility far inferior to the countries they had traversed. The roads from all the surrounding villages were crowded with carriages, conveying forage and provisions into the camp, at a season of the year when it might have been imagined that the public stores were exhausted. And it was seen and felt with irresistible conviction, that the misery or happiness of the subject, arises not from the nature of the soil, but of the government. In the ensuing year (1746) fortune began once more to smile upon this Prince, when apparently reduced to the verge of ruin. The court of Vienna, no longer pressed on the side of Germany, sent powerful reinforcements into Italy; and the coffers of his Sardinian Majesty being amply replenished with British subsidies, he was enabled to take the field with redoubled force. Early in the spring, Baron Leutrum, the Piedmontese General, recovered Aste, Allesandria, and Casal; Mareschal Maillebois, who now commanded the French armies, retiring into the Genoese territories. On the other side, Count de Gages and Don Philip were compelled to abandon Milan, Pavia, and Parma, and retreat to Placentia, where, in the month of June, they were joined by Mareschal Maillebois. In consequence of this junction, the infant, finding himself at the head of fifty thousand men, determined to attack the Austrians in their camp at San Lazaro, but met with a most severe repulse; and the Austrians, pursuing their victory, in their turn attacked the enemy (August 10) near the town of Tortona, on the southern banks of the Po, the passage of which the combined armies of French and Spaniards effected, not without great difficulty and loss. The infant was in consequence of this second defeat compelled to abandon the city of Placentia, containing immense magazines of ammunition and military stores; and, retreating towards Genoa, after a short interval quitted the territories of the republic, and took the route of Provence. Genoa was now compelled to surrender to the Austrians, who exercised the rights of conquest with such merciless rigour, that the Genoese flew to arms, and in a short time, with a courage worthy of their ancient fame, totally expelled their oppressors. Whilst the imperial Generals kept possession of Genoa, the bank of St. George was exhausted by that the motion of Mr. Sandys was finally rejected by a great majority.*—After a short interval, a motion to the same purport with that of Mr. Sandys, was made in the Peers by Lord Carteret, and supported by the Duke of Argyle, and the Lords Gower, Bathurst, and Chesterfield. It was negatived, but thirty Peers entered their protest.

In April 1741, the King delivered in person a speech to both Houses of Parliament, informing them that "the Queen of Hungary had made a requisition of assistance from England, agreeably to the tenor of the subsisting treaties—that he had ordered the Danish and Hessian auxiliaries to be in readiness to march for that purpose—that in this complicated and uncertain state of affairs, it might become necessary for him to incur extraordinary expenses for maintaining inviolate the Pragmatic Sanction, for which he trusted they would provide." The Commons assured the King, "that they entirely approved of the measures already pursued, and that they would enable him effectually to support his engagements with the Queen of Hungary." Two hundred thousand pounds were accordingly voted upon the motion of the minister, as a Parliamentary grant or gratuity to that Princess, and 300,000*l.* more to his Majesty, to be employed at his discretion in the manner most conducive to her service; seventy thousand men had been before voted for the army and navy, and the accustomed subsidies granted to Denmark and Hesse Cassel. On the 25th of April, the session closed; and, in the month of December, the new Parliament was convened. The King in his speech expressed his hope and expectation that the two Houses would confirm their resolutions formed by their predecessors for the support of the Pragmatic Sanction, the preservation of the balance ef power, the liberties of Europe, and the security of his dominions. An address of thanks and approbation being moved as usual, a clause was proposed to entreat his Majesty not to engage these kingdoms in a war for the preservation of foreign dominions. Mr. Shippen declared, "that he was neither afraid nor ashamed to affirm that thirty years had made no change in any of his political opinions. He said that he was grown old in the House of Commons, and had lived to see his conjectures and predictions ripened into knowledge."—"I may," said he, "perhaps fall under the censure of the House, and be once more treated as a criminal, for asserting what they who punish me cannot deny—that Hanoverian maxims are inconsistent with the interest and happiness of the nation—that the wise policy of the Act of Settlement ought to be adhered to—and that England ought not to be endangered, in order that the King's foreign dominions may be secured."—The address, as it was originally moved, was however carried and presented to the King. A petition from the electors of Westminster soon coming under the cognisance of the House, the election of the sitting members, who were the court candidates, was declared void by a majority of four voices; and the high bailiff was committed to custody. Other controverted elections having been also decided to the disadvantage of the court, Sir Robert Walpole became sensible that his political career hastened to its termination. Anxious however, to make one effert more to retain that authority which he had so long exercised almost without controul, he caused a royal message to be sent to the Prince of Wales, importing, that, if his royal highness would accede to terms with his Majesty, his revenue should be immediately raised to 100,000*l.* per annum; 200,000*l.* should be advanced for the payment of his debts; he and his friends should be taken into favour, and a suitable provision made for all his followers. In answer to this proposal, the Prince positively declared, "that he would accept of no such conditions, or of any conditions, while public affairs continued under the direction of Sir Robert Walpole—whom he regarded as the bar which separated his Majesty from the affections of his people—as the grand author of the national losses, disgraces, and grievances, at home and abroad." Repulsed in this attempt, the Minister, now in imminent danger of an impeachment, endeavoured in vain to detach from their political connexion some of the leaders of the opposite party: and finding himself on the next division again left in a minority, he declared he would never more enter the walls of that house. On the ensuing day (February 3, 1742), the King adjourned both Houses of Parliament to the 18th; and immediately upon this adjournment Sir Robert Walpole was created Earl of Orford, and resigned all his employments.

Numerous intrigues and negotiations were carried on during this recess; and it soon appeared that a fatal division had taken place amongst the opposition, and that several of them, who had made the loudest professions of honour and virtue, who had repeatedly menaced the Minister with clamours of inquiry and denunciations of vengeance, and who had boasted that no art could dissolve the cement by which they were united, had by the enormous contributions levied by the Austrians, who boasted that the wealth of this proud city was theirs, and that Genoa would in a short time be deluged in blood. And General Botta, the Austrian Commander, is said to have told the Genoese deputies, who pathetically pleaded for the mitigation of their sufferings, that he would leave them nothing except their eyes, to behold the destruction of their country and to weep over its ruins. The Duc de Boufflers, Ambassador from his Most Christian Majesty to the Republic, in his congratulatory address to the doge and senate of Genoa on the recent and glorious expulsion of the Austrians, seemed inspired by all the enthusiasm of liberty:—"What confidence, Serene Prince and most potent Lords," said the Ambassador, "can you place in a court which has attempted to reduce you to the vilest slavery? By the mouth even of its general it has threatened your citizens with the most infamous punishments. But it has not yet been in its power to rob you either of your honour or your liberty. These inestimable things, a thousand times more precious than life itself, you are still possessed of. It is to yourselves you owe this happy revolution, which has been effected without, and even prevented, the succour of your allies. It is your present actions, illustrious republic! which render you the emulators of that ancient Rome, of that senate, the courage of whom the presence of Hannibal and a victorious army then under the walls of that city could not abate."—"The republic," said the doge in reply, "rejoices in having fulfilled her engagements with invincible steadiness. The distresses she has laboured under have only served to augment her courage and redouble her constancy. Intrepid in the most fatal extremities, she has been, and still is, ready to sacrifice all for the preservation of her liberty." In April 1747 the French, under Mareschal Belleisle, once more crossed the Var, and took possession of Nice, Montalban, Villa-Franca, and Ventmiglia, almost without resistance; the Austrians and Piedmontese being employed in an attempt to recover the city of Genoa. On summoning the citizens to surrender, they replied, "that they would defend their liberty with the last drop of their blood, and would rather be buried in the ruins of their capital, than submit to the clemency of the court of Vienna." Count Schuylenburg, the Austrian Commander, who conducted the operations of the siege with great skill and vigour, was at length reduced reluctantly to listen to the remonstrances of the King of Sardinia, who represented to him the necessity of abandoning his enterprise in order to cover Piedmont and Lombardy from the efforts of the Mareschal de Belleisle. But the Chevalier de Belleisle, brother to the Mareschal, attempting to force the important pass of Exiles, was repulsed with prodigious slaughter; and seizing a pair of colours, with a resolution, on the renewal of the attack, to plant them with his own hand upon the ramparts, he was shot dead with a musquet ball. The troops immediately gave way in the utmost confusion, and the Mareschal, informed of this disaster, retreated back to the Var; and his Sardinian Majesty menaced Dauphine with an invasion in his turn; but excessive rains prevented the execution of his design. The succeeding campaign (A. D. 1748,) which was the last of the war, was distinguished by no very material transaction; the near prospect of peace rendering it equally unadviseable on both sides to risque any hazardous enterprise; and the infant Don Philip was by one of the articles of the treaty put into possession of Parma, Placentia, and Guastalla—the King of Sardinia receiving, in conformity to a previous agreement with the Queen of Hungary, and as a just remuneration for the fidelity and attachment he had discovered to the interests, and the courage he had displayed in the defence, of the house of Austria, some contiguous districts of Novara and the Milanese. As soon as certain intelligence had arrived, that the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle was signed, the British Admiral acquainted the Senate of Genoa of that event, in a message delivered by one of his captains, who had at the same time express orders to assure the republic how great was the admiration he entertained of the fortitude and valour displayed by them in the defence of their liberties. "Such," says the Italian historian, "is the magnanimity of the British nation!"

* In the course of his speech the Minister animadverted with great spirit upon the indiscriminate use of the term patriotism. "A patriot, Sir!" said he, addressing the chair—"I venerate the name. But then it is the real and not the pretended patriot who is the object of my reverence. In these times, Sir, patriots spring up like mushrooms. I could raise twenty of them in a night. A minister has nothing more to do than to refuse compliance with an unjust or unreasonable demand, and up starts a patriot. But, Sir, the unprincipled efforts of such patriots I alike disdain and detest."

secretly acceded to an insidious and disgraceful accommodation with the court.*

The new ministry had scarcely entered upon their functions, when the pension bill, formerly the darling object of the patriots, was revived and passed by the Commons, but once more received sentence of condemnation from the Lords; Lord Carteret himself giving his vote against it. A motion made for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the septennial act was vehemently opposed by Mr. Pulteney and Mr. Sandys, and the question was negatived. The place bill, brought forward by Mr. Lyttelton, met with the same fate. The motion for an inquiry into the conduct of Robert Earl of Orford, during the twenty years of his administration, was also rejected; but the motion being renewed, and limited to the last ten years, it was with great difficulty carried against the court; a subsidy bill, however, for indemnifying those who should be summoned to give evidence against that nobleman, was rejected, after it had passed the Commons; so that the inquiry proved finally abortive.†

Affairs now reverting to their regular and accustomed channels, the House of Commons was moved, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to resolve itself into a committee of supply; and, conformably to the estimates and resolutions brought forward, upwards of a hundred thousand seamen and landmen were voted for the service of the current year; the sum of five hundred thousand pounds was granted to the Queen of Hungary, and the subsidies to Denmark and Hesse Cassel continued. This, however, was deemed by the court a very inadequate aid; and it soon appeared that the new minister, Lord Carteret, had formed vast and dangerous projects, calculated for the sole purpose of recommending himself to the favour of the King, who was ambitious to signalise his talents, at the head of a grand continental army. With this view, therefore, sixteen thousand regular troops, afterwards increased to a much larger number, were, in the month of April, embarked for Flanders, and were shortly after joined by sixteen thousand Hanoverians and six thousand Hessians, in British pay, and a numerous body of Austrians. The Earl of Stair, created, on the recent resignation of the Duke of Argyle, Field Marshal of Great Britain, was appointed generalissimo of this new army. Invested with the character of ambassador extraordinary to the States General, he exerted in vain the whole force of his eloquence to prevail upon their high mightinesses to concur in the projects of the King of Great Britain. Although the States had previously come to a resolution considerably to augment their forces, they declared their determination to adhere to their neutrality. The English General, finding himself unable, without their assistance, to engage in those offensive operations he had in contemplation, which were said to be the siege of Dunkirk, to be followed, if successful, by a rapid march to the Somme, distributed his army into cantonments in the countries of Flanders, Liege, and Luxemburg. Lord Stair's negotiation proving ineffectual, Lord Carteret was himself delegated with new propositions for the consideration and choice of their high mightinesses:—

I. That the republic should declare war against France in concert with England, &c.

II. That they should garrison the fortified towns in Flanders belonging to the Queen of Hungary, to enable her to employ her troops in the field.

III. That Great Britain should take thirty thousand of the troops of Holland into British pay.

Lastly, To enter into a new treaty of commerce, very advantageous to the republic.

The States General, in reply, declared their reluctance, by entering into the war, to make it more bloody; and they asserted, that the troops of the republic were raised only for the defence of the republic, and they had never hired them out. As to the last proposition, it was acknowledged to be very acceptable, but too dearly purchased at the expence of a war. These answers gave little satisfaction to the English minister, who returned to London much chagrined.

When the Parliament met, in November, the conduct of the new ministry was bitterly arraigned. The motion, however, for an address to the throne, "beseeching and advising his Majesty to exonerate his subjects of the charge and burden of those mercenaries who were taken into the service last year without the knowledge or consent of Parliament," was rejected. In the course of the session, the place bill was again brought forward, and again rejected by the Commons. A motion for reviving the inquiry into the conduct of Sir Robert Walpole for the last ten years, was also negatived.

The Earl of Stair assembled the confederate forces early in the spring (1743,) with a view, as was believed, of penetrating the frontier of France on the side of the Moselle; but being opposed by the Austrian and Hanoverian Generals intrusted with the secret resolves of the English court, the whole army directed its course towards the Maine. On their near approach to Francfort, the Emperor, alarmed with the apprehension of falling as a captive into the hands of the King of England, prepared to fly for refuge, though he seemed scarcely to know whither; but the English commander deputed, without delay, an officer of distinction with a message to his imperial Majesty, assuring him, in the name of the King his master, that the respect due to the imperial dignity should not be violated, nor the city he had chosen for his personal residence molested. The Emperor, notwithstanding, retired first to Munich, and, on the re-approach of the Austrians, to Augsburg, whence he returned, at the termination of the campaign, to his former residence at Francfort. The court of Versailles, which had in vain made advances of accommodation to the court of Vienna, now apprehending the junction of the allies commanded by Lord Stair with the Austrians under Prince Charles of Lorraine, directed the Mareschal de Noailles to assemble an army of 60,000 men on the Maine, while the Mareschal de Coigne was placed at the head of a yet superior army in Alsace, to oppose any attempt of the Austrian commander to penetrate into France by forcing the passage of the Rhine. The King of England, accompanied by his younger son the Duke of Cumberland—now, for the first time, appearing in the field—arrived in June at the camp of Aschaffenburg. Here, however, the monarch soon found himself and his whole army reduced to a very critical situation, by the superior skill and conduct of the Mareschal de Noailles. This General had, early in the summer, taken possession of the cities of Spire, Worms, and Oppenheim, and, passing the Rhine, had encamped on the east side of the river, above Francfort, in a position which commanded the navigation of the Upper Maine; at the same time occupying all the adjacent posts on the Rhine and Maine,

* The Duke of Newcastle and Mr. Pelham, with their adherents, were allowed to retain their places. The Earl of Wilmington succeeded Sir Robert Walpole as First Lord Commissioner of the Treasury, and Mr. Sandys was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. Lord Carteret took the seals, as Secretary of State for the foreign department, and was regarded as chief minister; and Mr. Pulteney, who refused to accept any office of responsibility, was sworn anew of the Privy Council, and was soon afterwards created Earl of Bath:—but though he had flattered himself with the idea of guiding unseen the reins of government, he was never admitted to the least share of royal confidence.

† Two reports, however, were actually presented by the committee of inquiry to the House, by which it appeared that, exclusive of all the open and avowed means of influence, the enormous sum of one million four hundred and fifty-three thousand pounds had been expended during the last ten years for secret service. Paxton, solicitor to the Treasury, refusing to answer interrogatories put to him by the committee, was committed to close custody, but still persisted in his contumacy; and Scroope, Secretary to the Treasury, through whose hands vast sums had passed, declared, that he could not in conscience, after consulting the ablest lawyers and divines, and laying his case before his Majesty, to whom alone he thought himself responsible, discover in what manner this money had been expended, or to what purposes appropriated. The committee state in their reports, as a subject of serious complaint, that the very magnitude and extent of the evil are become the means of screening it from detection and punishment. Among those whose eloquence enforced a reluctant adoption of the motion of inquiry, no one more distinguished himself than Mr. Pitt, a young man of extraordinary talents, who had risen during the few years he had sat in the House of Commons into high reputation.

so as effectually to bar all access with the surrounding country, and to intercept all convoys of provision or supply. The King of England, therefore, found himself under the necessity of decamping from Aschaffenburg, and directed his march to Hanau, where he expected to meet large re-inforcements. But the Mareschal, foreseeing that the allies would not long be able to maintain their position, had taken his measures accordingly; and on approaching the village of Dettingen, the King of England found the French army drawn up in battle array, with a view to oppose his further progress. No event more favourable could be expected than that the whole army must surrender themselves prisoners of war; but the rash and inexperienced valour of the Duc de Grammont blasted the brilliant hopes of the French; advancing through the defiles, contrary to the express orders of the Mareschal de Noailles, who was compelled to move with the whole army in order to sustain this unseasonable attack, he offered the enemy battle upon equal terms in the enclosed plain. The French charged with their usual impetuosity, but were received by the English with cool and determined intrepidity. The King himself displayed great courage. The French were repulsed with slaughter, and compelled to repass the Maine with the loss of six thousand men. They suffered, however, no molestation in their retreat, the King of England pursuing his march to Hanau, impatient to receive his expected supplies and re-inforcements. The Duke of Cumberland, who fought with great gallantry, was wounded in the action.—At Hanau the King was visited by Prince Charles of Lorraine and Count Khevenhuller. No operations of consequence took place during the remainder of this campaign.

About the latter end of the summer, the allied army passed the Rhine at Mentz, and his Britannic Majesty fixed his head quarters at Worms. Here, the advances of the diet (who, solicitous to restore the peace of the empire, had written letters to the King of England and the States General, requesting, in concert with themselves, the mediation of the maritime powers,) being previously rejected, a treaty was signed with the Queen of Hungary and the King of Sardinia, who engaged to maintain forty thousand infantry and a proportionable corps of cavalry for the service of the Queen of Hungary in Italy.*

In the month of September, the allies, now encamped at Spire, were joined by twenty thousand Dutch auxiliaries,—the States General, notwithstanding the solicitations and menaces of France, having been prevailed upon to declare in favour of the Queen of Hungary.† Mareschal Noailles having retired into Alsace, the allies made various incursions, and demolished the entrenchments abandoned by the French on the banks of the Queich: after which they separated into winter quarters. Prince Charles of Lorraine also, foiled in his attempts to penetrate into France on the side of Alsace, by the Mareschal de Coigne, marched back to the Palatinate; and the campaign closed with no decisive advantage on either side. Lord Stair, the English commander-in-chief, threw up his commission in disgust.

Early in the spring (March 1744,) war was formally declared by France against England; and, soon after, by England against France.‡

Great preparations were immediately made by the court of Versailles for the ensuing campaign in Flanders, where an army of one hundred and twenty thousand men was assembled, under the command of the famous Marechal Comte de Saxe, who invested and reduced the towns of Menin, Ypres, and Furnes. The allied army, commanded by the Duke of Cumberland, was unable to impede the progress of his arms; which, however, received a sudden and unexpected check from the success of Prince Charles of Lorraine, who, having found means to elude the vigilance of Marechal Coigné, had crossed the Rhine at the head of a numerous army, had secured the passes of Lorraine, and laid the whole country under contribution. Forty thousand men being detached to reinforce the army in Alsace, the allies ventured to approach the French commander, now acting on the defensive; but found no favourable opportunity of attack; and, after various inexplicable and inconsistent movements, they at length retired into winter quarters, without hazarding either siege or battle. In the mean time, all France was in consternation at the progress of the Austrians under the Prince of Lorraine, accompanied by Mareschal Traun. Their schemes of conquest, however, were entirely frustrated by the intelligence that the King of Prussia had a second time entered the dominions of the Queen of Hungary; that the city of Prague and all Bohemia had submitted almost without resistance, being entirely unsuspicious of danger, and consequently destitute of the proper means of defence.

Prince Charles immediately prepared to march to the relief of Bohemia, and repassed, by the light of the full moon, the Rhine, in the face of the French army, commanded by the Mareschals de Coigné, Noailles, and Belleisle, who perhaps had still less inclination than ability to prevent his departure.§ The Prince of Lorraine, under the direction of Mareschal Traun, proceeded from the banks of the Rhine, with

* The allurements held out to his Sardinian Majesty were, an English subsidy of 280,000*l.* per annum, the transfer of certain districts of the Milanese, and the prospect of gaining the marquisate of Finale; her pretensions to which, by an article of this treaty, her Hungarian Majesty most generously assigned over to this monarch; although an actual and unconditional cession of that territory to the republic of Genoa (to which it had anciently belonged, though wrested from her by the violence of the house of Austria) had been made by the late Emperor Charles VI. for the sum of 400,000 golden crowns, for which it had been previously mortgaged; and which sum, it is true, her Hungarian Majesty now condescended to grant her royal permission to the republic to receive from any power willing and able to repay it. The republic remonstrated in the strongest manner against a treaty so injurious to her right; protesting also, in a memorial presented to the imperial diet, against this transaction, and claiming the protection of that august body,—Finale being an ancient and acknowledged fief of the empire. Lord Carteret, however, who had accompanied King George to Germany, and negotiated this affair in person, treated the embassy of the republic with marked contempt, though the Queen of Hungary herself hesitated to insist upon the validity of her claim. In consequence of this injustice the senate of Genoa concluded a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with Spain, at Aranjuez, the following year—provoking, by this means, the implacable resentment of the house of Austria, which appeared to deem the absolute annihilation of the republic scarcely an adequate atonement for such an act of presumption. Her Hungarian Majesty had, in the course of the negotiation, remonstrated strongly against the policy of forcing the Genoese to become her enemies: but the necessity of her affairs, the impotence of the republic, and the superior importance of the Sardinian alliance, were urged by the British minister as sufficiently obviating all objections. The terms insisted on by his Sardinian Majesty were, the being put in possession of the Vigevanesco, with that part of the duchy of Pavia lying between the Po and the Thessin, with the privilege of navigating on the Thessin; together with the towns of Placentia and Bobbio, and their dependencies; and all the tract of land from the source of the Nura to the lake Maggiore and the frontiers of the Swiss cantons.

† So anxious was the court of Versailles to prevent the accession of their high mightinesses to the confederacy against them, that M. de Fenelon, ambassador at the Hague, offered to put Dunkirk into their hands during the war, as a proof and pledge of the sincerity and good faith of the French monarch. But the influence of England, supported by the efforts of the house of Orange and its partisans, predominated.

‡ In the declaration of France, the King of England was accused of a violation of his neutrality, and of having dissuaded the court of Vienna from acceding to any terms of accommodation. "The war," says the King of Prussia, "had changed its object. The original idea of self-preservation on the part of the house of Austria had given place to projects of conquest. The success of the court of Vienna had excited its ambition; and there was no longer room to doubt that the dethronement of the Emperor was in contemplation, and that the King of England secretly laboured to effect the same purpose." The pacific Fleury was now no more; and, in consequence of his demise, the court of Versailles appeared far less solicitous to terminate the subsisting differences: and formal reciprocal declarations of war were now published by the courts of Versailles and Vienna.

§ The King of Prussia acknowledges, that the real motive of this invasion was his apprehension that the French would be compelled to conclude such a peace as the Austrian arrogance should prescribe; and that the whole force of the Queen of Hungary would afterwards be employed in the recovery of Silesia; relying, as he tells us, little on the guarantee of England; and knowing that the King of England, in a letter written in his own hand to the Queen of Hungary, had, in allusion to the conquest of Silesia, made use of this remarkable expression—"Madame, ce qui est bon à prendre est bon à rendre."

rapid marches, into Bohemia, where the Austrians were re-inforced by twenty thousand Saxons; the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony, having signed with her Hungarian Majesty a convention for the mutual guarantee of their dominions. This sudden return of the Austrian army entirely disconcerted the projects of the Prussian monarch, who, having advanced with some indiscretion towards the frontiers of the Archduchy, was himself in imminent danger of having his retreat intercepted by the manœuvres of Mareschal Traun. Finding this cautious veteran constantly encamped in inaccessible situations, he had no other resource than to abandon his conquests in Bohemia, and to gain the passes of Silesia, which he effected not without great difficulty and loss, leaving his heavy artillery and magazines in the hands of the enemy.

Count Seckendorf, the imperial general, having been liberally supplied with subsidies from France, had found means to assemble an army, with which he made an irruption into Bavaria, and the Emperor once more took possession of Munich, his capital. This gleam of prosperity, however, was of short duration: knowing that the Austrians, now triumphant in Bohemia, were once more preparing to expel him from his hereditary dominions, destitute of resource, and overwhelmed with a succession of misfortunes, he expired at Munich, January 18, 1745, of a broken heart.

The Grand Seignor, Mahmout V. had observed with inviolable fidelity, during the troubles of the Queen of Hungary, the treaty recently concluded with the Emperor Charles VI. and at this period, from the spontaneous impulse of generosity, he offered his mediation, in order to effect a general accommodation among the contending potentates of Christendom. This offer, however, proved wholly unavailable: in a short time after the death of the Emperor, the Austrian armies entered the electorate of Bavaria; the young Elector, unable to contend against such superior force, was compelled to abandon his capital, and retire to Augsburg; and a treaty was soon afterwards concluded at Fuessen between him and the Queen of Hungary, by which an entire restitution of her conquests was made by that Princess, in consequence of a relinquishment of all claims on the Austrian succession on the part of the Elector, whose voice was also secured in favour of the grand Duke of Tuscany at the ensuing election of an Emperor of the Romans, and his acknowledgment of the validity of the electoral vote of Bohemia in the person of the Queen. The court of Vienna having now secured all the voices of the electoral college, those of Brandenburg and the Palatinate excepted, the grand Duke was, on the 2d of September 1745, declared Emperor of the Romans at Francfort, by the name of Francis I.*

Towards the close of the summer, the French court, desirous of causing an effectual diversion to the English army in Flanders, incited the son of the chevalier de St. George, usually stiled the Pretender, a young man of a sanguine and adventurous disposition, to risk an invasion of England, then almost destitute of troops, and in a state of apparent internal dissatisfaction.

Prince Charles landed in the western islands of Scotland in the month of August, the King of England being then at Hanover. The Lords of the Regency treated the first intelligence of his arrival as an idle tale; but, on receiving undoubted information that he had collected a considerable force, and was advancing southward, they issued a proclamation, offering a reward of thirty thousand pounds for his apprehension, and dispatched a messenger to the continent to hasten the return of his Majesty, making, also, a requisition of six thousand auxiliaries, which the Dutch were by treaty under obligation to furnish; and several British regiments were likewise recalled from the Netherlands. Instructions were sent to the Lords Lieutenants throughout the kingdom to array the militia in their several counties; commissions were issued to levy new regiments for the speedy and effectual suppression of this rebellion; many different corps of volunteers were incorporated; addresses were presented from all parts, testifying the utmost abhorrence of this attempt to subvert the government; and, notwithstanding the previous symptoms of discontent, the whole kingdom seemed united as one man in the moment of danger, in support of the national religion, laws, and constitution. Sir John Cope, commander-in-chief of the forces in North Britain, advanced at the head of what troops he could collect to Inverness, in order to oppose the further progress of this adventurer, who, in the mean time, marched by another route to the capital; which surrendering to him without resistance (September 16) he caused his father to be proclaimed King of Great Britain at the high cross of Edinburgh, declaring himself, at the same time, Regent of his dominions, and

* The campaign of 1744 had redounded little to the reputation of the Prussian arms, but the political views of the King were in a great measure answered by it. The French regained the ascendant on the Rhine, where they captured, after an obstinate resistance, the imperial city of Fribourg; and they were enabled to take the field in Flanders with redoubled force and vigour. The King of Prussia opened the campaign of 1745 in Silesia at the head of seventy thousand men; and the Austrians and Saxons having penetrated into that province through the defiles of Landshut, the two armies joined battle at Friedburg, and after a furious conflict, maintained from the early dawn of morning till noon, the Austrians were defeated with great loss; and, retiring into Bohemia, were followed thither by the King. The Prussian monarch however, conceiving himself abandoned by France, whose conquests on the Maese or the Scheld were, as he affirmed to his most Christian Majesty, of no more advantage to Prussia than victories on the Scamander, would willingly have accommodated his differences with the Empress Queen, as her Hungarian Majesty was now termed; but that Princess haughtily rejected his advances: and the Prince of Lorraine received positive orders from the court of Vienna to risk another engagement. An opportunity offering itself of attacking the Prussians to advantage in their camp of Sohr, near Staudentz, a second pitched battle took place on the 30th of September; and though the Austrians seemed at first to have a fair prospect of success, forcing their way into the interior of the Prussian camp, and even carrying off the military chest and the King's own cabinet, they were finally repulsed. In this battle, the brother Princes Ferdinand and Louis of Brunswick were personally opposed to each other, and fought with an emulation of valour. Notwithstanding this victory, his Prussian Majesty thought proper to retire from Bohemia, which he always considered as an ineligible and hazardous scene of military operation, and entered the rich and fertile country of Lusatia; and the Saxons being defeated, (December 15,) by the Prince of Anhalt at Kesseldorf, his Polish Majesty was obliged to abandon the city of Dresden, of which his Prussian Majesty took immediate possession: and, in consequence of the continued successes of that monarch, the Empress Queen was at length induced to sign a treaty of peace at Dresden, January 1746, by which the King of Prussia acknowledged the grand Duke of Tuscany as Emperor; the electorate of Saxony, in consideration of the payment of one million of German crowns, was restored to his Polish Majesty, and Silesia once more guaranteed to Prussia. Vehement remonstrances were made by France against this treaty, which she affected to resent as a violation of the most solemn engagements; but it is evident, that France and Prussia, from the commencement to the termination of their political connection, were actuated entirely by the same motives; and that neither observed any faith with the other further than it happened to be conformable to their own separate interest,—France was in reality too deeply engaged in her favourite projects of conquests in the Low Countries, to entertain any serious intention of granting efficacious assistance to the King of Prussia. Early in 1745, Mareschal Saxe, accompanied by the King and the Dauphin, took the field at the head of an immense army, and invested the important city of Tournay. The allies, commanded by the Duke of Cumberland, assisted by Mareschal Conigseg and the Prince of Waldeck, though far inferior in number, determined to make an effort for the relief of the place. On the 11th of May they advanced with great resolution to the attack of the French army, encamped under cover of the village of Fontenoy, and protected by a prodigious fire from the batteries they had planted on all sides. The enterprise was considered as a singular instance of military rashness; but such was the intrepidity displayed by the English and Hanoverian infantry, that the French were driven beyond their lines, and in imminent danger of a defeat: the Dutch failing in their attempt on the village of Fontenoy, and the English General not making, as it is said, the proper use of his first success, by dividing the column of attack after he had broken the centre of the French, Mareschal Saxe had time to bring up his corps de reserve, and the English found themselves enclosed as it were within a circle of fire, from the redoubts which they had already passed, the masked batteries planted on each side, and the artillery, which, under the direction of Mareschal Saxe himself, played upon them with dreadful execution in front. In this situation, the most heroic efforts were totally unavailing, and the allies were compelled to retreat with the loss of more than ten thousand men, to which that of the French was supposed nearly equal. The extent of the misfortune, however, could be known only by the consequences: Tournay surrendered, after a gallant defence, by an honourable capitulation; Ghent and Bruges were captured by a coup de main; Ostend, Dendermond, Nieuport, and Aeth, were successively reduced; and the allies retired for safety beyond the canal of Antwerp: and, at the end of the campaign, the King of France made a triumphal entry into his capital.

fixing his head quarters at the palace of Holyrood-house, the royal residence of his ancestors. On receiving this intelligence, Sir John Cope hastened back to Edinburgh, and on the 20th of September encamped with his army, consisting of about three thousand regular troops, near the village of Preston-pans, in the environs of the capital. Early in the next morning, he was attacked, sword in hand, by the Prince Regent, at the head of about an equal number of Highlanders, who, in less than ten minutes, entirely broke the King's troops, un-accustomed to their ferocious and terrific mode of fighting. Sir John Cope was heavily censured for his presumption and ignorance on this occasion. Colonel Gardiner, an officer of distinguished merit, and himself a native of Scotland, remonstrating with him on the impropriety of the disposition he had made, was treated with neglect and rudeness, and predicted a total defeat; which, however, he disdained to survive, falling gloriously, covered with wounds, in the midst of the enemy, and in sight of his own mansion. In consequence of this victory, the pretended Prince Regent saw himself absolute master of Scotland, a few fortresses excepted. He received large supplies from France, and was joined by the Lords Kilmarnock, Cromarty, Balmerino, and many other persons of rank and distinction; and the enterprise, romantic as it originally appeared, began to wear a serious aspect. The Campbells, the Monroes, the Macdonalds, and other loyal clans, assembled, however, in arms, in defence of the government, under the Earl of Loudon; and an army was collected in England under General Wade, who received orders to march to the north, and proceeded as far as Newcastle. The Pretender, however, resolving to try his fortune in the south, took the route of Carlisle, which surrendered to him in November. Another army, under Sir John Ligonier, was now forming in Staffordshire; notwithstanding which, the Prince determined to proceed, hoping for a co-operation from a body of French forces on the southern coast, and not doubting but he should be joined by great numbers of the English malcontents in his progress through the kingdom. In this expectation, however he was grievously disappointed: at Manchester, only, was he received with any demonstrations of joy. Crossing the Mersey at Stockport, he advanced through Macclesfield and Congleton to Derby, which was the extreme point of his progress; for, understanding that the King had determined to take the field in person, and to set up the standard of England on Finchley Common,—he took a sudden resolution, though he had actually advanced within a few days' march of the metropolis, to provide for his safety by a retreat. This amounted to a virtual relinquishment of his object. No sooner was the resolution formed for retreating to the north, than it was carried into effect with almost incredible celerity. Abandoning Derby December 6, their vanguard entered Manchester on the 9th, and on the 19th they reached Carlisle; and, after re-inforcing the garrison at that place, the rebel army crossed the rivers Eden and Solway into Scotland, with all their artillery and military stores, eluding the attempts of both the adverse armies to intercept them on this memorable march, in which no violence was offered, no outrage or rapine committed, in a country abounding with plunder, and presenting every temptation to the unrestrained indulgence of military rapacity. On the 21st of December Carlisle was invested by the Duke of Cumberland, and it surrendered on the 30th at discretion. In the mean time, the Prince Regent proceeded to Glasgow, from which place he exacted heavy contributions, in revenge for the loyalty they had displayed in the course of the rebellion; after which he invested the castle of Stirling.

General Hawley, at the head of the royal forces in Scotland, now marched to Falkirk, to relieve that fortress by an attack upon the rebels. On the 17th of January (1746,) however, the General was himself unexpectedly attacked by them, and after sustaining for some time a disorderly and irregular fight, was compelled to a precipitate retreat; though it had been customary with him to boast, that, with two regiments of dragoons, he would drive the rebel army from one end of the kingdom to the other. The Duke of Cumberland having arrived at Edinburgh with large re-inforcements, now took upon him the command, and moving towards Linlithgow, the rebels not only abandoned the siege of Stirling castle, but passed the Forth with evident symptoms of consternation; and the Prince Pretender still continuing to advance northward, the Duke, after securing the important passes of Stirling and Perth, advanced to Aberdeen. Early in April, the Duke commenced his march from Aberdeen, and on the 12th he passed the deep and rapid river Spey, in sight of the advanced posts of the enemy, without opposition. At Nairne, his royal highness received intelligence that Prince Charles had advanced from Inverness to Culloden, in order to give him battle. On the 16th, the Duke left Nairne early in the morning, and, after a march of nine miles, perceived the rebel army drawn up in thirteen divisions. About one in the afternoon the engagement began, and the Highlanders attempted, as at Preston-pans, to break the royal troops, by rushing down with their broad swords and Lochaber axes; but being now prepared for this mode of fighting, they received the enemy with fixed bayonets, and kept up a continual firing by platoons, which did prodigious execution. Being thrown into visible disorder, the cavalry of the royal army attacked them in flank; in less than half an hour, the battle was converted into a general rout; and, orders having been issued to give no quarter, vast numbers were slain in the pursuit.*

The Pretender escaped with great difficulty from the field of battle; and after wandering for the space of many months a wretched and solitary fugitive among woods and lakes and mountains, and passing through a series of the most extraordinary and romantic adventures, he found means, on the 20th of September, to embark on board a small vessel, which conveyed him to Morlaix, in Bretagne. Thus ended the last effort of the Stuart family to re-ascend their forfeited throne. The executions which ensued on the suppression of this rebellion seemed much more numerous than the necessity of the case required; and the Lords Balmerino, Lovat, and Kilmarnock, suffered the sentence of decapitation on Tower-hill; as did also the Earl of Derwentwater, without any form of trial, being arraigned on the sentence passed against him in 1716. Only the Earl of Cromarty received a pardon. Both Houses of Parliament presented addresses of congratulation to his Majesty, and of thanks to his royal highness the Duke on this auspicious occasion; and the sum of twenty-five thousand pounds per annum was added, by the House of Commons, to the revenue of the Duke.

On the Continent, the triumphs of Mareschal Saxe in Flanders still continued. The King of France, again taking the field in person, invested the city of Antwerp, which surrendered after a very slight resistance. Mons made a better defence, but was compelled to capitulate before the end of June: and St. Guislain and Charleroy shared the fate of Mons and Antwerp. On the 2d of December the trenches were opened before Namur, and on the 23d that strong and important fortress surrendered to the arms of France. On the 30th of September Mareschal Saxe crossed the Jaar, behind which river the allies were posted, near the village of Roucoux, in order to force them to a battle; and after an obstinate conflict, in which the Prince of Waldeck displayed heroic bravery, the allies

* It has been affirmed, that unnecessary and wanton barbarities were committed on the persons and families of the rebels long after the cessation of resistance; and that the Duke of Cumberland sullied the glory of his victory, by displaying a savage thirst of revenge, and a courage untinctured with the feelings of humanity. As, however, the temper and conduct of this Prince were upon no other occasion tainted with this imputation, it seems candid to believe, either that he was transported into these temporary excesses by that rage which is so frequent and horrid a concomitant and characteristic of civil discord; or that he really conceived these severities to be necessary for the prevention of further resistance on the part of the rebels.

were

were obliged to abandon their posts with the loss of five thousand men and thirty pieces of artillery, and retire to Maestricht: this action terminated the campaign.

The States of Holland began now to be seriously alarmed at the progress of the French, and declared themselves determined to carry on the war with increased energy. In March 1747, the allied forces took the field under the command of the Duke of Cumberland; the Prince of Waldeck and the Mareschal Bathiani conducting the Dutch and Austrian troops under him. The whole army amounted to more than one hundred thousand men; but, on account of the unusual inclemency of the weather, Mareschal Saxe remained in his cantonments, contenting himself with obstructing the supplies of the allied army, and publicly declaring he would teach the Duke of Cumberland, when his forces were sufficiently diminished by hunger and sickness, that it is the first duty of a General to provide for the health and preservation of his troops. In April, the French commander detached Count Lowendahl, at the head of thirty thousand men, to invade Dutch Flanders; and Sluys, Sas-van-Ghent, and Hulst, were quickly reduced. The French General now prepared for a descent on Zealand; and the whole Dutch nation being seized with extreme consternation, violent popular commotions took place throughout all the provinces. The people at large insisted upon the Prince of Orange's being immediately invested with the dignity of Stadtholder; the States-General not choosing, or not daring, to oppose the general sense of the nation, the Prince was on the second of May (1747) declared stadtholder, and Captain-General and Admiral of the United Provinces; and, in the course of the ensuing year, the dignity was made hereditary in the house of Orange. Upon this change in affairs, many spirited resolutions passed in the assembly of the States: an augmentation of the army was decreed, the peasants were armed and exercised, inquiries were instituted into the conduct of the governors who had surrendered the towns on the frontier, and hostilities were denounced against France both by sea and land. Mareschal Saxe, however, advanced with the grand army to Louvaine; and the Duke of Cumberland took post at Laffeldt, near Val, to cover the city of Maestricht. The Mareschal determined upon a general attack, in order to dislodge the enemy, and open the way to Maestricht. The allies defended themselves with great resolution and perseverance; the French were repeatedly broken and dispersed; but fresh brigades continually succeeded those which retired, and the village was three times lost and recovered. At length, the line being dangerously disordered by an impetuous assault of the French cavalry, the Duke ordered a retreat, which was effected with inconsiderable loss, chiefly through the extraordinary intrepidity and presence of mind of Sir John Ligonier, who, at the head of a few British regiments of dragoons and squadrons of imperial horse, arrested the pursuit of the whole French army. He was himself, his horse being killed under him, made prisoner; but the regiments he commanded retired unbroken from the field. The allies, however, notwithstanding their defeat, were able to cover Maestricht from attack; and Mareschal Saxe, perceiving his original project disconcerted, detached Count Lowendahl, with about fifty thousand men, to lay siege to Bergen-op-Zoom, the strongest fortification of Dutch Brabant, and accounted almost impregnable. The enemy appeared before the walls on the 12th of July, and from this time to the middle of September a tremendous scene of carnage was exhibited. Baron Cronstrom being appointed to the command of the fortress, repeated and desperate sallies were made by the garrison, and mines sprung with horrible success. It was generally believed that Count Lowendahl would be obliged to abandon his enterprise; but some inconsiderable breaches being made in a ravelin and two adjoining bastions, the Count determined upon an assault. The governor, not imagining the breaches practicable, had taken no precautions to guard against the attack, which was made with astonishing intrepidity on the night of the 16th of September. The success of the attempt justified its apparent rashness. The French gained the ramparts, and formed, before the garrison could assemble. The Baron, awakened from his sleep, was informed that the French were in possession of the town, and with difficulty effected his own escape. Thus the enemy became entire masters of the navigation of the Scheldt. Lowendahl was promoted, in consequence of this success, to the rank of Mareschal of France, and the King of France returned once more in triumph to his capital.

The French, however, began to feel the continuation of the war extremely burdensome. They had suffered great losses at sea; their navy had sustained repeated shocks; their commerce was ruined; their finances exhausted; the war in Italy had proved disastrous; the views of the French monarch in Germany were entirely frustrated; the election of a Stadtholder had armed against him the whole power of Holland; and he knew that the courts of London and Vienna were in treaty with the Czarina, who had actually issued orders for the march of forty thousand Russians from the banks of the Wolga to the borders of the Rhine. His most Christian Majesty, therefore, made direct and repeated advances of accommodation to the courts of London and of the Hague; and though they were at first received with coldness, it was finally agreed that a congress should be opened at Aix la Chapelle, which accordingly met early in the ensuing spring, (March 1748;) the Earl of Sandwich and Sir Thomas Robinson acting as ambassadors plenipotentiary from the King of Great Britain. Mareschal Saxe, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the allies, invested the city of Maestricht; but the preliminaries of peace being signed in the space of a few weeks, hostilities were suspended, and the city, which had been defended by the governor, Baron d'Alva, with such skill and gallantry that the besiegers had made little progress, was happily preserved.

A. D. 1743.] It is now proper to return to the domestic and political transactions of Britain. After the resignation of Sir Robert Walpole, Lord Carteret succeeded to all the plenitude of ministerial power, and he even seemed to enjoy the favour and confidence of the sovereign in a degree superior to his predecessor. The nation, however, heavily complained that the war with Spain was become a secondary object, or rather was wholly neglected, while the affairs of the Continent only engrossed the attention of the court, and of the minister. An address having been moved in the House of Peers, (December 1743,) in reply to the King's speech from the throne, recommending "measures of vigour," and demanding supplies to enable him to enter into such engagements with other powers as might be necessary for the support of his allies, and the restoration of the balance of Europe; the Earl of Chesterfield rose, and expressed his hope that by "vigorous measures" were not intended such wild attempts and romantic expeditions as might hazard the national honour and safety, without the possibility of advantage; that we were not called upon to squander millions, and stain the fields of the Continent with the blood of our countrymen, without being fully informed concerning the end and object of the war; that we were not to stand alone against the united power of the house of Bourbon, and sacrifice our lives and fortunes for those who will not endeavour to defend themselves. The minister, however, in a speech of great ability and eloquence, attempted to defend the measures of his administration, and the address was carried.—A motion having been made in the House of Commons for the discharge of the Hanoverian mercenaries, Mr. Pitt contended, that there existed no necessity of hiring auxiliary troops, since it had never been shown that either justice or policy required us to engage in the quarrels of the Continent. He declared, in animadverting on that paragraph of the King's speech which called the attention of Parliament to the late change of affairs in Europe, that we had indeed felt a very remarkable change; from one extreme we had run to the utmost verge of another. Our former minister betrayed the interest of his country by his pusillanimity; our present minister sacrificed it by his Quixotism. Instead of acceding to every, treaty however dishonourable, we now refuse to listen to any, however reasonable. In other respects the nation had experienced no change, notwithstanding the change of a few individuals in the administration; for the same prodigal, corrupt, adulatory spirit still pervaded all the departments of government.

The same question which had been agitated with equal or greater warmth in the House of Peers, was, in the course of the session, renewed with a slight variation in point of form. The Earl of Halifax expressed, in warm and eloquent language, his indignation that England should be condemned to waste the treasure and the lives of its inhabitants in quarrels which either did not at all regard its interests, or regarded them only remotely and consequentially. Lord Carteret, who entered into an elaborate defence of his ministerial conduct, declared, "That a proposition to withdraw all our forces from the Continent, and, instead of courting danger in foreign countries, to sleep in security till we are awakened by an alarm upon our own coasts, would be far less unreasonable than the motion actually before the House; for, doubtless, it is better to enjoy peace, however precarious, than to carry on a war with certainty of defeat, and to rush into the field of battle only to be overborne by the number of our enemies."—"It is evident, upon the whole, then, my Lords," observed the minister, at the close of his speech, "that the war has been conducted with wisdom and success—that the troops of Hanover were not retained but by the counsel and authority of the legislature—that they have been eminently useful in contributing to the expulsion of the armies of France—that, though objections more worthy of notice could be produced, those troops cannot, at this juncture, be dismissed, because other troops cannot be obtained so soon as the exigencies of the war require." The question was at length put, and the motion rejected by a majority of eighty-six Peers against forty-six: but a strong protest was signed by the minority.

During this session, the House of Commons sent up to the Lords a bill making it high treason to correspond with the sons of the Pretender. On the commitment of this bill, the Lord Chancellor Hardwicke moved that the committee be instructed to receive a clause for continuing the penalties and forfeitures legally incurred by the descendants of traitors, to the death of the sons of the Pretender, and which, by the operation of an act passed in the reign of Queen Anne, expired with the Pretender himself. The Duke of Bedford, in a very able manner, stated his reasons for refusing his assent to the motion.* The clause was also vigorously and eloquently opposed by the Lords Talbot, Chesterfield, and others—and defended by the Lords Carteret and Hardwicke, and Secker, Bishop of Oxford, though a measure flagrantly incompatible with the mild and benevolent spirit of Christianity. The clause was carried; but, against it, a strong and animated protest was entered.

When returned to the Commons, with this new and unexpected clause, the bill excited great dissatisfaction and opposition. Mr. Fazakerley, its original mover, expressed, indignantly, his detestation of the clause added by the Lords. The House, however, agreed to the amendment, by a majority of eighty voices.†

Admiral

* His Grace "declared his zeal for the security of the constitution, and of the settlement of the crown in the present family, to be in no degree inferior to that of any of their Lordships; and he expressed his conviction that a Prince forced upon us by the armies and fleets of France would be only the viceroy of the monarch to whom he owes his exaltation. Nevertheless," said this nobleman, "Your Lordships will not be surprised that I am alarmed at the prospect of a law like this. I, whose family has suffered so lately the deprivation of its rank and fortune by the tyranny of a court—whose grandfather was cut off by an unjust prosecution—and whose father was condemned for many years to see himself divested of the rights of his birth, which were at length restored to him by more equitable judges;—it is surely reasonable, my Lords, that I should oppose the extension of penalties to the descendants of offenders, who have scarcely myself escaped the blast of an attainder. Whatever may be the malice of our enemies, the ill success of past attempts is a convincing proof that government can have no just cause of fear; that recourse, therefore, need not be had to new degrees of severity, or the enacting penal laws of an extraordinary kind, to prevent that which experience has shown impossible to be accomplished. On the present occasion, my Lords, the people have demonstrated their loyalty by innumerable addresses from all parts, drawn up in terms expressive of the firmest fidelity and the warmest affection—professions which surely deserve far other return than the severity of a penal law, by which one person is condemned to suffer for the crime of another. If it be necessary, my Lords, that subjects should obey their governors, it is no less necessary that governors should not harass their subjects by causeless suspicion; for this will certainly tend to weaken their affections—it may incite them to violate their duties. The multiplicity of penal laws, the establishment of armies, the distribution of pensions, are transitory and uncertain supports of government, which the first blasts of discontent may drive before it, and which have a tendency to produce that rage which they cannot furnish the means of resisting. Ten thousand penal laws cannot so much contribute to the establishment of the present royal family as one act of confidence, condescension, or bounty, by which the affections of the people may be conciliated. We are not, my Lords, to appease the suspicions of the throne by sacrificing the safety or happiness of the people: we are, indeed, to support our sovereign, but not by such means as to destroy the ends for which sovereignty was established—the public welfare and common security. How, then, can we assent to a measure which may involve thousands in undeserved misery, by punishing them for crimes which they did not commit, and which it was not in their power to prevent—and inflicting penalties in order to enrich by forfeitures the minions of a court? But exclusive of these considerations, and to advert to an objection of a different nature, what evidence exists by which it can be ascertained that there never will come a time, in which a superstitious, ambitious, or tyrannical Prince may once more attempt the subversion of the rights and liberties of the kingdom? If then a time so fatal shall ever arrive, and another revolution be necessary, how must a law like this damp the ardour of that patriotism by which all revolutions have been accomplished! Who will be found hardy enough to oppose the crown, when not only himself but his whole posterity are involved in the danger and ruin of a failure? We are to reflect, that the King may not only be in danger from his people, but that the people may be in danger from their King: and as, on the one hand, no privilege should be conferred tending to the encouragement of popular sedition; on the other, no prerogative ought to be endured which may incite to acts of royal oppression. The dependance of the monarch and the subject ought to be on reciprocal affection and mutual assistance; and if I am desirous of securing the throne, it is not by disarming the people, but by placing them as guards before it."

† This year (1743) the Swedes terminated an unsuccessful war with Russia, by a peace signed at Abo, by which they were totally detached from their political connection with France. At the death of the last monarch of Sweden, the celebrated Charles XII. (A. D. 1718,) who had governed with a sway the most arbitrary and imperious, and whose rash and romantic enterprises had reduced his country to the verge of ruin, Sweden found herself in a situation the most favourable for finally abolishing despotism, and establishing a free and equal government on a solid and permanent basis. A diet being immediately convoked, the throne of Sweden was declared vacant—Charles having died without issue, and the claim of his sisters to the succession being barred, conformably to a fundamental law of the kingdom, by their previous marriage. The states, therefore, determined to make an offer of the crown to Ulrica Eleanora, consort of Frederic hereditary Prince of Hesse Cassel, subsequently associated in the government, to the exclusion of the Duke of Holstein, son of the elder sister, on the express condition that this Princess should declare her readiness to hold the crown in virtue of a free election; and should take an oath to adhere to the new formula or model of government, now, by the authority of the nation, solemnly instituted. "The counsellors and states of the kingdom assembled, having (as they express themselves) experienced the sad consequences of that arbitrary power which has so much weakened and injured the kingdom to the almost irreparable ruin of us all, have seriously and unanimously resolved to abolish entirely a power which has proved so prejudicial." The diet or states-general of the kingdom of Sweden consists of four distinct chambers or houses—the nobles, the clergy, the burghers, and the peasants. These, agreeably to the constitution now established, were to be convoked every three years, or more frequently if occasion required; should the King, or Senate in his absence, neglect to assemble them at the expiration of this term, or even should they not convoke them on the very day the states had, the last time they were assembled, chosen to appoint for their next meeting, these should then have a right to assemble of themselves; and, whatever the King or senate should have done in the mean time, was to be considered as void: The time specified for the shortest legal duration of the diet was three months; but the power of dissolution was vested in themselves alone. While the states were assembled, they were in fact possessed of the whole supreme power; the authority of the King and senate was then suspended—they became mere ciphers, having little or no share in the public transactions but what consisted simply in affixing their seals and signatures to whatever the diet should think proper to resolve. The legislative power the States reserved at all times wholly to themselves, the King and the senate not even possessing a negative on those resolutions which directly attacked the regal and senatorial rights. The following powers were also vested in the States alone: those of declaring war or making peace—that of altering the standard of the coin—whenever a vacancy happened in the senate, that of presenting to the King three persons, one

Admiral Matthews, at this time, commanded the British naval force in the Mediterranean. The Corsicans having revolted from the dominion of Genoa, and elected a German adventurer as their sovereign, by the name of King Theodore, were supported and encouraged by this commander, in revenge for the partiality shown by the Genoese to the French and Spanish arms in Italy. Stores having been landed at Civita Vecchia for the use of the Spanish army under the Count de Gages, the British Admiral declared it to be a violation of the neutrality professed by his holiness the Pope, and threatened a bombardment of that city; but desisted in consequence of the interposition of his Sardinian Majesty. The commerce of France and Spain was interrupted, many prizes made, their coasts kept in continual alarm, and the combined squadrons of the two powers were blocked up for several successive months in the harbour of Toulon. On the 9th of February, 1744, they were at last perceived standing out of the road, to the number of thirty-four sail of the line. The English Admiral immediately weighed, and an engagement ensued, which, notwithstanding the great superiority of the British fleet, proved indecisive; and it was afterwards the subject of much discussion. It is admitted that Matthews behaved with heroic gallantry; but he was very ill seconded by some of his officers, particularly by Admiral Lestock, who, with his whole division, remained at a great distance astern. It is not pretended that this officer was really deficient in courage; but he had long been upon very ill terms with his commander, whom he affected to despise, and whose signals on the day of battle he affirmed to be unintelligible and inconsistent. Admiral Matthews, on his arrival at Minorca, suspended Lestock for disobedience, and sent him as a prisoner to England, where he in return accused and recriminated upon his superior. These proceedings became the subject of Parliamentary investigation; and a court martial was appointed to try the delinquents. It appears that the object of de Court, the French commander, whose ships greatly out-sailed those of the British squadron, being to avoid an engagement, the English commander was compelled to commence the attack before the line was completely formed: and he directed his principal effort against the Spanish division, which, sailing in the rear of the French, and at some distance, he endeavoured to cut off—being himself, in the Namur, closely engaged with the Spanish Admiral don Navarro, in the Royal Philip, an immense ship of one hundred and fourteen guns. Admiral Lestock was at this time five miles astern, suffering, by an obstinate adherence to the signal for the line of battle, then flying at the same time with the signal for a close engagement, the rearmost ships of the Spanish squadron to pass him: on which Admiral Matthews, though bravely seconded by Captain Cornewall, in the Marlborough, who gloriously fell in the action, and other ships of his own division, was obliged to relinquish his prey at a moment when he flattered himself that she could not have escaped him, being, according to his public letter, "within musket shot of the Royal Philip, then lying a mere wreck, when the sternmost ships of the enemy came up and tore him to pieces." In the result, Admiral Lestock, to the general surprise and indignation, was honourably acquitted, and Admiral Matthews declared incapable of serving for the future in his Majesty's navy. The King is said to have expressed in warm terms his disapprobation of this decision; and, when an elaborate technical vindication of the sentence of the court-martial was offered, he indignantly replied, "that he knew but one of whom his Majesty was bound to make choice of to fill the vacant office—lastly, that of dismissing any member of the senate whose conduct they disapproved. During the session of the diet, a standing secret committee was chosen, selected from the three orders of nobles, clergy, and burghers, of which one half were nobles—the order of peasants being too mean and insignificant to be associated in this commission—by which the ordinary functions of the senate were almost entirely superseded, and the executive powers of the government exclusively exercised. With regard to the judicial power, the States assumed to themselves a right of exercising that also, whenever they thought proper, by taking at pleasure causes out of the high courts of justice established by law, to try them before a temporary tribunal erected by themselves, and composed of their own members. Nothing, therefore, could be more formidable than the power of this assembly, or more subversive of liberty; as, in reality, it united within itself the legislative, judicial, and executive powers—and as the province and jurisdiction of the occasional tribunal comprehended all cases of treason, sedition, and public libel, it was evidently, at the same time, both judge and party. Even during the intervals of the diets, the King was little more than a cipher of state, and was distinguished from the other senators, consisting of fourteen in number, only by the privilege of a double voice in the first instance, and of a casting vote in case of an equality of voices. The senate were empowered to assemble themselves whenever they thought proper, and to transact the national business whether the King were present or not; and to their resolutions his Majesty was obliged to affix his signature. The great employments of the state were conferred by a majority of voices in the senate; and to others of inferior importance three persons were nominated by the senate, one of whom the King was obliged to appoint. Thus the outward pomp and decorations of Majesty were almost all that remained of a prerogative lately so formidable. The fixed policy of the leading men originally concerned in framing the new form of government, who were persons of virtue and probity, and, in all probability, far from being sensible of its imperfections, was, to renounce all ambition of foreign conquests, and assiduously to cultivate the friendship of Russia, the superiority of whose power they had so fatally experienced. The influence of Russia continued, with little interruption, to predominate in their councils till the meeting of the diet in 1738; when, through the profusion of French gold previously distributed among its members, a great majority appeared determined to abandon the alliance of Russia, and to enter into a strict connection with the court of Versailles; which flattered them with the chimerical hope of recovering, by a rupture with the court of St. Petersburgh, their long lost provinces. At the instance of the French minister, war was actually declared by Sweden against Russia, without any just reasons or even plausible pretences; the real motive on the part of France being, to prevent the Czarina from interposing in the affairs of the empire. This war was undertaken by Sweden at a time when the armies of Russia were returning triumphant from the Turkish campaigns; and the success was such as might be reasonably expected: the Swedish army in Finland was destroyed, and the whole of that country lost. The Generals Lewenhaupt and Buddenbroek were sacrificed to the fury of a faction. The government of Sweden, alarmed at the rapid progress of the Russians, were compelled to solicit a peace, which was granted upon very moderate terms; Russia restoring the whole of her conquests, a small district to the eastward of the Kymen only excepted; and, in return, the Swedes renewed their alliance with Russia, and agreed to appoint Adolphus Frederic, Bishop of Lubec, a Prince of the house of Holstein, nearly related to the Empress Elizabeth, successor to the present King; the young Duke of Holstein, grandson of the elder sister of Ulrica, being destined to the succession of Russia, as nephew to the Empress, on his previous and formal renunciation of all claim to the crown of Sweden. Though France had thus lost one useful ally, she made vigorous efforts to indemnify herself by the acquisition of another—the contiguous kingdom of Denmark. From the memorable æra in which the Danes made a voluntary surrender of their ancient liberties to the monarch, the Kings of Denmark had been possessed of authority not inferior to that of any sovereigns in Christendom; and the want of ability, rather than of inclination, had since prevented them from making a more conspicuous figure in the general history of Europe; as they never appeared reluctant or scrupulous in embracing any favourable opportunity of aggrandisement. Christiern V. who succeeded to the throne A. D. 1670, waged unsuccessful war with the Swedes, in the vain hope of recovering the beautiful provinces of Halland, Schonen, and Bleking, lost by his father Frederic III. and ceded to Sweden by the treaty of Roschild, 1658. Christiern dying in 1699 was succeeded by his son Frederic IV. who, joining the confederacy against Charles XII. was besieged by that monarch in his capital, and compelled to submit to the terms dictated by Sweden, under the mediation of England and Holland, at the treaty of Travendahl. After the decline of that monarch's fortunes, Frederic renewed the war, and seized upon the duchies of Bremen, Verden, and Sleswic; the latter of which was guaranteed to Denmark by King George I. in return for the cession of the two former to Hanover. This monarch dying A. D. 1730 was succeeded by Christiern VI. a sagacious and pacific Prince, who aspired, nevertheless, when the succession to the throne of Sweden was vacant, to revive the ancient and celebrated union of Calmar; and to combine, by an indissoluble federation, the three Scandinavian kingdoms into one empire, under one head, in the person of his son. Flattered with the aid and assistance of France in the accomplishment of this great object of his ambition, he relinquished, at this period, the alliance, and refused the subsidies, of Great Britain, in order to connect himself with that rival power. But, though the idea of this union was very popular in Sweden, and was supported by a very strong party in the diet, the opposing politics of Russia proved finally successful; and the King of Denmark desisted from the further prosecution of a project which it was become too hazardous to attempt to enforce. The Czarina declared, that, if the Swedes were attacked, she would assist them with the whole force of her empire. The good understanding between Denmark and Great Britain was, immediately on the relinquishment of this visionary scheme, restored and cemented by the marriage of Frederic, Prince Royal of Denmark, with Louisa, youngest daughter of his Britannic Majesty, which took place towards the conclusion of the year 1743. The King of Denmark survived this alliance, which was productive of general satisfaction to the inhabitants of both kingdoms, but little of naval phraseology; but this," said he, "I know, that Matthews did fight, and that Lestock did not."*

Lord Carteret, now Earl of Granville, had insinuated himself so far into the good graces of his sovereign as to excite, in a high degree, the apprehension and dislike of the Duke of Newcastle and his brother, Mr. Pelham, who secretly intrigued with the popular leaders in Parliament to effect the downfal of this minister. The Earl, comprehending the nature and extent of the combination against him, and sensible of his own unpopularity, heightened by the ill success of the war, avoided the conflict by a voluntary resignation (in November) of his employments; in which he was followed by Mr. Sandys, created Lord Sandys, and various others. Mr. Pelham, who on the death of Lord Wilmington had succeeded to the direction of the board of Treasury, was now nominated Chancellor of the Exchequer, and may be considered from this period as first minister. The Earl of Chesterfield was appointed to the government of Ireland, the Duke of Bedford placed at the head of the Admiralty, the Lords Gower and Cobham re-instated in their former posts, and, after an interval of delay and reluctance on the part of the court, Mr. Pitt constituted paymaster of the forces, and sworn a member of the privy council. Several of the Tories were admitted to offices in consequence of this coalition of parties; and Sir John Hynde Cotton and Sir John Phelps, were—for a time of short duration indeed, "a little month"—transformed into courtiers and placemen.

Parliament met in December; and it soon appeared that the result of the late changes was by no means unfavourable to the views of the court. However, the House was moved, (January 1745,) that an act made in the fourth year of Edward III. intituled "A Parliament shall be holden once every year," and also that an act made in the thirty-sixth year of the reign of King Edward III. intituled "A Parliament shall be holden once every year," shall be read; and the acts being read accordingly, Mr. Carew arose, and declared his determination to bring to a decisive test the sincerity of those professions which the ministers of the crown recently appointed to their offices had, for so many successive years, accustomed themselves to repeat within the walls of that House; and, from the fate of the question he was about to propose, a judgment might be formed whether the present ministers themselves merited those severe appellations which they had so lavishly bestowed upon their predecessors. It was not enough, he said, for the satisfaction of the impartial and intelligent public, that the new ministers should give a simple assent to the motion he had in contemplation; for, if they had coalesced with persons whose influence was, upon trial, found sufficiently powerful to defeat all efforts of political reform, it was incumbent upon them immediately to relinquish those offices which they had so precipitately accepted without any stipulations in favour of the public, and unreservedly to declare against those with whom they had so rashly united. After he had entered into the subject at great length, Mr. Carew concluded with moving for leave to bring in a bill to enforce the calling of a new Parliament every year after the expiration of this present Parliament. This motion was very ably seconded by Mr. Sydenham, and opposed by Sir William Yonge, Secretary at War; but the principal ministers of the crown observed a profound silence; and, on the division, the question was negatived by a majority of thirty-two voices only, in a House of two hundred and sixty-three members. No attempt at Parliamentary reform, in any shape, after this, was made for thirteen years, when a motion for shortening the duration of Parliaments was negatived almost without a discussion.

The Earl of Chesterfield, before his departure for the government of Ireland, was invested with the character of ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the States-General, to endeavour to prevail upon their high mightinesses to take a more active and decisive part in the war. Incessantly urged and incited by the whole power and influence of the Orange faction, the States at length acceded to the substance of the ambassador's proposals, and engaged to maintain an army of fifty thousand men in the field, exclusive of garrisons; but, torn by intestine division and animosity, the terms of the treaty were, after the conclusion of it, little attended to; and though the proportion of expence to be borne by Holland was mitigated from two-fifths to one-third, the danger to which the republic was exposed was neither sufficiently urgent nor obvious to excite a spirit of national ardour or unanimity. On the Earl of Chesterfield's return from this embassy, he repaired to his government; and, during his continuance in that high office, he executed the duties of it with a vigilance, attention, and fidelity, which gave the most perfect satisfaction to the Irish nation.†

In the course of this summer, a great number of rich prizes were captured from the enemy both in the East and West Indies; but the principal achievement was the conquest of the island of Cape Breton, in North America. This enterprise originated with the inhabitants of the province of New England; and the plan proposed by them having been approved by the government, Admiral Warren, commanding the British fleet in those seas, was commanded to co-operate with them. Six thousand colonial troops were embarked from Boston, which, with eight hundred marines from on board the fleet, constituted the whole of the land force. With such courage and vigour, however, did these raw and undisciplined troops, under the conduct of the British engineers, carry on their approaches, and with such skill and judgment were their operations seconded by the Admiral, that, in about eight weeks after the commencement of the siege, the fortress and city of Louisburg, and the whole island of Cape Breton, surrendered. The Americans, who were freed by this conquest from a dangerous neighbour, acquired great and deserved applause on the occasion.

When Parliament met, in the month of January, 1746, his Majesty declared his regret at being obliged to have recourse to his people for further aids; and at the same time, his confidence in their zeal and unanimity in support of the public credit and safety. A new convulsion in the ministry, however, for some time, retarded the progress of the supplies;‡ but, afterwards, they were granted with more than usual profusion. About one hundred and twenty thousand men, land forces, seamen, and marines, were provided for; three hundred thousand pounds were voted to the King of Sardinia; and four hundred thousand pounds to the Queen of Hungary, though she had fully surmounted her political embarrassments. Subsidies also were granted to the Dutch, Hessians, Saxons, Hanoverians, the electors of Mentz and Cologne; and the whole was crowned with a vote of credit and confidence for the doms, little more than two years. The Princess Mary, third daughter to the King of England, had, at a period somewhat anterior to the events now related, been married to Frederic, Prince of Hesse Cassel, nephew to the King of Sweden, and presumptive heir to the Landgraviate.

* In July, Sir John Balchen, an officer of great merit, sailed from Spithead with a strong squadron, in quest of a French fleet expected to depart about this time from the harbour of Brest. In the bay of Biscay he encountered a violent storm, by which the fleet was entirely scattered, and the Admiral's own ship, the Victory, a new and beautiful first rate, with eleven hundred men on board, foundered at sea, near the rocks of Alderney; and the whole crew, with all the officers and their commander, most unfortunately perished.

† In the month of March, this year, died Robert Earl of Orford, in circumstances by no means affluent. His death was occasioned by the violent operation of a medicine which he took as a solvent for the stone; and he declared that he died a victim to the neglect of his own maxim—not to disturb that which is at rest.

‡ A recent effort to introduce once more the Earl of Granville into the administration, had been made by the King, over whom that nobleman had acquired a surprising ascendency: but the Duke of Newcastle, and all who adhered to the connections of the Pelhams, immediately on learning his Majesty's determination, delivered in their resignations. Lord Granville, however, was actually appointed to the office of principal Secretary of State; but, after a short trial, he was compelled reluctantly to render back the seals. The Pelhams resumed their stations; and Lord Granville was made President of the Council, which station he occupied many years.

sum of five hundred thousand pounds to his Majesty. Notwithstanding this liberal expenditure, no sensible effect was produced in the general system of affairs. —An unsuccessful attempt was made, in the course of the year, by Admiral Lestock and General St. Clair, on Port L'Orient, the grand depositary of the vessels and stores belonging to the French East India company. The fleet, with six battalions of regular forces on board, arrived on the 20th of September, in Quimperly Bay, ten miles distant from the city, which was immediately summoned to surrender. In the first emotions of surprise and consternation, a capitulation was agreed to, on condition that the magazines of the company, upon the payment of forty thousand pounds by way of ransom, should remain untouched, and the inhabitants be protected from pillage. These terms the British commanders haughtily and rashly rejected; and the inhabitants, driven to extremity, prepared to defend themselves. The invaders were destitute of every thing necessary for a siege. A single battery, raised with difficulty and mounted only with a few field-pieces, played upon the fortifications without any effect. At length the troops stationed in the environs, with the militia of the province, collecting in great force, the General was compelled to abandon his enterprise, embarking his troops September 29; and, after some useless bravadoes on the French coast, the whole armament returned to Portsmouth.*

In the month of November following, the Parliament was again convened, and the supplies again voted with profusion—four hundred and thirty thousand pounds to the Queen of Hungary; three hundred thousand pounds to the King of Sardinia; five hundred and seventy thousand pounds for the maintenance of the Hanoverian and Hessian auxiliaries; subsidies to the electors of Saxony, Mentz, Cologne, and Bavaria; five hundred thousand pounds as a vote of credit; the aggregate of the supplies exceeding by two millions and a half the greatest annual sum raised during the reign of Queen Anne.†

In the month of April, 1747, a squadron sailed from Brest Water, commanded by M. de la Jonquiere, bound for America, but had made little progress in its voyage when it was encountered by a superior English fleet under the Admirals Anson and Warren. The enemy fought with courage, but were compelled to yield to superior force, and towards evening six ships of the line struck their colours; and a great part of their convoy, with several frigates, were also taken. For this service Admiral Anson was ennobled, and Admiral Warren created a Knight of the Bath. In the month of October, Admiral Hawke, with a force much superior, fell in with a fleet of nine line-of-battle ships, seven of which, after an obstinate engagement, were captured by the English.‡

Parliament having been dissolved in June, a new one was convened in November, highly favourable to the interest of the ministry. The King, whose popularity had very sensibly increased since the suppression of the late rebellion, signified, in his opening speech, that a congress would be speedily opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, for concerting the means of a general pacification. As the event, however, was uncertain, the former supplies and subsidies were renewed, and a new demand made for an additional subsidy to the Empress of Russia. Previously, however, to the termination of the session, in May, 1748, the King informed the two Houses that preliminaries of peace had been actually signed, on the basis of a general restitution of conquests.§

A. D. 1749.] Notwithstanding the satisfaction occasioned by the peace, the opposition retained some degree of importance, from the countenance and patronage of the Prince of Wales, who, from recent causes, had become more than ever alienated from the court. At this period, too, his royal highness distinguished by peculiar marks of his favour and confidence the famous Viscount Bolingbroke, who having many years since received a full pardon from government, now resided at Dawley, in Middlesex, where he was visited by all the distinguished votaries of wit, eloquence, and political ambition. The hopes of the nation were, however, blasted by the untimely death of the Prince, who, after a short illness, expired, March 20, 1751.‖

Two of the most distinguished personages at this period in the British Parliament were Mr. Murray, Solicitor General, and Mr. Pitt, paymaster of the forces—both possessing an extent of genius and of eloquence superior to Mr. Pelham, who, founding his power on public esteem and public virtue, suffered no political jealousies to enter his breast. Mr. Murray, promoted, in the course of time, to the chief justiceship of England, and the title of Earl of Mansfield, was educated in sentiments by no means favourable to his political advancement; but, from his first entrance into public life, he suffered no symptoms of his original attachments to appear, excepting a certain bias in favour of prerogative. His person was graceful, the tones of his voice exquisitely melodious, and his style of oratory clear, dignified, calm, and persuasive. Mr. Pitt, on the other hand, was introduced early in life into the House of Commons, where he soon distinguished himself by the animation of his eloquence and the superiority of his talents. His reply to Horace Walpole, who had affected to mention him with contempt, as an unpractised and youthful orator, was eminently forcible: "Whether youth could be justly imputed to any man as a reproach, Mr. Pitt said he should not determine; but he would affirm, that the wretch who, after having seen the consequences of repeated errors, continues still to blunder, and whose age has only added obstinacy to stupidity, deserves not that his grey hairs should secure him from insult; and much more is he to be abhorred, who, as he has advanced in age, has receded from virtue, and who deliberately devotes the remnant of his life to the ruin of his country." As a public speaker, Mr. Pitt possessed such commanding force and energy of language, as struck his hearers with astonishment and admiration. The power and effect of his oratory have been compared to "the lightning which flashed from heaven, blasting where it smote, and withering the nerves of opposition." His ambition was open and undisguised;

* This year died Philip V. King of Spain, to whom succeeded, without any visible or immediate effect upon the general political system, Don Ferdinand, Prince of Asturias.

† An important act passed this session, for the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions in Scotland—that distinguishing feature of the feudal system; since which period the peculiarities which seemed to stamp upon the Highland clans the cast and character of a separate nation have been gradually dying away.

‡ It was remarked, that, in both these instances, the English fleet bore down upon the enemy, regardless of the preservation of the line of battle; while Admiral Matthews still continued in a state of disgraceful suspension for the same contempt of the established punctilios of discipline.

§ Taking into consideration the relative situation of the belligerent powers, the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle must, upon the whole, be considered as very favourable and advantageous to the allies. The King of France was now in actual possession of almost the whole of the Austrian Netherlands, and had even penetrated into Dutch Brabant and Flanders. Except the fortune of the war had, contrary to all reasonable expectation, entirely changed, the allies must soon have been driven beyond the Rhine, and the United States might have once more seen the French flag displayed at the gates of Amsterdam. By this treaty England was compelled reluctantly to resign her favourite conquest of Cape Breton, to obtain the restitution of Madras. With Spain, England had little occasion to negotiate. In the course of a war which had continued nine years, nothing had been lost, and nothing gained, Porto Bello excepted, which had been immediately evacuated. The original cause of the war seemed, in its progress, to be entirely forgotten; and, at the conclusion of the peace, not a syllable was mentioned respecting the pretended right of search, which had formerly occasioned such loud and indignant clamours. The settlement of the boundaries of the French and British empires in America, was referred to the decision of commissaries; and France retained no mark of superiority in this treaty, with relation to England, excepting the requisition of hostages to reside in France till the reciprocal restitution of conquests should be actually made. This afforded the patriots a pretence to exclaim against the peace as disgraceful to the nation. But the nation, who were with reason wearied with the expences and disasters of the war, were well satisfied with the terms of the peace, and it was celebrated with great and universal joy.

‖ Soon after the death of his royal highness, his eldest son, Prince George, was committed to the care of the Earl of Harcourt as governor, and the Bishop of Norwich as preceptor; but it was soon discovered that the Earl of Bute, who had been introduced into the Prince's household as a Lord of the bedchamber, had acquired so high a degree of influence at the court of Leicester house, as to make the situation of those who possessed responsible offices very uneasy.

undisguised; but he disdained to seek the gratification of it by any mean or degrading compliance: on the contrary, he was pertinacious in his opinions, impetrious in his deportment, fearless and resolute in his conduct. All attention to pecuniary considerations he seemed to think beneath the dignity of his character, ever maintaining an inviolable integrity in the midst of temptation. And in that theatre of political corruption in which it was the shameless boast of the minister that every man had his price, the public virtue of Mr. Pitt was universally acknowledged to be "pure as the icicle pendent from Diana's temple."*

The chief controversy which took place in the House of Commons, during the session succeeding the conclusion of the peace, was occasioned by some innovations in the annual mutiny bill, particularly the final clause, by which martial law was extended to all officers on half pay, and which, by extending in the same proportion the influence of the crown, might in its consequences, as the opposition affirmed, prove very dangerous to the constitution. Mr. Pitt defended the clause, which was ultimately carried by a considerable majority, as a necessary extension of military discipline—urging, in order to obviate the alarm of danger, "That the very existence of English liberty must, and did, actually depend upon the moderation of the sovereign, and the virtue of the army."†

A. D. 1750.] As a consequence of the firm establishment of peace, the extension of commerce, and the accumulation of wealth, the public funds, all or the greater part of which bore the same interest of four per cent. now rose so much above par, as to make it practicable for the minister to bring forward a grand measure of finance. This was no other than an improvement of the scheme formerly offered to Parliament by Sir John Bernard, to liquidate all the redeemable annuities, comprehending nearly the whole of the public debts, by an immediate payment of the principal. This proposal was, however, attended with an alternative which the minister well knew it was the interest of the stockholder to accept. An option was allowed by the act, either to receive the entire amount of the debt at par, i. e. at a discount of more than thirty per cent. below the actual transfer price, or to consent to a reduction of the interest from four to three and a half per cent. for seven years, and afterwards to remain at three per cent. This had all the effect and operation of a tax of twenty-five per cent. upon the public funds, and it was a blow severely felt by many families in the middle classes of life, whose property was confided to the faith of government. Yet no violation of the public faith could be pretended; as, in conformity to the original terms of the agreement, the perpetual annuities were at all times redeemable by the government at par. A great proportion, therefore, of the public creditors assented, however reluctantly, to the terms of the minister. The three great chartered companies, however, and various individual proprietors of stock, to the amount of eight or ten millions, refused to subscribe. Mr. Pelham, encouraged by the general success of his project, assumed a higher tone; and declared, that, as they had suffered the time prescribed by the act to elapse, they should no longer be admitted to take advantage of the terms originally offered; but, that their obstinacy and ignorance might not be too rigorously punished, he would now propose a second subscription, in which the reduction of the interest from three and a half to three per cent. should take place at the end of five years. On reconsideration, the Bank, the East India company, and South Sea company, and the individual proprietors who had concurred with them, unanimously thought proper to accept of the favour and indulgence now offered; and the plan of the minister was triumphantly carried into complete execution.‡

Philip V. of Spain being dead, and his son and successor Ferdinand cherishing a sincere desire to maintain a perfect amity with Great Britain, a treaty or convention was this year concluded at Madrid, between Don Joseph de Carvajal, the Spanish minister, and Mr. Keene, the English envoy, by which the points referred to the decision of commissaries, by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, were finally terminated, and the commercial privileges of the English nation fully restored. No mention, however, and much less any direct renunciation, was made of the right of search claimed by the Spaniards; and, when this omission was strongly urged by the opposition, as inconsistent with the positive declaration of the two Houses at the commencement of the war, that no treaty of peace with Spain should be admitted, unless such renunciation should be first obtained as a preliminary; Mr. Pitt "acknowledged that he had contended strongly for the address alluded to, because, at that time, being young and sanguine, he thought it right and reasonable; but he was now ten years older, had considered matters more coolly, and was convinced that the privilege of no search, with respect to British vessels sailing near the American shore, would never be obtained unless Spain should be brought so low as to acquiesce in any terms which we, as victors, might propose."§

In consequence of the death of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, a bill was presented by the Duke of Newcastle to the House of Peers (May 1751,) to provide for the administration of government, in case the crown should descend to a minor; and the Princess Dowager of Wales was appointed Regent of Great Britain and Ireland, assisted by a council composed of the great officers of state, the Duke of Cumberland presiding. Happily, however, the King lived till his successor attained to the age of majority; and the Regency bill, which was strongly opposed in Parliament, sunk unnoticed.

The most remarkable bill of the present session was that introduced by the Earl of Chesterfield for the reformation of the calendar, notwithstanding the previous and avowed disapprobation of the Duke of Newcastle, who declared himself "averse to disturb that which was at rest;" adding, "that he did not love new-fangled things."

* In the foremost rank of statesmen at this period, should also be classed the secretary at war, Mr. Fox, afterwards Lord Holland. His talents appear, indeed, less brilliant than solid. Long and intimately attached to the connection of the Pelhams, he had on all occasions distinguished himself as a most able advocate of the measures of the present administration. In common with the other adherents of that powerful party, he zealously espoused the ancient principles of whiggism. His understanding was vigorous, and his knowledge extensive; and he commanded the attention of the House less by the splendour of his eloquence, than by the superior weight and force of his observations. Though far from harbouring the idea of a political competition with Mr. Pelham, whom he supported with the cordiality rather of friendship than of interest, he regarded himself, and was universally regarded, as second only in political importance to the minister.

† A plan was about this time formed and carried into execution, chiefly under the patronage and direction of the Earl of Halifax, first Lord of trade and plantations, for the establishment of a colony on the peninsula of Acadie. By the treaty of Utrecht this peninsula, originally settled by the French, was ceded, with the entire province of Nova Scotia, to the English; but, the small town and fortress of Annapolis, situated in the midst of the French settlers, excepted, no trace appeared of its being an English possession. By the plan now adopted, it was determined to found a city on the opposite or eastern side of the Peninsula, to which the name of Halifax was given, on a spot commodiously situated, and with the advantage of a secure and excellent harbour. This colony, though viewed by the French with jealous eyes, being primarily designed for a military station, and subjected to a military and despotic form of government, did not answer the high expectations excited by it; but of late years, in consequence of many judicious regulations and unexpected changes, it has risen rapidly in commercial and political importance.

‡ An act of Parliament passed about this time for the encouragement of the British fisheries, by which a company was incorporated, in order to carry into effect the purposes of the act. As the vessels, however, designed to rendezvous at the Sound of Brassa were, according to this project, to be fitted out at the port of London, it was clearly foreseen, and peremptorily foretold, that the scheme would prove abortive.

§ In the course of the present summer, died Don Juan V. King of Portugal,—a Prince not destitute of ability, but tainted with a wretched spirit of bigotry and persecution. He was succeeded by his son Don Joseph, at whose accession the infanta Isabella became heiress of the crown; and, in order to preserve the sceptre of Portugal in the house of Braganza, this Princess, by virtue of a papal dispensation, was married to her uncle, the infant Don Pedro, brother to the King; the first issue of which nuptials, Joseph Xavier, Prince of Brazil, while of an age yet immature, was, by a similar alliance married to his aunt, Donna Maria, sister to Isabella, the present Queen.

things. The bill, however, was received with general applause, and was supported in the House of Peers by the Earl of Macclesfield, with a display of profound and scientific knowledge which reflected upon that nobleman the highest honor, as the successor to the chair of Newton, and president of the most learned society in Europe.* By the bill now introduced, it was decreed that the new year should begin, in conformity to the Gregorian reform, on the 1st of January, and that eleven intermediate nominal days, between the second and fourteenth of September 1752, should be omitted, so that the day succeeding the second should be denominated the fourteenth of that month.†

When the Parliament met (in November), his Majesty informed them that he had, in conjunction with the States-General—whose intimate union and friendship with England had in no degree been impaired by the recent unfortunate death of the Stadtholder—concluded treaties with the Electors of Bavaria and Saxony, in addition to those subsisting with the electors of Mentz and Cologne; another was soon afterwards adjusted with the Elector Palatine; and the vast sums which these Princes demanded as the purchase of their friendship were cheerfully and loyally voted. The immediate object of these alliances was to secure a majority of voices of the electoral college, in the view of an approaching election of a King of the Romans in the person of the Archduke Joseph, eldest son of the Emperor; for, this Prince having yet scarcely passed the years of infancy, it was reasonably to be apprehended, that this favourite project might, in the execution, be attended with embarrassment and difficulty. A vigorous resistance was, however, made in the House of Commons to the ratification of these treaties. The system of policy adopted by the English court was not, however, to be shaken; and after a tissue of negociations and intrigues, carried on with the different German Princes, the Elector of Mentz, Chancellor of the Empire, at length convoked an Electorial diet. But the King of Prussia, Elector of Brandenburgh, who had, on the first indication of this design, manifested his dislike and disapprobation, now publicly opposed it with the utmost vehemence and pertinacity; and, in his spirited remonstrances, several of the electors seemed to waver in their opinion; the King of France solemnly protesting, "that although for the sake of peace he would not oppose this election, contrary as it was to the golden bull, provided it should be confirmed by the unanimous consent of the electoral college; yet should any one of the members signify his dissent, and claim the protection of France, he could not refuse granting his assistance, as guarantee of the treaty of Westphalia." Attempts having been in vain made to soften the King of Prussia, the courts of Vienna and London were at length compelled to desist from the prosecution of their design.‡

Tranquillity at this time prevailing throughout the kingdom, the attention of the ministers seemed to be wholly engrossed in devising and bringing forward, for the discussion and approbation of Parliament, plans and proposals for the public good.§ A bill was introduced and passed in the session of 1753, permitting the naturalisation, under certain restrictions, of persons born out of the realm, professing the Jewish religion; as it was supposed, or at least hoped, that such a measure would operate as an inducement to opulent foreigners of that persuasion to remove with their effects to Great Britain, to the increase of the national commerce, credit, and prosperity. A most absurd and unexpected alarm, however, was taken by the public at this measure; and the clamour continuing, and even increasing, the bill was repealed next session. This was one of the last acts of Mr. Pelham's administration—that minister dying, (March 1754,) in the meridian of his life, reputation, and usefulness.‖

Mr. Legge, after a short interval, succeeded Mr. Pelham as Chancellor of the Exchequer; the seals were consigned to Sir Thomas Robinson, formerly ambassa-

* The Julian computation of time, composing a complete solar revolution to be effected in the precise period of three hundred and sixty-five days and six hours, made no provision for the apparently trifling deficiency of eleven minutes, which, however, in the lapse of eighteen centuries, amounted to a difference of eleven days. A Reformation of the Calendar had been accomplished in the sixteenth century, under the auspices of Pope Gregory XIII.; but the authority of the Roman pontiff extending over the Catholic countries only, the ancient computation still continued in use in England and the other northern kingdoms.

† Frederic, King of Sweden, and landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, dying about this period, was succeeded, agreeably to the Convention formerly made with Russia, by Adolphus Frederic, Duke of Holstein Eutin, Bishop of Lubec—married to the sister of his Prussian Majesty. On his accession to the throne, he took a voluntary oath, in full senate, that he would never attempt to introduce a despotic authority, but would maintain their liberties with his blood, and govern his subjects in all respects according to the laws and form of government established in Sweden. This declaration was peculiarly acceptable to the court of St. Petersburgh, which had entertained apprehensions that the intrigues of the French and Prussian factions, for changing the form of government, were countenanced and supported by the successor—and had actually assembled an army on the frontiers of Finland, which menaced Sweden with invasion; declaring, at the same time, her firm resolution to maintain inviolate that constitution of which she was the guarantee. By this conduct, the harmony between the two countries appeared consolidated. The political depression of Sweden, the necessary consequence of the radical defects of her government, was in the highest degree favourable to the ambitious designs of Russia; and, in conformity to the same policy, the court of St. Petersburgh would suffer no improvement of the anarchic constitution of Poland. A violent misunderstanding between Russia and Prussia was the result of their opposing politics relative to the affairs of Sweden—his Prussian Majesty declaring his determination to defend that kingdom with his whole force, in case of an attack from Russia; and the ambassadors on each side were recalled. The misunderstanding, after an interval of some years, terminated in open rupture; and the King of Prussia was taught to repent of the provocations by which he had excited the resentment of the Czarina. The subsidies received, during the course of his reign, from England, by the late King of Sweden in the mere capacity of landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, on an accurate computation, amounted to the astonishing sum of one million two hundred and forty-nine thousand six hundred and ninety-nine pounds sterling. Soon after the death of the King of Sweden, Prince Frederic of Hesse-Cassel, who had, in 1740, espoused the Princess Mary, third daughter of the King of England, renounced his religion, and declared himself a Roman-Catholic, to the great injury of the Protestant interest in the empire, and the general regret of the English nation and the Protestants throughout Europe. In the course of this year also died Louisa, Queen of Denmark, youngest daughter of his Britannic Majesty, a Princess endowed with every graceful and amiable accomplishment, and deservedly dear to the Danish monarch and nation. Nearly at the same time the United Provinces sustained a public loss by the death of the Prince of Orange, who leaving only an infant son, the administration of the government devolved upon the Princess of Orange, as gouvernante, during the minority, in which station she conducted affairs with considerable ability and prudence.

‡ The resolute opposition of the King of Prussia to this measure, which he passes over, in his History of the Times, in mysterious silence, seems best accounted for by the prevalent suspicion, that, in case of the demise of the Emperor, he harboured a secret design of offering himself as a candidate for the imperial throne. It is also probable, that a knowledge or persuasion of the aspiring views of the Prussian monarch principally incited the court of Vienna to urge with such persevering ardor a project so irregular and invidious. At this period, the courts of Berlin and London were scarcely less at variance than those of Vienna and Berlin; and the King of Prussia openly expressed his resentment of the conduct of the King of England, "who had, by the influence of English subsidies, embarrassed and embroiled the affairs of Germany, in which he had no right to interfere."

§ The following acts were passed in this and the preceding sessions. The acts for applying the rents and profits of the forfeited estates in Scotland, for the better civilising and improving the Highlands—the act for allowing the importation of wool and woolen yarn from Ireland—the act for the more effectual performance of quarantine—the act for repressing the barbarous practice of plundering ships wrecked on the British coast—the act for laying open the trade to Turkey—the act for establishing the British Museum by the Parliamentary purchase of the famous collection of Sir Hans Sloane, joined to the Harleian collection of MSS. and the Cottonian and Westminster libraries. A plan for regulating and rendering efficient the militia of the kingdom was, however, rejected through the influence of the crown. The whole expense of the naval, military, and civil establishment of the year 1753, under the administration of Mr. Pelham, amounted to less than three millions; and although the land-tax was reduced to two shilling in the pound, the excess of the supplies left a sum of 300,000*l.* in the exchequer.

‖ Rectitude of understanding and disposition seems to have constituted this Minister's leading characteristic. The many excellent acts passed under his influence and patronage plainly indicate an unremitted attention to the interest, and a sincere and earnest desire to promote the happiness, of his country. His genius was not of an enterprising cast; and, when occasionally urged to adopt more bold and vigorous measures of political Reform, he was accustomed to answer, "that things would last his time." The general tenor of his conduct showed, that he was less anxious to avoid the censure of timidity than of rashness. He lived and died esteemed and lamented by all.

dor at the court of Vienna, a minister of moderate political attainments and little conversant in Parliamentary intrigues and conflicts; and the post of First Lord of the Treasury was occupied by the Duke of Newcastle. But it soon appeared how unequal were the talents of this nobleman to the task of government, when deprived of the assistance of the counsellor and coadjutor with whom he had been ever united in the strictest bands of political and fraternal amity.*

The political contentions which arose at this time between the kingdoms of Great Britain and France, terminated in a long and bloody war.—After the cession of Nova Scotia by the treaty of Utrecht, the British colonies in North America extended along the western shore of the Atlantic nearly a thousand miles, and, according to the tenor of the charters granted to the original settlers, the dominion of the soil was bounded only by the Pacific Ocean on the opposite side of the continent. Spain, in whom were vested the rights attached to the first discovery, advanced claims no less extravagant, and regarded as unwarrantable usurpations the successive settlements of the English nation. France, which held in contempt the pretensions both of England and Spain, established, at a more recent period, colonies on the river St. Laurence to the north, and on the Missisippi to the south, of the English settlements: and a systematic and artfully concerted plan was formed to connect these widely-distant establishments by the gradual erection of a chain of fortresses from the lakes Erie and Ontario, along and beyond the Ohio, to the embouchure of the Missisippi. To the rich and immense plains extending on both sides of that vast river they gave the appellation of Louisiana; and they contended, that the English colonies were of right bounded by the range of high lands which run parallel to the coast, at the distance of one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles, under the different names of the Apalachian, Alleghany, or Blue Mountains. The province of Nova Scotia having been ceded to England, according to the "ancient limits" of that territory, fruitless and endless altercations arose, as to the import of this expression, between the commissaries of the two nations, to whom the right of fixing the boundaries of the rival empires was assigned; the English claiming the whole territory as far as the southern bank of the river St. Laurence, and the French admitting their right only to the peninsula of Acadie. Another serious cause of dispute originated in a royal charter inconsiderately and injuriously granted to certain merchants and adventurers of the city of London, who assumed the title of the Ohio Company, of a large tract of ground situated on the banks of the Ohio, with an exclusive privilege of commerce with the Indian tribes inhabiting those regions. This extraordinary grant excited extreme disgust in the minds of the Virginian and Pennsylvanian traders, who saw themselves deprived of a lucrative branch of traffic, and the highest alarm among the Indian nations, who perceived with astonishment their lands measured and parcelled out by English surveyors, as though they, who were the actual occupants, had neither interest nor property in them. M. du Quesne, governor of Canada, declared that he would suffer no encroachments or depredations to be made on the Indian tribes under the protection of the crown of France. Towards the latter end of the year 1753, Major Washington, afterwards so famous as General Washington, was deputed by the government of Virginia to the French commandant on the Ohio, to demand by what authority fortresses were erected, and settlements made, on the territories of the King of Great Britain; and to require him immediately to desist from the prosecution of designs carried on in open violation of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns, and totally subversive of the harmony and good understanding which his Britannic Majesty was desirous to maintain and cultivate with the most Christian King. To this peremptory requisition, which almost assumed the air and tone of a menace, the French officer replied with equal spirit, that it was not his province to specify the evidence, and demonstrate the right of the King his sovereign to the lands situated on the river Ohio; but that he would transmit his message to the Marquis du Quesne, his immediate superior. In the interim, he declared his total disregard of the summons of the English governor, and, holding his command by virtue of a commission from his General, he was prepared and determined to maintain the right, and to fulfil the duties, of his station. A more serious remonstrance was, about the same time, presented by the Earl of Albemarle, the English ambassador at Paris, to the court of Versailles, in which the various causes of complaint

* A remarkable event occurred at this time. Dr. Cameron, brother to the celebrated Cameron of Lochiel, had been engaged in the rebellion of 1745, and, after the decisive victory of Culloden, had effected his escape to the continent. Notwithstanding his being attainted by act of Parliament, he ventured, after an interval of nine years, to return incognito to Scotland, to transact certain affairs of consequence, private and personal—relying in case of exigence, with fatal indiscretion, on the mildness and equity of the British government; on the temper of the times; and on the general respectability of his own character. He was, however, discovered, apprehended, and brought to his trial at the Old Bailey; and his person being identified, he was convicted, and suffered the death of a traitor with admirable firmness and resignation. Even the populace were melted into tears at the melancholy spectacle of his execution; generously lamenting the excessive rigour of his fate. Under what colours the King was prevailed upon to give his sanction to this proceeding cannot be ascertained; but he is said to have signed the fatal warrant with much reluctance, observing, "Surely there has been too much blood spilt upon this account already!"

A far more striking proof, however, of the incapacity of the new administration appeared in their conduct respecting the Parliament of Ireland, in an affair of great delicacy and importance. In the year 1749, a considerable surplus remaining in the Irish exchequer, the House of Commons in that country, conceiving that they had an undoubted right to appropriate such surplus to national purposes, prepared heads of a bill with that design, with the following preamble: "Whereas, on the 25th of March last, a considerable balance remained in the hands of the Vice-Treasurers, or Receivers-General, of the kingdom, or their deputy or deputies, unapplied; and it will be for your Majesty's service, and for the ease of your faithful subjects in this kingdom, that so much thereof as can be conveniently spared should be paid, agreeably to your Majesty's most gracious intention, in discharge of part of the national debt," &c. &c. On the transmission of this bill to England, it was affirmed, by the partisans of prerogative in the council, that the Commons of Ireland had no right to apply any part of the unappropriated revenue, nor even to take into consideration the propriety of such appropriation, without the previous consent of the crown, formally and explicitly declared. In the ensuing session of Parliament, therefore, (1751) the Duke of Dorset, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, informed the two Houses of Parliament, that he was commanded by the King to acquaint them, that his Majesty, ever attentive to the ease and happiness of his subjects, would graciously "consent," and recommend it to them, that such a part of the money then remaining in his treasury as should be thought consistent with the public services, be applied towards the further reduction of the national debt. The Commons of Ireland, astonished at this procedure of the court, and tremblingly alive in a case which so nearly concerned their privileges, omitted, in their address of thanks, all mention of his Majesty's "consent," and only acknowledged his gracious attention to their ease and happiness, in "recommending" to them the application of the surplus; and in the subsequent bill framed for this purpose, in which one hundred and twenty thousand pounds were appropriated to the discharge of the public debt, the same omission was observable. The ministers in England, highly offended, returned the bill with an alteration in the preamble, signifying his Majesty's "consent" as well as "approbation;" and the Irish House of Commons, unwilling to risk the consequences of a serious rupture, passed the bill without further notice. So far had the misunderstanding between the crown and Parliament of Ireland proceeded previously to the death of Mr. Pelham, and thus might it have for ever rested, had not the present minister suggested the necessity of supporting the honour of government, by positive directions to the Duke of Dorset, in opening the session of the present year, to repeat the expression of his Majesty's gracious "consent," in mentioning the surplus of the public money. The House, in their address, not only again omitted the obnoxious word "consent," but the former expressions of grateful acknowledgment: and the bill of appropriation was transmitted to England, entirely divested of the usual complimentary preamble, which the ministers of the crown in England thought fit thus to supply—"And your Majesty, ever attentive to the ease and happiness of your faithful subjects, has been graciously pleased to signify that you would 'consent,' and to recommend it to us, that so much of the money remaining in your Majesty's treasury as should be necessary, be applied to the discharge of the national debt, or such part thereof as should be thought expedient by Parliament." On the return of the bill, the whole nation seemed animated by the spirit of resistance, and, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the court, the bill, thus amended, was thrown out by a majority of five voices, and the victory of the opposition was celebrated by universal rejoicings. In revenge, all those who voted against the bill holding public employments were immediately dismissed. The rejection of the bill, however, occasioned a great stagnation in the usual course of circulation, and the clamour of the public rising high against the government, it was thought proper and necessary, by a concession, to devote the surplus to the discharge of the debt in virtue of a royal letter.

on the part of England were stated in very strong language. It was declared, that, while the commissaries of the two nations were engaged in adjusting the limits of the two empires, the French had taken actual possession of the territories in dispute; that they had incited the Indians of Nova Scotia and the French inhabitants of Acadie to rise in arms against the English government, and had assisted them with vessels and military stores; that acts of violence had been repeatedly exercised by the authority or countenance of the French government against the subjects of Great Britain; and numerous fortresses erected with a view to defend their continual and manifest encroachments on the territories of his Britannic Majesty: and his excellency concluded with demanding the erasure of the forts, the restitution of the persons and properties of all those who had been captured, and an unequivocal assurance that effectual care should be taken, by the most positive instructions to the French commandants in America, to prevent any similar causes of complaint in future. The French court not being yet prepared, or not having resolved to risk any open rupture with Great Britain, replied to this memorial in terms civilly evasive, and engaged that inquiries should be made, and instructions transmitted to America to obviate all misunderstanding; and several British subjects, traders and others, seized by the French on various pretences, were actually dismissed. The court of London, confiding little in the specious and artful professions of the court of Versailles, issued orders to the English governors in America to repel force by force, and to take effectual measures to dislodge the French from their settlements on the Ohio, where they still continued their hostilities and encroachments. A congress being appointed at Albany, consisting of commissioners from the different colonies, to which the chieftains of the Indian nations bordering on the Ohio were invited, it soon appeared, though they refused not to accept the offered and customary presents, that they were entirely attached to the French interests. At this meeting, it was determined that Major Washington, who had already distinguished himself, should be detached with a corps of four hundred men, to occupy a post on the Ohio, where he threw up works, and began the erection of a fort, in expectation of speedy and effectual reinforcements; but before the intended succours could arrive, the officer was suddenly attacked by a much superior force of French and Indians, commanded by M. Villier, who, after in vain summoning Major Washington to surrender, marched to the attack of the fort, yet incomplete, and ill prepared for an assault, which was nevertheless sustained with great vigour. The English garrison, however, were at length compelled to a capitulation, and they were allowed to retreat to the province of Virginia. This event, as soon as the intelligence arrived in Europe, was stated, in a memorial of the Earl of Albemarle, as an open violation of the peace; but the court of Versailles, no longer solicitous to keep measures with England, treated all remonstrances with disregard; and sent large reinforcements of men, and supplies of military stores, to Quebec, with a manifest determination to pursue and defend their ambitious projects.

The new Parliament, which had met in May, and, after sitting a few days, had been prorogued, again assembled in November (1754); but a profound silence respecting the present critical situation of affairs was observed on the part of the crown, till, in the month of March following, (a) a message was delivered from the King to the Parliament by Sir Thomas Robinson, Secretary of State, importing that "his Majesty having, at the commencement of the session, declared it to be the principal object of his solicitude to preserve the public tranquillity, and to protect those possessions which constitute a primary source of the public prosperity, now found it necessary to acquaint the House of Commons, that the present state of affairs made it requisite to augment his forces by sea and land, and to take such other measures as might best tend to preserve the peace of Europe, and to secure the just rights of his crown in America." This message produced a warm and affectionate address, and the sum of one million was instantly voted for the requisite purposes.

At the time that M. de Mirepoix, the French Ambassador in London, continued to amuse the British ministry with professions of peace and amity, certain intelligence was received that a powerful armament was preparing in the forts of Rochefort and Brest, destined for America; and Admiral Boscawen was immediately appointed to the command of an equal force, fitted out for the avowed purpose of intercepting them. M. de Mirepoix then declared, that the King his master would consider the first gun fired at sea as a declaration of war. Admiral Boscawen, hoping to obstruct the passage of the French fleet into the gulf of St. Laurence, took his station off the banks of Newfoundland; but, under cover of the thick fogs, so frequent in those northern latitudes, the French commander eluded his vigilance; two ships of the line only, the Alcide and Lys, being by some accident separated from the rest, fell into the hands of the English. On the arrival of this news at Paris, M. de Mirepoix was immediately recalled from London, and M. de Bussy from Hanover—the King of England being now resident in that city. Letters of general reprisal were issued by the English court, as well in Europe as America, and three hundred merchant ships, mostly unsuspicious of danger, fell, in the course of the year, into the hands of the English, with not less than eight thousand sailors on board. The French vehemently exclaimed against the conduct of the English government as inconsistent with the law of nations, war not having been formally declared; but the English insisted that, the French themselves having been the aggressors, it was just and lawful to repel force by force, and that the omission of a form was wholly unimportant.

General Braddock had sailed from Cork early in the year 1755, with a considerable body of regular troops; and, on his arrival in Virginia, he took upon him the command of the forces destined to act against the French on the Ohio. This officer was a man of approved bravery, completely versed in all points of military discipline, but dogmatical in his temper, and austere and imperious in his deportment. Unacquainted with the country in which he was appointed to the chief command, and entertaining a sovereign contempt for the colonial militia, of whom his army was in a great measure composed, he heard with silent disdain all that information which the provincial officers were desirous to offer respecting the mode of conducting an American expedition through woods, deserts, and morasses, and the precautions which were necessary to guard against surprise, particularly as the Indian nations were chiefly in alliance with France. Having advanced within ten miles of Fort Du Quesne, without condescending to employ the irregulars in the service as an advanced guard, or to send out any parties to reconnoitre the country, about noon on the ninth of July, in his march through a pathless swamp, entangled amid brakes and rushes, he was suddenly saluted with the horrid sound of the Indian war-whoop, accompanied by a general fire both on his front and flank from a concealed and invisible enemy. The vanguard immediately fell back, and terror and confusion soon spread throughout all the ranks of the army. The general, far from making any efforts to discover and disperse this dangerous ambuscade, exerted himself only to re-form and rally his troops, as though engaged with a regular army in an open plain. Discipline was, in this situation, of little avail; for, though no enemy appeared, the havoc and slaughter continued; and the General himself being at length killed by a musket shot, the regular troops fled with precipitation—the provincials, so much despised, forming in the rear, and covering their retreat; Major Washington, their Commander, acquiring on this occasion, amidst ruin and defeat, the honours and laurels of victory. All the artillery, ammunition, and baggage of the army were left in the hands of the enemy, and even the General's cabinet with all his letters and instructions. The chief command now devolved upon General Shirley, who formed a plan for the reduction of the important fortresses of Crown Point and Niagara, erected by the French on the banks of the lakes Champlain and Ontario. The expedition against the former was conducted by General, afterwards Sir William, Johnson, a native of Ireland, but long resident in America, where he had acquired great and deserved popularity.

The troops destined for this service arrived at the place of rendezvous late in the summer; and were, soon after the commencement of their march, attacked in their camp by Baron Dieskau, the French commander, with great bravery, who was, notwithstanding, repulsed with great loss—the Baron himself being made prisoner. General Johnson, however, found himself, after this bloody encounter, too much weakened to proceed in his expedition; and, after some deliberation, he determined upon a retreat to Albany. General Shirley undertook the conduct of the enterprise against Niagara, which, from its position, commands the communication between the lakes Erie and Ontario. But on his arrival at Oswego, a fort belonging to the English on the south-eastern shore of lake Ontario, he deemed it necessary to leave a very large proportion of the troops under his command for the defence of this post; and, after waiting till the end of September for his expected reinforcements and supplies of provisions and stores, he was informed that it would be attended with danger to cross the lake at this advanced season of the year. He therefore determined to defer the siege of Niagara to the next campaign; and set out in October on his return to Albany. The Earl of Loudon, an officer of considerable merit, was now appointed commander-in-chief, and vested with extensive powers. This nobleman, however, from causes not easy to develope, did not embark from England till the latter end of May; and, on reaching the head quarters at Albany, (June 29, 1756,) he found all military operations in a manner suspended, in the expectation of his arrival. A considerable time then elapsed in debates and consultations respecting the plan most proper to be adopted, and whether the efforts of the army now assembled should be directed against Crown Point and Ticonderago, situated at the southern extremity of lake Champlain; whether a second attempt should be made against Niagara; or whether an expedition should be undertaken against Fort Du Quesne on the Ohio. Intelligence at length arrived, that the French, under M. de Montcalm, had made themselves masters of Oswego, although strongly garrisoned, plentifully provided with all kinds of warlike stores, and defended by one hundred and twenty pieces of artillery. Disconcerted by this unfortunate event, it was determined not to risk any offensive operation during the remainder of the season, but to employ the autumnal and winter months in making preparations for an early and vigorous campaign the ensuing year.

Sanguine hopes were entertained from the great military force collected in the spring of 1757. Admiral Holbourne arrived at Halifax with a powerful squadron, and large reinforcements of troops, in the beginning of July; and the Earl of Loudon directing his march northward, an invasion of Canada with their united forces was expected. At length, however, Louisburg, in the island of Cape Breton, was declared to be the object in contemplation—a scheme very favorable to the views and interests of France at this period, as it left M. de Montcalm entirely at liberty to prosecute his plans of conquest, and Louisburg was so strongly defended, that little apprehension was entertained for its safety. The British commanders receiving certain intelligence, after the whole of the military and naval force destined for this expedition had rendezvoused at Halifax, that the garrison of Louisburg consisted of six thousand regular troops, exclusive of provincials, and that seventeen line-of-battle ships were moored in the harbour; it was resolved, to postpone the expedition. In the interim, the Marquis of Montcalm had taken advantage of the absence of the Earl of Loudon to lay siege, with an army of ten thousand men, to the important post of Fort William-Henry, situated on the southern shore of lake George. The garrison consisted of three thousand men; the fortifications were strong and in good condition; and General Webb, with about four thousand men, was posted in the vicinity, in order to maintain a communication with it. So vigorously, however, were the approaches of the French commander urged, that articles of capitulation were signed in six days, not only importing the entire surrender of the fort, artillery, and stores, but restraining the garrison from serving against France or her allies, for eighteen months. By this conquest, the French acquired the entire command of the extensive and magnificent chain of lakes which connects the two great rivers St. Laurence and Missisippi, and which forms a grand line both of communication and division between the northern and southern parts of this vast continent. Thus disgracefully terminated the third campaign of the American war, in which the French, with an inferior force, had maintained a uniform superiority, and in the course of which no advantage had been gained by the English, excepting, indeed, the expulsion of the French from Nova Scotia, by the vigorous exertions of Colonel Monckton, assisted by a body of provincials, expressly voted and detached by the assembly of Massachusetts for this important purpose.

The French court, finding a rupture with England inevitable, had employed earnest solicitations with the court of Madrid to take an active part in her favour. Her efforts, however, were in vain, though supported by all the influence of the Queen-mother and the Marquis de la Ensenada, the prime minister. The King of Spain himself was not disposed to interrupt the harmony which subsisted between Spain and Britain; and Don Ricardo Wall, a Spaniard, of British extraction, and formerly resident at the British court, who possessed great credit with the King, took all imaginable pains to confirm his Majesty in these favourable sentiments. The intrigues of the minister with the court of Versailles being discovered, he was divested of his offices, which were immediately conferred upon his competitor Don Ricardo. The court of Madrid, however, offered her mediation to compose the differences between England and France; but France insisting upon a suspension of arms in America as the preliminary condition of a negotiation, and England refusing to assent to any such preliminary, nothing could be effected. The courts of London and Versailles, foreseeing a violent and long protracted conflict, were busily engaged in forming and cultivating alliances in the different courts of Europe; and, at length, a treaty was signed by the King of England, when at Hanover, (June 25, 1755,) with the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, by which his serene highness engaged to hold in readiness for his Majesty's service, a body of twelve thousand men. Saxony and Bavaria, notwithstanding the subsidies which they had regularly received during the years of peace, in contemplation and as the earnest of future services, now entered into opposite connections. In September, a treaty was signed at the palace of Kensington between his Britannic Majesty and the Empress of Russia, by which that Princess stipulated to maintain, on the frontiers of Livonia, an army of forty thousand infantry, fifteen thousand cavalry, and a naval force of fifty galleys, to be in immediate readiness to act at the requisition of the King of England, should the electoral dominions of that monarch be invaded in consequence of the connection of Hanover with Britain; for which an annual subsidy of five hundred thousand pounds was to be advanced to the Czarina. The Prussian court was, at this crisis, strongly assailed by the courts of London and Versailles, each flattering itself with a decision in its favour. But the King of Prussia, aware of the engagements contracted between England and Russia, and the strict amity subsisting between the courts of Vienna and St. Petersburgh, would not venture to draw draw upon himself the resentment of these powers, by a renewal of the alliance with France; and, in January 1756, a treaty was signed at London between the Kings of Great Britain and Prussia, by which they engaged to oppose the introduction of any foreign troops into the empire. This article, though immediately pointed against France, amounted to a virtual renunciation of the alliance with Russia; and the Czarina, resenting the conduct of the King of England, and exasperated, from causes of a personal as well as political nature, against the King of Prussia, began to listen with attention to the overtures of France, hitherto so much the object of her jealousy and aversion. France, astonished and alarmed at the defection of Prussia, now directed her attention to the court of Vienna; which since the termination of the late war had given clear and repeated intimations of a desire to enter into bonds of permanent amity; and, to the amazement of Europe, a treaty of mutual guarantee and support was concluded and signed at Versailles, May 1756, by these two great rival powers. Thus the inveterate hereditary animosity, which had subsisted for ages between the houses of Bourbon and Austria, appeared to be for ever terminated. The general conduct of France left scarcely a doubt of her intention to take advantage of the political relation of Hanover to Great Britain, by the invasion of that electorate; though it must be acknowledged, that terms of neutrality were offered to the King of England as Elector of Hanover, which he did not deem it consistent with his honour and dignity to accept.

Great preparations being made by the French court, with the avowed design of forming a powerful army in Westphalia, an army of observation, consisting of about forty thousand Hessians, Hanoverians, and Brunswickers, was assembled for the protection of the electorate: and requisitions were made by the court of London, both at Vienna and the Hague, for the assistance stipulated by treaties. The Empress Queen, after some prevarication, declared in plain terms, that, having been abandoned by England, she was reduced to the necessity of securing herself by an alliance with France. The French court, moreover, declared, that, "should the States grant the succours in question, the King of France would consider their compliance as an act of hostility against himself." The application of the English court, therefore, being perceived, from the operation of these causes, to be unavailing, Colonel Yorke, the English ambassador, was directed to inform their high mightinesses, that the King of England would not insist on the requisition; and the States expressed, in grateful terms, their acknowledgments to his Britannic Majesty for thus generously relieving them from the dilemma in which they had been placed.

Parliament assembled in November, 1755; and, in the opening speech, the King informed them, "that he had adopted what appeared to him the most proper and effectual measures for the protection of the national possessions in America, no reasonable terms of accommodation having been proposed by France; and also to disappoint such designs as, from various appearances and preparations, there was ground to believe had been formed against his kingdoms and dominions; that he had greatly augmented his forces by land and sea; and that he had concluded treaties with Russia and Hesse-Cassel, copies of which should be laid before them." In the consequent address moved in both Houses, were the following words: "That they looked upon themselves as obliged by the strongest ties of duty, gratitude, and honour, to stand by and support his Majesty in all such wise and necessary measures and engagements, as his Majesty might have taken in vindication of the rights of his crown, or to defeat any attempts which might be made by France in resentment for such measures, and to assist his Majesty in disappointing or repelling all such enterprises as might be formed not only against his kingdoms, but also against any other of his dominions though not belonging to the crown of Great Britain, in case the King should be attacked on account of the part which his Majesty had taken for maintaining the essential interests of his kingdoms." The declaration contained in this clause met with a formidable opposition in the Commons, not from the party usually voting in opposition, but from Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge, the most popular members of administration, and a considerable number of other gentlemen possessing posts under the government.*

The clause was, however, carried on a division; and the dismission of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge from their respective employments immediately followed.

Three days before the meeting of Parliament, Sir Thomas Robinson, Secretary of State, from consciousness of incapacity, had resigned the seals, which were directly transferred to Mr. Fox, Secretary at War, who, in political ability, had no rival in the House of Commons, Mr. Pitt excepted. Though engaged for several years past in the support of the same administration, they were actuated by a visible jealousy on almost all occasions; and it was observed, that they agreed in nothing so well as in those sentiments of contempt for the late minister. It may easily be supposed, therefore, that Mr. Pitt, who could endure no superior, was very little delighted with the advancement of his competitor, who seemed as firmly resolved to admit no equal; and Mr. Legge entering entirely into the views of Mr. Pitt, it was imagined that the new minister would not long be able to maintain his ground against an opposition strengthened by so powerful a secession, founded on professions so popular and patriotic. Mr. Fox, however, supported by the favour of the King, the patronage of the Duke of Cumberland, and the undivided interest of the Pelhams, was able to secure a triumphant majority; and the treaties with Russia and Hesse-Cassel, though strongly and obstinately opposed, were ratified in a House consisting of four hundred and forty-eight members, by three hundred and twenty against one hundred and twenty-eight. This majority could not, however, disguise the impolicy of the premier's conduct, who had neither dared, at the decease of Mr. Pelham, to enter into a confidential connection with Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox, the only men in the House of Commons by whom he could be effectually supported, nor entirely to break with them.†

Early in 1756, Mr. Fox received a letter from M. Rouille,

* Mr. Pitt declared "The whole system and scheme of politics now adopted to be flagrantly absurd and desperate. It was no other than to gather and combine the powers of the Continent into an alliance of magnitude sufficient to withstand the efforts of France and her adherents against the electorate of Hanover, at the single expence of Great Britain. The three last wars with France had cost Britain above one hundred and twenty millions of money; the present exhibited a prospect of an effusion of treasure still more enormous; and, when we considered that such immense issues of money were to be supplied by new loans, heaped upon a debt of eighty millions, who would answer for the consequence, or venture to ensure us from a national bankruptcy? Mr. Pitt contended, that a naval war we could and ought to support, but a continental war, upon this system, we could not. We had suffered ourselves to be deceived by names and sounds; the general cause, the balance of power, the liberty of Europe; and had exhausted our wealth without any rational object. Should Hanover be actually attacked on account of her connection with England, he acknowledged that we ought not to make peace without procuring for its inhabitants ample satisfaction and indemnity; but the idea of defending Hanover by an army of mercenaries he ridiculed as preposterous and impracticable. This system, he said, would, in a few years, cost us more money than the fee-simple of the electorate was worth; for it was a place so inconsiderable, that its name was scarcely to be found in the map. He ardently wished to break those fetters which chained us, like Prometheus, to that barren rock."

† About this time, intelligence arrived of a disaster which excited the most vivid emotions of grief and compassion among all ranks and orders of persons throughout the nation. This was the almost total destruction of the city of Lisbon by a tremendous earthquake, on the 1st of November (1755.) The two principal shocks lasted nearly a quarter of an hour, and they were immediately followed by a most extraordinary rise and inundation of the Tagus. A great number of churches, monasteries, and other public buildings, and many thousand private houses, were, in the space of a few minutes, thrown down—the earth heaving, rocking, and in many parts rending asunder, with incredible noise and violence—immense volumes of mingled smoke and flame issuing from the apertures. After the final cessation of the concussions, this superb city presented to the view of the astonished spectator only a heap of ruins. The royal family were compelled

Rouille, Secretary of State for foreign affairs in France, expostulating, in the name of his sovereign, "Upon the hostile instructions given by the King of England to General Braddock and Admiral Boscawen, in direct contradiction to the amicable professions of the British court. He complained of the insult offered to the French flag in the capture of two ships of war, and of the depredations on the French commerce, without any previous declaration of war, in contempt of the law of nations. He demanded therefore, in the name of the King his master, full and entire satisfaction for this atrocious violation of the dignity of his crown, as well as a complete reparation for the injuries sustained by his people." Mr. Fox replied, "that the King of England would willingly consent to an equitable accommodation of differences, but would not comply with the demand of restitution as a preliminary condition; his Britannic Majesty having taken no steps but such as the hostilities previously committed by the French, and a regard to his own honour and the rights of his crown and people, rendered just and indispensible."

War being now considered as virtually declared, the French court issued an order to seize all British vessels in the French harbours, and began with great assiduity to repair the fortifications of Dunkirk. The naval preparations at Brest were prosecuted with unremitting diligence; a vast number of transports were collected in the different ports in the Channel; and numerous bodies of land forces were seen moving from all parts towards the coasts of Normandy, Picardy, and Bretagne. Towards the close of March the King sent a message to Parliament, stating, "that he had received repeated and authentic advices that a design was actually formed by the French court for the invasion of Great Britain; that he had taken the proper precautions for putting the kingdom in a posture of defence; that, in order further to strengthen himself, he had made a requisition of the Hessian troops which the landgrave had by the late treaty agreed to furnish." An address was immediately presented, thanking his Majesty for this seasonable and prudent requisition; and, in a few days, Mr. Fox, encouraged by the prevailing unanimity of the House, moved a second address, "beseeching his Majesty, that, for the more effectual defence of his kingdoms, and for the better security of the religion and liberties of his subjects, he would be graciously pleased to order twelve battalions of his electoral troops to be forthwith embarked for England." This also was carried by a great majority; and in the course of the ensuing month these troops actually arrived. Such was the consternation excited throughout the kingdom by the idea of an invasion, that these measures of the minister were received with great and general applause; though it appeared, in the view of Europe at large, not less unaccountable than disgraceful that England should, at the commencement of a foreign war, deem herself unequal to provide for her own internal safety.*

Whether the French actually meditated a descent upon the English coast, remains doubtful, and it appears highly probable that the preparations which occasioned this universal alarm were designed chiefly, or solely, as a veil to disguise their real design of an attack upon the island of Minorca. While the attention of the English ministry and nation was occupied with the armaments of Brest and Dunkirk, it seemed entirely to escape their notice that a formidable fleet was equipping at Toulon; till, at length, its destination becoming notorious, a squadron very incompetent to the purposes of the expedition was detached to the Mediterranean, under Admiral Byng, an officer of whom the public knew little more than that he was the son of the gallant and heroic Viscount Torrington. This armament, consisting of ten ships of the line, afterwards joined by two or three others, sailed from Spithead April 7, 1756; and on the 2d of May the Admiral arrived at Gibraltar, where he was informed that the French fleet, under M. de la Galissoniere, consisting of thirteen ships of the line, and transports, on board of which were embarked fifteen thousand land forces, had sailed from Toulon on the 10th of April, with a view to a descent on the island of Minorca, and were now actually engaged in the siege of Fort St. Philip. On this intelligence the Admiral transmitted dispatches to England, "Lamenting that he was not sent out in time to prevent the landing of the French; complaining of the bad condition of the ships, and of the total deficiency which he found at Gibraltar of all the necessary requisites for careening and refitting. He signified his opinion of the impracticability of throwing any supply of troops into the fortress, and of the impolicy of attempting it if feasible, as the siege could not be raised without the co-operation of a land force, and any reinforcement of men would consequently only increase the number of prisoners which must ultimately fall into the hands of the enemy." This extraordinary letter being considered by the ministry as a virtual accusation of their negligence or incapacity, and as ominous of the loss of the place, they determined to convince the Admiral that such language was not to be held with impunity. On approaching Minorca (May 18,) Admiral Byng descried the British colours still flying at the castle of St. Philip: at the same time the French fleet appearing to the south east, he formed the line of battle; and about two o'clock he threw out signals to bear away two points from the wind and engage. Admiral West, who commanded the van division, perceiving the inconsistency of the two orders, chose to comply with the last, and bore away with his division seven points from the wind, as absolutely necessary to bring the enemy to a close and regular engagement. Not finding himself, however, sustained by his commander, he could not pursue the advantage he had gained without imminent danger of having his communication with the remainder of the fleet entirely cut off. When urged by his Captain to bear down upon the enemy, in order to support the ships of the van, Admiral Byng coolly replied, that it was his determination to keep the line of battle entire; and that he would avoid the error of Admiral Matthews, who, in his engagement with the combined fleets of France compelled to leave the palace with precipitation, and to retire into the neighbouring fields for safety; and ten thousand of the inhabitants, as it was computed, were killed by the fall of the buildings, or swallowed up in the chasms formed by the numerous and horrid dispartings of the earth. A message from the throne informed Parliament of this dreadful calamity; and, by an act of generosity and humanity which conferred the highest honour on the nation, the sum of one hundred thousand pounds was instantly and unanimously voted for the use of the distressed inhabitants of that metropolis; and supplies to this amount in corn, flour, rice, and other necessaries, were shipped without delay for Portugal, which proved a most welcome and seasonable relief.

* At the close of the session (May 27) the Speaker, on presenting the money bills for the royal assent, addressed the King in a speech replete with sentiments so just and constitutional, expressed in language so bold and animated, as to merit distinguished regard. After specifying the extent, and remarking the liberality, of the grants, exceeding those of any former period, he declared, "That the Commons of England hoped the sword, so bravely drawn and so effectually supported, would be instrusted only in capable and honest hands; and that the naval strength of Great Britain will do service as much greater as it is exalted higher than ever before. His Majesty's faithful Commons apprehended that the present critical juncture convinces that alliances on the Continent, as they are unnatural, so they must ever be prejudicial to the true interest of England: that there is no gratitude to be expected from, no dependence to be placed on, such allies; who, supported as they have been by the blood and treasure of this kingdom, have taken the opportunity of the first prospect of present profit to break through every tie. Not discouraged, however, by the ingratitude of allies or the ambition of enemies, they have with pleasure beheld the sword drawn to vindicate the national honour and interest—proud to let all the world see that England is able to fight her own battles, and to stand by her own natural strength. Though ever attached to his Majesty's person, he declared, nevertheless, that there were circumstances existing at which nothing but their confidence in his Majesty's justice, and love to his people, could hinder them from being most seriously alarmed. Subsidies to foreign Princes, when already burdened with a debt scarcely to be borne, cannot but be severely felt—an army of foreign troops, a thing unprecedented, unheard of, unknown, brought into England, cannot but alarm. Still they had reliance upon his Majesty, and hoped that their burdens might be lightened, their fears removed, as soon as possible; and, in the mean time, that the sword of these foreigners should not be intrusted a moment out of his own hand to any other person whatsoever."

and Spain off Toulon, had broken the line by his precipitation, and had exposed himself by his rashness to a fire which he could not sustain. Under colour, therefore, of preserving the line of battle entire, in order to fight with the more advantage, it could scarcely be affirmed that he fought at all—the distance at which he engaged being so great that he received only some few shots in his hull: and not a single man was killed or wounded on board the Admiral's own ship, a noble second rate of ninety guns. M. de la Galissoniere was well pleased to perceive the British commander so little in earnest; and, having no urgent reasons on his part to wish for a continuance of the fight, towards evening he bore away under an easy sail; and, though the British Admiral made the signal for chasing, it so happened that the French were not overtaken, and the next morning they were entirely out of sight. On enquiry into the condition of the fleet after this engagement, it was found that three of the principal ships were so much damaged in their masts that they could not keep the sea with safety; that about two hundred men had been killed and wounded in the engagement, and many others disabled by sickness. Admiral Byng represented to a council of war held on the occasion, that his squadron was much inferior to the enemy in weight of metal and number of men; and that they had also the advantage of sending their sick and wounded to Minorca, whence they received continual supplies and reinforcements: that, in his opinion, it was impracticable to relieve the castle of St. Philip; and that they ought, therefore, to make the best of their way back to Gibraltar, to refit and wait for further orders from England. The council concurred unanimously in these sentiments; and the fleet immediately set sail for Gibraltar,—the French returning to their former station off Mahon.

When Admiral Byng's dispatches arrived in England, the ministry, prepared for such intelligence, commissioned, without delay, Admirals Hawke and Saunders to take the command in the Mediterranean; and at the same time orders were given to send home Admiral Byng in arrest; and on his arrival in England he was committed close prisoner to Greenwich Hospital.

Although the garrison of St. Philip had reason to consider themselves as abandoned to their fate, a gallant defence was made by General Blakeney, the governor, from the middle of April to the beginning of July; when, no prospect of relief being discernible, the works and even the body of the castle being much shattered, the embrasures and parapets demolished, many cannon dismounted, and a lodgement actually made by the enemy on one of the principal redoubts—the garrison also being exhausted with hard and incessant duty—it was resolved to surrender; and a very favourable capitulation was granted by the Duc de Richelieu, the French commander,—the garrison being permitted to march out with all the honours of war, and with the liberty of a free and unmolested conveyance to Gibraltar. A few days afterwards, Admiral Hawke appeared in view, with a fleet much superior to that of the French; but M. de la Galissoniere had seasonably retired; and the English Admiral, seeing the French colours flying on the castle of St. Philip, found every effort precluded. Indeed, had he arrived before the surrender, there was little probability of his being able, even by an absolute defeat of the French squadron, to accomplish the desired object.

This conquest, which was celebrated in France with great triumph and rejoicings, in England produced a degree of depression far more than proportionate to the magnitude and importance of the loss sustained. This depression was accompanied by a feeling of resentment, and even of rage, against the unfortunate Admiral, which could scarcely have been exceeded had he, by criminal misconduct, sacrificed half the navy of Britain.

In the ensuing session of Parliament, an inquiry was instituted into the causes of the loss of the island of Minorca; and the House of Commons having addressed his Majesty for copies of all letters and instructions relative to this subject, so prodigious a mass of papers was produced as seemed rather calculated to confuse and overwhelm, than to explain and elucidate, the object of investigation. However, after a loose and cursory examination of these documents, the House resolved:—

"I. That, from the intelligence repeatedly received by his Majesty's ministers, there was just reason to believe that an invasion of Great Britain or Ireland was actually intended by the French King.

"II. That no greater number of ships of war could, with safety to his Majesty's dominions and the interest of his subjects, be sent to the Mediterranean than were actually sent thither under the command of Admiral Byng."

It is evident that these resolutions were constructed solely for the exculpation of the ministers: though it still seemed incomprehensible to all impartial observers, how, with more than one hundred and fifty ships of war in commission, so small a force only could be spared for so great a service. Mr. Fox is known to have been desirous to detach a strong squadron to the Mediterranean the first week in March; but he could not prevail over the fears of the Duke of Newcastle: Lord Anson also assured him, that Byng's squadron would beat any thing that the French had or could have in the Mediterranean.

The public clamour for justice continuing, the trial of Admiral Byng commenced December 28, before a court martial held on board the ship St. George, in the harbour of Portsmouth; and, after a long investigation, the court determined that the Admiral, during the engagement on the 20th of May last, did not do his utmost endeavour to take, seize, and destroy the ships of the French King; and that he did not exert his utmost power for the relief of the castle of St. Philip—they, therefore, unanimously agreed, "That he fell under the letter of the twelfth article of the naval code, which, for this offence, positively prescribes death, without any alternative left to the discretion of the court. But, believing his misconduct to arise neither from cowardice nor disaffection, they earnestly recommended him as a proper object of mercy."* The Admiral heard his doom without the least alteration of countenance; and, with a low obeisance to the court, retired in dignified silence.

At the same time that the court martial transmitted a copy of their proceedings to the board of Admiralty, they sent their Lordships a letter, which concluded in these terms:—"We cannot help laying the distresses of our minds before your Lordships on this occasion, in finding ourselves under a necessity of condemning a man to death, from the great severity of the 12th article of war, part of which he falls under, and which admits of no mitigation, even if the crime should be committed by an error in judgment; and therefore for our own consciences' sake, as well as in justice to the prisoner, we pray your Lordships, in the most earnest manner, to recommend him to his Majesty's clemency."—The Lords of the Admiralty, instead of complying with the request of the court martial, transmitted their letter to the King, with copies of their proceedings; and a letter from themselves to his Majesty, specifying a doubt with regard to the legality of the sentence, as the crime of negligence, for which the Admiral had been condemned, was not expressed in any part of them: at the same time copies of two petitions from George Lord Viscount Torrington, in behalf of his kinsman, Admiral Byng, were submitted to his Majesty's royal wisdom and determination. All the friends of this unhappy man employed and exerted their influence and interest for his pardon; and, as circumstances had appeared so strong in his favour, it was supposed that the royal mercy would be extended for his preservation. "But," observes Charnock,* "infamous arts were used to whet the savage appetite of the populace for blood. The cry of vengeance was loud throughout the land. Sullen clouds of cruel malevolence interposing were said to obstruct the genial beams of the best virtue that adorns the throne; and the sovereign was given to understand, that the execution of Admiral Byng was a measure absolutely necessary to appease the fury of the people. His Majesty, in consequence of the representation made by the Lords of the Admiralty, referred the sentence to the consideration of the twelve judges, who were unanimously of opinion that the sentence was legal. This report being transmitted from the privy council to the Admiralty, their Lordships issued a warrant for executing the sentence of death on the 14th of March." Admiral Forbes alone refused to sign the warrant, from the most honourable and conscientious motives.

* The XIIth article of war is as follows:—"Every person in the fleet, who, through cowardice, negligence, or disaffection, shall, in time of action, withdraw, or keep back, or not come into the fight, or engagement, or shall not do his utmost to take or destroy every ship which it shall be his duty to engage, and to assist and relieve all and every one of his Majesty's ships, or those of his allies, which it shall be his duty to assist or relieve, every such person so offending, and being convicted thereof, by the sentence of a court-martial, shall suffer death."

During this interval Admiral Byng remained on board the Monarque, in custody of the Marshal of the Admiralty; and he was at no time perceived to lose his composure or cheerfulness. About noon on the day appointed, having taken the last farewel of his friends, he advanced with a firm step and serene aspect from the great cabin to the quarter-deck, where a guard of marines awaited to execute the sentence: kneeling, without any pause or delay, on a cushion provided for the purpose, he tied with his own hands a white handkerchief over his eyes, immediately dropped another as a signal for the executioners, and five balls instantly passed through his body—the whole of this awful and impressive scene, from his leaving the cabin, being over, and the Admiral deposited on his bier, in the space of about three minutes.

Reviewing the whole of this transaction, we can scarcely avoid considering Admiral Byng as a victim to the mistakes of others, bestowing on them the lightest term. In whatever respect he might be really deficient as a commander, the blame certainly attaches, in a much stronger degree, to those who sent him on such service, than to himself, who was, if at all, naturally incompetent to the task imposed on him. But if it be admitted that the failure primarily, if not entirely, arose from a real deficiency of force, or its being inadequate to the service on account of its ill-equipment, then the malice of his enemies is completely manifest, and the innocence of the Admiral becomes too apparent even for cavil or doubt. Of his pardon this unfortunate man appears to have entertained a hope amounting almost to certainty, for at the moment of his condemnation he had made every preparation to leave Portsmouth with that degree of triumph, which a man might be supposed to display when delivered honourably from the malice and vengeance of his enemies.†

The sacrifice of this victim had not appeased the nation, which still exhibited symptoms of the highest dissatisfaction at the conduct of the men, under whose administration nothing but disgraces and disasters had occurred. The idea of a German war, for the protection of Hanover, was odious to the majority of the people; the defeat of Braddock, and the subsequent losses in America, were the subject of equal astonishment and indignation; and the recent capture of Minorca threw the kingdom into a paroxysm of rage, as the apprehension of an invasion had before done into that of terror. Though the ministry, in calling in the assistance of the Hessian and Hanoverian auxiliaries, had acted with general approbation, their conduct was now stigmatised as the effect of a ridiculous timidity, if not of treachery. It was suggested that the kingdom had been left purposely unprovided, and that the natives of South Britain had been formerly subdued by auxiliaries of the same country, hired like these, for their defence and protection. Indeed, the public suspicion and hatred of these foreigners attained such a height, that the modest, orderly, and inoffensive behaviour only, by which they were distinguished, could have secured them from acts of outrage.

War having been declared in form by England against France, in May 1756, and in June by France against England, much pains were taken, in the manifesto published by the French King, to contrast the moderation and equity of the court of Versailles with the intemperate violence of the court of London, and particularly stigmatising the seizures of the French ships of war and commerce, before a declaration of war, as piracy and perfidy. The Duke of Newcastle and Mr. Fox, finding the tide of popularity strongly against them, dreaded the approaching meeting of Parliament, and determined, by resignation, to avert the disgrace and danger of dismission. In November 1756, Mr. Pitt was appointed principal Secretary of State; Mr. Legge reinstated in his post of Chancellor of the Exchequer, which had been occupied during his secession by Sir George, afterwards Lord, Lyttleton; and the Duke of Devonshire, late Marquis of Hartington, was nominated to the high office of Lord Commissioner of the Treasury. On the second of December the session was opened by a spirited speech from the throne, in which the King expressed his confidence "that the union, fortitude, and affection of the people would, under the guidance of Divine Providence, enable him to surmount every difficulty, and vindicate the dignity of his crown against the ancient enemy of Great Britain. He declared, that the recent losses in America demanded resolutions of vigour and dispatch; and that he had nothing so much at heart as to remove all grounds of dissatisfaction from the people: for this end, he had remanded the foreign troops which had been brought hither at the desire of Parliament; and recommended the framing of a national militia, relying with pleasure on the spirit and zeal of his people in defence of his person and realm. He took notice of the unnatural union of counsels abroad, threatening the subversion of the empire, and the Protestant interest on the continent; concluding with professions of unwearied care and unceasing endeavours to promote the glory and happiness of his people."

Mr. Pitt, now regarded as first minister, soon afterwards delivered a message from the King, importing, "that, as the formidable preparations and vindictive designs of France were evidently bent against his Majesty's electoral dominions, and the territories of his good ally the King of Prussia, his Majesty confided in the zeal and affection of his faithful Commons to assist him in forming and maintaining an army of observation for the just and necessary defence of the same, and to enable him to fulfil his engagements with his Prussian Majesty, for the security of the Empire, and the support of their common interests." This message, though censured by some, was received by the House with loyal approbation, and the supplies were granted to the utmost required extent. It was, however, strongly suspected that the measure had been previously objected against in the cabinet; and, in a short time, it became apparent, that the new administration was agitated by internal convulsion; and that the favourite project of the King, for strengthening the army in Germany with large reinforcements of troops from England, was not assented to by Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge. Irritated by the pertinacity of their opposition, and urged by the Duke of Cumberland, who refused to take upon him the command of the army while Mr. Pitt remained in power, the King at length resolved upon an effort to relieve himself from this unwelcome and imperious control; and in April 1757, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge were suddenly dismissed from their offices; the Chancellorship of the Exchequer being consigned, pro tempore, to the chief justice of England. Mr. Fox, again destined to take the lead in affairs, and invested with full powers, had made proposals to the Duke of Newcastle to resume his station at the head of the Treasury; but his Grace, doubting the stability of the new arrangement, thought it expedient to demur. In the interim, he commenced a secret negociation with the ex-ministers, and after a lapse of some week, he joined them openly with all his powerful adherents.

The consternation of the country at the dismission of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge is scarcely conceivable. Addresses from all parts were presented to his Majesty, beseeching him to reinstate those ministers in their employments; the principal cities and corporations in the kingdom presented them with the freedom of their respective guilds in gold boxes; and all voices, without one dissonant murmur, were now united in their praise. Mr. Fox, perceiving it impossible to stem the torrent, wisely counselled the monarch to yield, without resistance, to the wishes of the people; and, in June, Mr. Pitt resumed the seals of Secretary of State; Mr. Legge and the Duke of Newcastle their former stations at the board of Treasury; Lord Anson was placed at the head of the Admiralty; Sir Robert Henley appointed Keeper of the Great Seal in the room of Lord Hardwicke; and Mr. Fox himself, acceding to the new order of things, and renouncing his projects of ambition, was gratified with the lucrative office of Paymaster-General of the army. In consequence of this coalition of parties, all opposition in Parliament seemed annihilated; and Mr. Pitt had scope to exert his utmost ability. The events, however, which marked the commencement of his administration were by no means fortunate. A formidable armament, equipped with incredible diligence, sailed from the harbour of Portsmouth early in September, consisting of eighteen ships of the line, and a large body of land forces, under the command of Sir Edward Hawke and Sir John Mordaunt. When Mr. Pitt ordered the fleet to be equipped, and appointed the period for its being at the place of rendezvous, Lord Anson said it was impossible to comply with the requisition: Mr. Pitt, with great warmth, replied, "That it might be done; and, if the ships were not ready at the time specified, he should signify his neglect to the King, and impeach his Lordship in the House of Commons." The menace produced its effect; and, on the twenty-third of the same month, the fleet anchored off the river Charente with a view to attempt the reduction of the city of Rochefort. Several days passed in sounding the river, in reconnoitring the coasts, in removing the troops from the transports to the boats, and the boats to the transports; and in deliberations upon the intent and practicability of the instructions under which they were to act. At length it was concluded to attack the isle of Aix, situated in the mouth of the Charente, and defended by a small fort and garrison. This service having been performed, and the works demolished, a council of war was held, in which it was resolved, to return without delay.

Considerable expectations having been entertained from this expedition, the nation was proportionably disappointed and enraged at its failure; and the public censure was directed chiefly, if not solely, against the General, it being admitted that the Minister had left nothing undone to insure the success of it, and that the Admiral had acted in no respect inconsistently with his high character for judgment and spirit.*

Early in the spring, the Duke of Cumberland had embarked for Hanover, to take upon him the command of the confederate troops, now, in consequence of the recent junction of the Prussians, amounting to about fifty thousand men. Mareschal d'Etrées, the French commander, advancing from the banks of the Rhine, the passage of which the King of Prussia in vain urged the Duke to defend, the confederate army was compelled to retire beyond the Weser. The French General, having passed this river also without opposition, attacked the Duke in his camp at Hastenbeck, July 25; and, while the battle was yet doubtful, the English commander, from a defect, not of courage, but of military skill and judgment, is charged with giving orders for sounding a retreat. A redoubt in centre of the allied army having been carried by the French, it was instantly retaken, sword in hand, at the head of a battalion of Wolfenbuttle and another of Hanoverian guards, by the Hereditary Prince of Brunswick, who by this coup d'essai evinced, that nature had destined him for a hero. The Duke, still pressed by the French army, retreated first to Nienburg, then to Verden, and at length to Stade. The Mareschal d'Etrées, regarding with a watchful and penetrating eye the motions of the Duke, when urged to embrace a favourable moment of attack, replied that there was no occasion for fighting. In fact, his Royal Highness was quickly reduced, as the Mareschal foresaw, to a distressing dilemma. In front his further march was arrested by the German Ocean; on the right and left he was inclosed by the rivers Elbe and Weser; and the French having taken possession of the passes as the confederate army receded, the Duke had, or thought he had, no option but to submit to terms of capitulation, which were signed, under the mediation of Denmark, in the month of September, at Cloister-Seven, by which the Electorate of Hanover was left in the hands of the French, now commanded by the Duc de Richelieu; and the whole confederate army, amounting to about forty thousand Hessians, Hanoverians, and Brunswickers were dispersed into different and distant quarters of cantonment—the King of Prussia having previously withdrawn his troops, from the apprehension of this catastrophe.

On his return to England, the Duke of Cumberland was received with manifest tokens of the royal displeasure; and, in consequence, he resigned all his military employments in high disgust, and henceforth took no further public part in any civil or military transaction.†

Subsequently to the unsuccessful campaign of 1757, in America, the Earl of Loudon returned to England, leaving the chief command in the hands of General Abercrombie, from whom it quickly devolved to Major-General, afterwards Lord, Amherst, who, on the arrival of Admiral Boscawen from England, early in 1758, with very powerful reinforcements, concerted with General Abercrombie a plan of spirited and active operations for the ensuing campaign. The troops now assembled, both regulars and provincials, amounted to fifty thousand men; a military force to which the new world had seen nothing comparable. The garrison of Louisburgh having been greatly reduced, in conse-

* It was said that the inactivity and timidity of Sir John Mordaunt were less pardonable than the rashness and presumption of General Braddock, who, if he failed to attain his object, had at least sustained the national reputation by his courage; and so high did the clamour arise, that it was thought necessary to institute a court-martial for the trial of this commander, by which he was, to the amazement of the public, unanimously acquitted: and the sentence was universally contrasted with that of the former court, which had condemned an Admiral to death for not doing his utmost; whereas a General was now acquitted, though it was universally acknowleged that he had done nothing.

† The court of London, in a manifesto subsequently published, affected to consider the convention in the light of a mere suspension of arms—a military regulation; to continue in force only till the issue of the negotiation then depending with the courts of Vienna and Versailles, respecting the neutrality of the electorate, could be ascertained. This, however, was a sense which the words of the convention could not be made to bear; though the force of the observation in the manifesto cannot well be controverted,—"that it is impossible to suppose the Generals of the two armies had power to make a treaty by which, without the ratification of the sovereigns, the King's dominions should be delivered up into the hands of foreigners till a general peace, of which there was not the least appearance. It is a thing unheard-of to give the General of an army so extensive an authority."

quence of the perfect security it was supposed to enjoy after the abandonment of the expedition of the last summer, it was resolved to renew the attempt; and General Amherst, with twelve thousand men, being convoyed by the fleet under Admiral Boscawen, anchored, June 2, in sight of the fortress, which in a few days was formally invested. The approaches were made with great skill and circumspection; and the Chevalier Drucourt, the Governor, seeing no prospect of relief, assented to a capitulation on the 27th of July. Exclusively of the city of Louisburgh and the whole island of Cape Breton, six ships of the line and five frigates, which were stationed in the harbour for the protection of the place, were either destroyed or taken by the English. General Abercrombie himself undertook, at the head of a still greater force, to reduce the French forts on the lakes George and Champlain. The first attempted was Ticonderago; a fortress which commands the communication between the two lakes, surrounded on three sides with water, and in front secured by a morass, and further defended, upon this emergency, with a breast-work, entrenchments, and abbatis. The General determined upon an assault; but he met with a severe repulse, and was compelled to retreat with the loss of eighteen hundred men; with which disaster he was so much dispirited, that he immediately reimbarked his troops, though still much superior in force to the enemy, and returned to the camp at lake George.—A considerable corps, however, detached by General Abercrombie, under Colonel Bradstreet, against Fort Frontenac, situated on the northern bank of the river St. Laurence, at the precise point of its departure from lake Ontario, reduced this important post with little loss; and Brigadier Forbes, who was destined to command the expedition against Fort Du Quesne, on the Ohio, finding it, on his arrival, dismantled and abandoned, immediately repaired and garrisoned the fort, changing its name, in compliment to the minister, to Pittsburg.

In the month of October, peace was established by a formal treaty between Great Britain and the Indian nations inhabiting the rich and fertile plains between the lakes and the Ohio.*

The fortune of the war having at length changed, the French, who had been hitherto the assailants, now saw the necessity of concentrating their force, in order to defend themselves from future attack and invasion. General Amherst, who possessed in a high degree the spirit of military enterprise, had, on assuming the chief command, formed a project, which would have appeared romantic and impracticable to his predecessors, for the entire conquest of Canada in one campaign. For the accomplishment of this grand scheme, Brigadier-General Wolfe, an officer who, though yet in early life, had distinguished himself in a very remarkable manner at the late siege of Louisburgh, was directed, as soon as the navigation of the St. Laurence should be clear of ice, to proceed with a strong squadron of ships of war, and a large body of land forces, to undertake the siege of Quebec, the capital of French America. General Amherst, in person, proposed with the principal army to reduce the forts of Ticonderago and Crown Point; to cross the lake Champlain, and, marching along the river Richelieu and the southern banks of the St. Laurence, to join general Wolfe under the walls of Quebec. Brigadier-General Prideaux, with another separate corps, reinforced by a numerous body of Indians, assembled and conducted by the influence and authority of Sir William Johnson, was destined to invest the important post and fortress of Niagara, which commanded the navigation of the lakes, and the communications of the rivers St. Laurence and Mississippi. After the fall of the Niagara, the forces were ordered to be embarked on the lake Ontario, and, proceeding down the river St. Laurence, to undertake the siege of Montreal, the second city of Canada, and then to join the grand army before Quebec.

In the month of July, General Amherst arrived at Ticonderago, which at first the enemy seemed preparing resolutely to defend; but in the night of the 27th they suddenly and unaccountably abandoned this strong and hitherto impregnable post, and retired to Crown Point. After giving the necessary orders for the security of the fortress, the General embarked with the army, and reached Crown Point on the 4th of August; but by this time Crown Point also had been evacuated, and the English commander was informed that the French had retired to the Isle aux Noix, at the northern extremity of the lake Champlain, where they were reported to be encamped in force. The General, after making the most vigorous and indefatigable exertions to secure a naval superiority on the lake, again embarked his troops, in order to proceed to the attack of Isle aux Noix; but a continued succession of storms and tempests compelled him to desist from the prosecution of his design, and he returned to Crown Point, in the vicinity of which he took up his winter-quarters, in order to facilitate the early commencement of the ensuing campaign. Here he had the satisfaction to learn that the expedition against Niagara had terminated happily; for though General Prideaux was unfortunately slain by the bursting of a shell in visiting the trenches, General Johnson, who succeeded to the command, after defeating a body of forces which attempted the relief of the fort, had become master of it by capitulation, July 25; the projected design against Montreal, in consequence of various combining obstacles, however, remaining for the present suspended.

The most difficult and dangerous branch of the plan had been allotted to General Wolfe. On the 26th of June the armament destined for the invasion of Canada arrived at the island of Orleans, formed by the branches of the river St. Laurence, and extending to the basin of Quebec. On the left bank of the river St. Charles, the French army, amounting to about 10,000 men, under the command of M. de Montcalm, were posted; the encampment extending to the river of Montmorenci to the east, and their rear was covered with impenetrable woods.

General Wolfe, perfectly sensible that, unless the enemy could be brought to a decisive engagement, his enterprise must prove abortive, resolved, after some ineffectual feints to induce his antagonist to relinquish this advantageous post, to attack the French in their intrenchments, near the falls of Montmorenci. On the last day of July, dispositions having been made for a general assault, the troops were landed under cover of the cannon of the ships of war; but, notwithstanding the express orders given, not to march forward till the whole of the army was formed, the English grenadiers, rushing to the attack with irregular impetuosity, were soon thrown into confusion by the enemy's fire, and suffered very severely in the retreat. The General advancing in person with the remaining brigades, the fugitives formed again in the rear of the army; but the plan of attack was effectually disconcerted; and the

* At the grand conference which preceded this treaty, the following oration was addressed to the English commissioners by one of the sachems, appointed to conduct this negociation on the part of the Indians: "Brethren—I have raised my voice, and all the Indians have heard me as far as the Twightwees, and have regarded my voice, and are now come to this place. Brethren, the cause why the Indians of Ohio left you was owing to yourselves. The Governor of Virginia settled in our lands, and disregarded our messages: but when the French came to us, they traded with our people, used them kindly, and gained their affections. Our cousins the Menisinks tell us, they were wronged of a great deal of land, and pushed back by the English settling so fast upon them as not to know whether they have any lands remaining in surety. You deal hardly with us; you kill all the wild animals of the forests, and will not let us come on your lands so much as to hunt after them; you will not let us peel the bark of a single tree to cover our cabins—surely this is hard! Our fathers, when they sold the land, did not purpose to deprive themselves of hunting the wild deer, or using a branch of wood. Brethren, we have already acquainted you with our grievances; and we have referred our cause to the great King. I desire to know if King George has yet decided this matter, and whether justice will be done to the Menisinks?" Governor Bernard, in return, assured them that full satisfaction should be given to the Menisinks; and Governor Denny, delivering to the chief a belt and string of wampum, declared "the ancient union of the British and Indian nations to be renewed and confirmed, and that fresh earth was put to the roots of the tree of peace, in order that it may bear up against every storm, and flourish as long as the sun shines, and the rivers continue to flow."

RAPIN'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

DEATH OF GENERAL WOLFE

English commander was compelled to give orders for repassing the river to the island of Orleans, which was effected, though not without considerable loss. At this period the General transmitted dispatches to England penned with remarkable perspicuity and elegance, but in a tone of depression which demonstrated a perfect sense of the embarrassments of his situation. The disaster of Montmorenci made a deep impression on his lofty and susceptible mind. He was often observed to sigh; and, to his intimate friends, he declared his determination to die rather than endure the censure and reproach which invariably attend the want of success. An effort transcendently bold, and approaching in other circumstances to rashness and desperation, yet remained to be tried. A plan was formed, in concert with the naval commander, Admiral Saunders, for landing the troops on the northern bank of the river, above the city, and, by scaling the heights hitherto supposed inaccessible, to gain possession of the grounds at the back of the town, where it was but slightly fortified. The Admiral, in order to deceive the enemy, moved up the river several leagues beyond the spot fixed upon for the landing; but, during the night, he fell down with the stream, in order to protect the debarkation of the troops, which was happily accomplished in secrecy and silence. The precipice now remained to be ascended; and, with infinite labour and difficulty, the troops sustaining themselves by the rugged projections of the rock, and the branches of the trees and plants which sprang from the innumerable clefts into which it was every where broken, they at last attained the summit, and immediately formed in order of battle. The intelligence being quickly conveyed to M. de Montcalm, that the English army was in actual possession of the heights of Abraham, that commander declared himself unable to express his astonishment, and immediately comprehended the necessity of risking an engagement, in order to save the city. Abandoning, therefore, his strong camp of Montmorenci, he passed the river St. Charles, and advanced to the attack of the English army with great intrepidity. A very warm engagement ensued; and General Wolfe, who stood conspicuous in the front of the line, received a shot in the wrist, which, wrapping a handkerchief around it, he seemed not to notice, and continued giving orders without the least emotion. Advancing, however, at the head of the grenadiers, another ball pierced his breast, and compelled him to retire to a spot a little distant from the field of action, where he expressed the most eager anxiety to learn the fate of the battle. After an interval of suspense, he was told that the enemy were visibly broken: and reclining, from extreme faintness, his head on the arm of an officer standing near him, he was in a short time aroused by the distant sound of "They fly! they fly!"—"Who fly?" exclaimed the dying hero—On being told "The French"—"Then," said he, "I depart content," and almost immediately expired in the arms of victory. It has been justly remarked, that "a death more glorious, and attended with circumstances more picturesque and interesting, is no where to be found in the annals of history."* The Generals Monckton and Townshend, after the loss of their commander, continued the fight with unabating ardour; and M. de Montcalm, the French commander, receiving a mortal wound, the French gave way on all sides, and a complete victory was gained, at a comparatively inconsiderable expense. The city of Quebec, struck with consternation at this event, almost immediately capitulated, though still provided with the means of a vigorous defence; and the shattered remains of the French army retired with precipitation to Montreal.

At home, this intelligence, which closely followed the former doubtful dispatches of the General, excited that delirium of joy which the return of national prosperity, after a long series of national disasters, is alone adequate to inspire. This was damped only by the death of the hero who had achieved the conquest.

General Murray, who had been appointed to the government of Quebec, took every precaution that prudence could suggest to secure and maintain this important possession. Nor were they found superfluous; for, early in the spring of 1760, the Chevalier de Levis, who had succeeded M. de Montcalm as commander of the French forces, assembled with great diligence, from all quarters, the troops remaining in Canada, and began his march from Montreal in the month of April, hoping to recapture Quebec before the garrison could receive the expected succours from England. General Murray, though much inferior in numbers, took possession of an advantageous post in the vicinity of Quebec, and determined to risk an engagement, which, if it proved unsuccessful, would not prevent his retiring within the walls of the city, which he determined to defend to the last extremity. The great disparity of force soon decided the conflict in favour of the French, and the General retreated to Quebec, which was immediately invested by the French army. On the intelligence, however, that an English fleet destined for its relief was already in the gulf of St. Laurence, they raised the siege with great precipitation, leaving their provisions, stores, and artillery, behind. The Marquis de Vaudreuil, Governor-General of Canada, now centred all his hopes in the defence of Montreal, which, in the expectation of an attack from General Amherst, he had strengthened with new fortifications, had recruited his army with new levies of troops, and had collected large magazines of military stores. The English Commander, after detaching Colonel Haviland with a strong force to besiege the post occupied by the French at Isle aux Noix, proceeded himself to the banks of the lake Ontario, where he embarked his troops, and, crossing the lakes, reduced the Isle Royale, commanding the entrance of the great river St. Laurence, the navigation of which, to the island of Montreal, is rendered extremely dangerous by the number of rapids and falls. The General, however, arrived with his army at Montreal, the beginning of September, with inconsiderable loss; and in a short time he was joined by general Murray, who had received orders to co-operate with him on the side of Quebec. Colonel Haviland, also, after the reduction of the Isle aux Noix, had advanced with the forces under his command to the south side of the river, opposite to Montreal. The Marquis de Vaudreuil, perceiving himself completely invested, and despairing of relief, demanded a capitulation, which was granted upon very favourable terms; and thus the important conquest of the province of Canada was finally completed.

Early in the year 1758, a plan had been presented to the minister, by one Cumming, an African merchant, a quaker, for the reduction of Fort Louis, on the river Senegal. The scheme having been approved, a small squadron was equipped, under the command of Captain Marsh, hoisting a broad pendant; Mr. Cumming, embarking also on board the commodore's ship, as a promoter and director of the expedition. After dispersing some armed vessels, which opposed their entrance into the river, the fort and adjoining factory surrendered without a blow; and Mr. Cumming defended his recommendation as perfectly consonant to his religious principles, affirming himself to have been previously persuaded that it would prove a bloodless conquest.

In the latter end of this year (1758), a successful attempt was made, under the conduct of Commodore Keppel, with a more considerable force, upon the island of Goree, to the south of the Senegal. The island was defended by two small forts, and several batteries, mounted with more than one hundred pieces of cannon; but they were soon silenced by a furious cannonade from the ships of war. During the attack, the opposite shores were covered with multitudes of the natives, who expressed with loud clamour and uncouth gesticulations their astonishment at the terrible execution performed by the British squadron. Nearly at the same time, a powerful armament, with six regiments of infantry on board under the command of Generals Hopson and Barrington, sailed from St. Helen's, and being joined on their arrival in Carlisle Bay, Barbadoes, by a considerable additional force under Commodore Moore, the united squadrons proceeded to Martinique. Finding this important island better prepared for its defence than was expected, they directed their course to Guadaloupe, of which, after a long and obstinate resistance, they made themselves masters—the neighbouring isles of Deseada and Marigalante surrendering also on capitulation.

The ill success of the expedition against Rochefort, did not deter the minister from another attempt of the same nature; the execution of which was entrusted to Commodore, afterwards Lord, Howe, an officer of approved judgment and gallantry, who disembarked the troops, agreeably to his instructions, on the coast of Normandy, and took possession of the town of Cherburg without opposition. After destroying the harbour and basin of that place, upon which much labour and much money had been expended, the fleet sailed for England; but, in a short time, it again weighed and stood to the southward; and the land forces, under General Bligh, disembarked under the cannon of the shipping, two leagues to the westward of St. Maloe's, which they found, however, too strongly fortified to be carried by a coup de main. The General, therefore, determined to penetrate into the open country, and imprudently advanced to a considerable distance beyond the possibility of protection from the fleet. The unimportant operations of this predatory war soon received an alarming interruption from the intelligence that the duc d'Aguillon, Governor of Bretagne, was in full march, at the head of eighteen regular battalions and squadrons, to intercept their retreat. The General immediately began his march for the Bay of St. Cas, where the English fleet lay at anchor; but, before he could complete the reimbarkation of his troops, the rear-guard, consisting of fifteen hundred men, was attacked by the French, and the far greater part of them killed or taken.

In the summer of 1759, Admiral Rodney was detached with a squadron, under pretext of impeding the rendezvous of the transports collecting in its vicinity, to bombard the town of Havre de Grace, which was, at the first alarm, deserted by the inhabitants in great consternation. In the month of August, M. de la Clue, endeavouring to pass the Straits of Gibraltar with a considerable squadron, was intercepted by Admiral Boscawen off Cape Lagos; and, after a fierce conflict, the French Admiral's own ship (the Ocean, of eighty guns) and three other capital ships, struck their colours to the English: a fifth (the Redoubtable, of seventy-four guns) was burnt, after having been abandoned by her crew.* This victory was soon succeeded by another of greater importance. Great preparations had been, for some time past, making in the French ports in the Channel, with a view, as was imagined, to a descent on some part of Britain or Ireland; and a powerful fleet was equipped in the harbour of Brest, which was long prevented from putting to sea by the vigilance of Sir Edward Hawke, who had blockaded that port during the greater part of the summer. Sir Edward being driven from this station by stress of weather, M. de Conflans, the French Admiral, embraced the opportunity of weighing anchor with twenty-one ships of the line. On the first intelligence of their departure, Sir Edward Hawke sailed in pursuit of them. As soon as the French Admiral perceived the English fleet off Quiberon Bay, he retired close in shore, to avoid an engagement. The English commander, however, followed and attacked the enemy with undaunted resolution; though the weather was uncommonly tempestuous, and the days much diminished in length, with the additional disadvantage of a lee shore. About three o'clock on the twentieth of November, the battle began, and continued till the fleets were enveloped in darkness, which seasonably intervened to save the French fleet from total destruction. Two capital ships, the Superbe and Thesée, were sunk during the action; the Hero struck her colours, but no boat could be sent with safety to take possession; the Soleil Royal, the flag ship of the French commander, was next day burnt by her own crew, to prevent her falling into the hands of the English; and two other ships of the line were also stranded and destroyed. The rest of the fleet, with much difficulty, sheltered themselves in the river Vilaine, where they were long blockaded, but at length found means to escape to Rochefort. This was a fatal blow to the French marine; and, for some time after, the French court attempted no further naval expedition of moment. Important advantages also were obtained in the latter years of the war by the British arms on the coast of India.†

It now becomes necessary, to take a retrospective glance

* A remarkable circumstance attended this engagement; which is, that M. de la Clue, unable to escape the pursuit of the English—who crowded all their sails to come up with him—and finding himself on the coast of Portugal, determined to run his ships on shore; which he effected near the fort of Almadana, the Commander of which fired three shots at the English. The captains of the Temeraire and Modeste anchored under the guns of the forts Xavier and Lagres; and in that situation were attacked, and compelled to surrender. For this irregular proceeding a formal embassy was sent, with such an apology as the case admitted, to the court of Lisbon.

† When the house of Brunswick succeded to the throne, England was, on the western or Malabar coast, in possession of the island of Bombay and the factory of Surat: on the opposite, or Coromandel coast, of Fort St. David, and, further to the northward, of Fort St. George, usually styled Madras, from its contiguity to that city, which, with several villages in the vicinity, was purchased, by the East India Company, of the King of Golconda; still further to the north, at the mouth of the Ganges, was Fort William, closely adjoining the town of Calcutta, a vast and populous commercial mart, situated in the kingdom of Bengal. The commerce of the French chiefly centred in the city of Pondicherry, a large and beautiful town on the Coromandel coast, between the forts St. David and St. George. Chandernagore, on the Ganges, ranked next in importance to Pondicherry, and they had also established factories at Rajapore, Calicut, and Surat, on the western side of the continent. During the course of the war, which commenced in 1740, Fort St. George, or Madras, the residence of the Governor General, and the seat of the civil administration, extending over all the English settlements in India, was conquered by the French; but restored in exchange for Cape Breton, at the ensuing pacification of Aix-la-Chapelle. Some years previously to that period, M. Dupleix had been appointed to the Governor Generalship of the French settlements in India—a man of singular ability and daring ambition, who seized with avidity every opportunity to extend and establish the empire of France in Hindostan. Nizam-al-Muluc, the subah or viceroy of the Decan, in 1745, had constituted, in virtue of his office, Anaverdi-Khan, nabob of the province of Arcot, a dependency upon his government. The subah not long surviving this appointment, was succeeded by his son, Nazir-Zing, whose claim to the succession was strongly opposed by his own kinsman Muzapher-Zing. That personage had recourse to M. Dupleix, who readily granted him powerful succours, in consideration and prospect of great future advantages. Thus reinforced, and joined by Chunda-Saib, a man of high rank and influence in the subahdary, he took the field against Nazir-Zing, who was strongly supported by the English. In a short time Muzapher-Zing was reduced to absolute submission, and Nazir-Zing, in clemency, spared his life; but detained him as a state prisoner. Muzapher-Zing found means to carry on dark and dangerous intrigues with Dupleix and Chunda-Saib, who had taken refuge in Pondicherry, and even with the ministers of Nazir-Zing; and a deep and traitorous conspiracy was formed, in consequence of which Nazir-Zing was murdered in his camp, and Muzapher-Zing proclaimed subah of the Decan. Chunda-Saib was, in consequence of this revolution, appointed nabob of Arcot, Anaverdi-Khan, the late nabob, having been previously defeated and slain, and his son Mohammed-Ali-Khan reduced to the necessity of putting himself under the protection of the English government at Madras. Muzapher-Zing did not long enjoy the fruits of his crimes; for, by a conspiracy similar to that by which he had himself risen to the throne, he was suddenly hurled from it; and the chiefs of the conspiracy, after putting him to death, proclaimed Sallabat Zing, brother to Nazir-Zing, subah of the Decan. The Mogul on the other hand, by an imperial firmaan, appointed Gawzedi-Khan, the elder brother of Sallabat-Zing, to the vice-royalty; at the same time declaring Chunda-Saib a traitor, and confirming Mohammed-Ali-Khan in the government of Arcot. The mandate of the emperor, however, would have been of little avail without the support and assistance of the English company, who determined upon sending a considerable military force, at the head of which was placed captain (afterwards Lord) Clive, into the province of Arcot, who, conducting all his operations with a vigour and dispatch which at once established his reputation as a military commander, took possession of the city of Arcot in the summer of 1751. Chunda-Saib having assembled a considerable army, with the aid of M. Dupleix, invested the city of Arcot, but was compelled to raise the siege with great precipitation; and was afterwards, in repeated engagements, defeated and foiled by the English commander. Major General Lawrence, commander in chief of the Company's troops, took the field in person, in the spring of 1752, and attacking the grand army of the enemy, headed by the nabob Chunda-Saib, he gained glance at the war in Germany. As soon as the alliance had been concluded between the courts of Vienna and Versailles, it was communicated to the court of St. Petersburgh, and the Empress of Russia acceded to it without hesitation. Sweden also became a party in the confederacy; though opposite to the views and inclinations of the monarch. The King of Poland, Elector of Saxony, was deterred from following the example of Sweden, only by his vicinity to Prussia, and the recollection of his former losses and sufferings. Great military preparations, however, being made in all parts of the Austrian dominions, and the King of Prussia having received undoubted intelligence of negociations which had been long secretly depending between the courts of Vienna, St. Petersburgh, and Dresden, greatly to his prejudice, and of which the dismemberment of his dominions was understood to be the ultimate object, ordered M. Klingraffe, his minister at the imperial court, to demand of the Empress-Queen a positive and explicit declaration of her intentions. Count Kaunitz replied, in general terms, "That her imperial Majesty had found it necessary, in the present juncture, to arm for her own defence, and that of her allies; but that her armaments did not tend to the prejudice of any person or state whatever." On the receipt of this answer, M. Klingraffe received fresh orders to represent to the Empress, "That his Prussian Majesty was well acquainted with the secret hostile projects of the imperial courts; that he constituted the Empress arbiter of peace or war; that he would be satisfied with nothing less than an express assurance of peace; and that he would regard an ambiguous answer as a declaration of war." The Empress, expressed, in indignant terms, her astonishment at the memorial now presented. She said, that "she had, in common with all other sovereigns, a right to take such measures as she deemed necessary for her safety, and that it belonged to none but herself to estimate her own danger; that no treaty of offensive alliance did exist, or had ever existed, between her and the Empress of the Russias; and gained a complete victory. Chunda Saib, being taken prisoner, had his head struck off by order of the rajah of Tanjore, who was in alliance with the Company. M. Dupleix now proclaimed Rajah-Saib, son of Chunda-Saib, nabob of Arcot; and Sallabat-Zing, in return for the powerful support he had received from the French in the Decan, and having devised means to rid himself of his competitor Gawzedi-Khan by poison, made a grant to M. Dupleix of all the English possessions to the northward of Pondicherry. The French Governor, however, being recalled before this grant could be carried into effect, and the sieur Godeheu, the new governor, professing the most pacific intentions, a provisional treaty was quickly agreed upon on the footing of actual possession at the time, till fresh instructions should arrive from Europe. No sooner was the inimical disposition of the two courts ascertained, than hostilities recommenced in the Carnatic, and were carried on with various success, but, upon the whole, with considerable advantage, by General Lawrence on the part of the English. His attention, however, was, by a series of events, diverted to another part of the continent, the peace of which had hitherto remained undisturbed by European ambition. Ali-Verdi-Khan, subah of Bengal, with the contiguous provinces of Bahar and Orissa, a Prince who had forced his way to the throne by great crimes, and had maintained possession of it by great talents, dying in April 1756, was succeeded by his adopted son Sou-Rajah Dowla, the grandson of his brother Hadjee Hamet, a young man immersed in debauchery, weak in his understanding, violent in his passions, and profligate in his morals. Ali Verdi Khan, notwithstanding his early and continued partiality for this unhappy youth, with reason dreaded the consequences of his elevation to the Musnud. In his last illness, he obliged Sou-Rajah-Dowla to swear upon the Koran never more to touch any intoxicating liquor, a vow which he observed with surprising and undeviating fidelity. The new subah viewed, with alarm and apprehension, the additional fortifications carrying on at Fort William, in consequence of the war now declared against France, and from the prosecution of which he repeatedly required the governor to desist; but his orders being neglected or evaded, he appeared suddenly before Calcutta, in the month of June, with a large body of troops, and summoned the fort and city to surrender. Mr. Holwell, who acted as governor, made a resolute defence, but was at length compelled to submit to superior force. The subah, notwithstanding his assurances of protection from personal injuries, instantly ordered the English garrison, amounting to one hundred and forty-six persons, into confinement; and as there was, at a small distance, a strong stone prison, forming within the walls a cube of about eighteen feet, open only to the westward by two windows, strongly barred with iron, they were conveyed for immediate security to this dungeon. Mr. Holwell, on entering the place, immediately anticipated all the horrors which must ensue, should they fail in obtaining a speedy release; and accosting the jemmautdaur or officer of the Indian guard, promised to gratify him with a thousand rupees if he would remove one half of them to a separate apartment. The jemmautdaur assured him he would use his utmost endeavour to procure for them this indulgence, and retired for that purpose; but returning in a short time, he told the governor that the subah, by whose order alone such a step could be taken, was asleep, and no person durst disturb his repose. Mr. Holwell, in his narration of this scene of distress, compares their situation, in this dark and sultry cell, to that of so many miserable animals in an exhausted receiver—no circulation of fresh air sufficient to continue life, and not enough divested of its vivifying particles to put a speedy period to it. A profuse perspiration, accompanied by a raging thirst, soon took place, which, becoming each moment more insupportable, gradually changed into phrensy and delirium. The prison now resounded with the ravings of despair, and, nature being at length reduced to extremity, with the groans and broken accents of the dying. In the morning twenty-three only were found alive, and in these scarcely were there any perceptible remains of sensation or sensibility. Their sufferings, however, appeared to make little impression upon the ferocious and obdurate heart of the subah, who exulted in the success of his enterprise—not having the least conception that the English would return in force to Calcutta; and contemptuously declaring, that he did not believe there were ten thousand fighting men in all the land of the Europeans.
